825 the *western part of a large survey, it is error to instruct the jury that if they are satisfied that certain specified corners of the survey are established, and the courses of the patent between these corners are correctly laid down upon the plat of the survey made in the cause, it is all that is necessary for them to ascertain, in this suit; as it is in that portion of said patent that the survey of the defendants lies, as appears by the plat, and it is only to that portion of said land that they have set up title. Idem, 468

3. A patent of S calls to commence at a certain point admitted to be a corner of M's survey, and to run with his line a certain course and distance to a white oak, corner of C; and thence with C's line a certain course and distance to another corner of C. Following the first call it comes to a white oak corner of M, but not to the corner of C; but to get to C's corner the line must leave the second corner of M at nearly right angles, and run seventy-nine poles, not running on the line of either M or C for this distance. The call for the line of M will, under the circumstances, be considered the correct call; and S's patent will be held to include all the land up to the line of M.

CAVEATS.

1. In a case of caveat the caveator should state in his caveat the grounds on which he claims to have the better right to the land in controversy. And if this is not done the caveatee may either move the court to dismiss the caveat, or to require the caveator to file a specification of the alleged better right on which his claim is founded. But after the jury is sworn to ascertain the facts, it is then too late to object to the form of the caveat.
Clements v. Kyles, 468

2. In a case of caveat all the facts agreed by the parties, or found by the jury, or, if a jury is dispensed with, ascertained by the court, necessarily become and should be made a part of the record of the cause.
Hamilton v. McNeil & als., 389

3. In a case of caveat, if the court shall certify the evidence instead of the facts, yet if there is no conflict in the parol evidence, and taking the whole as true, the appellate court may proceed safely to judgment upon the same, it is the duty of such court to proceed and give judgment according to the very right of the cause.
Idem, 389

4. In a case of caveat, where a jury is dispensed with and the whole cause is submitted to the court, it is not necessary for the losing party to file a bill of exceptions to the judgment of the court, or to move for a new trial, and if it is refused, to except to the opinion of the court refusing it; but it is sufficient that the Circuit court shall make the facts agreed and ascertained, or the evidence, where the parol evidence is in no respect conflicting, a part of the record by its order to that effect upon rendering judgment. Idem, 389

5. A case in which the cause was sent back to the court below to have a more perfect finding of the facts upon which the rights of the parties depend.

CODEFENDANTS.

Bill by vendee of land to enjoin the payment of the purchase money on the ground of defect of title to a part of the land; and vendor and adverse claimant of the land are made defendants. There being no privity between the plaintiff and the adverse claimant, and an equity between the latter and the vendor not arising on the pleadings and proofs between plaintiff and defendants, it is not a proper subject of a decree between codefendants.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTES.

1. An act is passed providing for the establishment of a system of free schools in a particular district in a county; and it provides that it shall not be carried 826 into effect until the people of the district shall, by a vote taken for the purpose, approve it. A majority of the people of the district having approved it by their vote, it is a valid and constitutional law.

Bull & als. v. Read & als., 78

2. The act provides for the election of certain commissioners, who are authorized to establish schools in the district, and to levy taxes for their support. This is constitutional. Idem, 78

3. The general assembly has full power to authorize counties, municipal corporations and the like, to levy taxes within their bounds for their peculiar purposes. And the mode, subjects and extent of such taxation is not limited or regulated by the provisions of the constitution in relation to taxation and finance.

CONTRACTS.

1. The 17th section of 29 Charles 2, ch. 3, requiring that to make good a contract for the sale of goods, &c. (for the price of ten pounds or upwards), the buyer shall accept and actually receive in whole or in part the thing sold, or give something in earnest to bind the bargain or in part payment; or that some note or memorandum of the bargain be made and signed by the parties or their agents, has not been adopted in this state.

Chapman v. Campbell, 105

2. Where there is a contract for an immediate sale, and nothing remains to be done by the vendor as between him and the vendee, the vendor immediately acquires a property in the price, and the vendee a property in the goods; and then all the consequences resulting from the vesting of the property follow, one of 827 *which is that if it be destroyed the loss falls on the vendee. Idem, 105

3. Any words importing a bargain, whereby the owner of a chattel signifies his willingness and consent to sell, and whereby another person shall signify his willingness and consent to buy it, in presenti, for a specified price, would be a sale and transfer of the right to the chattel: and neither the delivery or tender of the property, nor the payment or tender of the purchase money, is necessary to constitute the contract. Idem, 105

4. A slave on trial before a county court for larceny, is sold; and before he is discharged he makes his escape and is not heard of again. The contract of sale being complete, the purchaser is bound for the price, though the slave was not and could not be delivered. Idem, 105

5. Testator bequeaths to his widow lands, slaves, &c., for her life or widowhood, for the support of herself and her younger children. One of these children grows up and marries, and the widow contracts with her husband to sell him two of the slaves for her life; and these two slaves are not more than will be the share of his wife in the slaves. This is no breach of the trust of the will; and a court of equity will enforce the contract at the suit of the purchaser, with a provision that the slaves shall be surrendered for division if the widow shall marry.

Summers & al. v. Bean, 404

6. N sells to A all the salt he has on hand or which he shall make by the 1st of the next January, except what may become due to L his landlord for rent. A sends his boat early in December to N's wharf for a load of salt, and the salt is put on board the boat, and then L and the sheriff come, and L claims the salt for rent, and the sheriff forbids the boatman to remove it, saying he had a landlord's warrant, though he does not appear to have had it; whereupon the boatman leaves the boat and L takes possession of it. The salt having been delivered by N to A's boatman, and by him received and put into his boat, it was A's salt. And the boatman had no authority to abandon the salt to L.

Early v. Garland's lessee, 1

2. A party having an interest in or claim to land held adversely by another, may under the Code, ch. 116, § 3, p. 500, sell and convey the same; and his grantee may maintain ejectment for it.

Carrington v. Goddin, 587

3. A decree directs a commissioner to convey land to T. The fact that he was not in possession of the land at the date of the decree or of the deed of the commissioner, would not restrict the operation of the deed to a mere transfer of a right of entry which he could not transfer to another. To prevent the transfer of title, the possession must have been adversary in another.

Early v. Garland's lessee, 1

4. An insolvent merchant living in Virginia, fraudulently buys goods in Baltimore, and sends them to Ohio to conceal them. He then conveys to a trustee, for the purpose of paying his debts, his property, describing it by its location, which does not include the goods in Ohio; and after stating the trusts upon which the property is conveyed, the deed says, "And it is further expressly understood, that if by accident or forgetfulness or inadvertence the said M G (the grantor) may have omitted to mention any claim or property, that the same shall be understood as being conveyed to the said trustees to all intents and purposes as fully as if specifically mentioned." 4. Devise of a large estate to numerous devisees, and for the purpose of making division among the devisees with greater facility, testator gives his executors full power to sell or otherwise dispose of the whole or any part of said property, in such time and in such manner as to them may seem most beneficial for the whole. The executors by a deed reciting that it is made in execution of the powers vested in them, in consideration of an exchange of land made with A (one of the executors) and for the further consideration of one dollar paid by the purchaser, convey a lot belonging to their testator's estate. Such a deed on its face is not invalid; but passes the title to the purchaser.
Carrington v. Goddin, 587

CORPORATIONS.

1. In an injunction case a foreign corporation being a party defendant, and not having answered, and the answer not being required for a discovery, the absence of such defendant is not a ground for refusing to dissolve the injunction.
Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co. v. City of Wheeling, 40

2. As a corporation cannot be sworn, it must put in its answer under its common seal. Not being sworn to, the answer is not evidence for the corporation, though responsive to the bill; but it puts in issue the allegations of the bill to which it responds; and this as well on a motion to dissolve an injunction as upon the hearing, Idem, 40

3. Although a stockholder of a corporation may enjoin it from employing the property or powers of the corporation in a way wholly or materially different from that which was designed by the act of incorporation, yet such stockholder has no right to enjoin it from doing what is in direct furtherance of the object of its creation, and is for the benefit of all the stockholders as such; though it may be injurious to such stockholder in another character; or the interest of some other person or the public may be injuriously affected by the act about to be done. Idem, 40

4. The constitution, article 4, § 22, 23, 25, in relation to taxation and finance, relate to taxation by the general assembly for purposes of state revenue; and do not apply to taxes, levies, &c., by counties, corporations, &c., for the local purposes of such bodies.
Gilkeson v. Frederick justices, 577

5. The general assembly has full power to authorize counties, municipal corporations and the like, to levy taxes within their bounds for their peculiar purposes. And the mode, subjects and extent of such taxation is not limited or regulated by the provisions of the constitution in relation to taxation and finance. Idem, 577

6. The general assembly of Virginia has authority to forbid foreign corporations engaging in any pursuit within this state; and of consequence to grant permission to engage therein only upon terms.

COUNTIES.

1. In a case of caveat, upon a question involving the boundary line between two counties, the court in construing the acts in relation to their boundaries, may look to the acts forming other counties both before and subsequent, for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the legislature as to said boundary line.
Hamilton v. McNeil & als., 389

2. The acts forming new counties are not to be construed with the same strictness which is to be observed in the construction of a grant or a contract between individuals affecting rights of property; but a more liberal rule should be adopted; the object being to ascertain the true meaning and intention in any given act by considering the same in connection with all others in pari materia and with the general policy of the legislature, and to effectuate such intention. Idem, 389

3. In determining the territorial boundaries specified in said acts, due weight should be given to the cotemporaneous interpretation placed upon them by the courts and other lawful authorities within the same, and by the population at large residing therein. And maps of such territory made out and published by authority
829 *of law may properly be referred to as evidence on the question. Idem, 389

4. It has been the general policy of the legislature to establish and preserve the top of the Main Alleghany mountain as the line of boundary between the adjacent counties on either side: And in the construction of these acts this policy should be respected, and no intention to depart from it should be imputed to the legislature, unless it be plainly expressed, or the purpose be sufficiently manifested. Idem, 389

5. To carry out this policy, a call in one of these acts which if taken literally would conflict with the intent, should be disregarded or modified, and any error in the same arising from an imperfect knowledge of the topography of the country, or any other fortuitous cause, should be corrected. Idem, 389

6. In the arrangement of counties it has been the policy of the legislature to avoid inconvenient elongation or awkward or undue contractions of the territory of a county, and to preserve the same in as compact a form as practicable; and especially to keep the same in one body, not separated by the interposition of another county. And in construing such an act it should be presumed that such was the intention of the legislature, and no different interpretation should be admitted, unless a contrary intention is clearly manifest.

Idem, 389

7. The constitution, article 4, § 22, 23, 25, in relation to taxation and finance, relate to taxation by the general assembly for purposes of state revenue, and do not apply to taxes, levies, &c., by counties, corporations, &c., for the local purposes of such bodies.
Gilkeson v. Frederick justices, 577

8. The general assembly has full power to authorize counties, municipal corporations and the like, to levy taxes within their bounds for their peculiar purposes. A debt not being barred by the statute at the death of the testator, his will creates a charge upon the lands devised for the payment thereof in the proportions stated in the will; and this charge will prevent the bar of the statute as to the estate taken by the sons under the devise to them.

CRIMINAL JURISDICTION AND PROCEEDINGS.

1. Upon a trial for the forgery of an endorsement on a note, the commonwealth having proved that the note went into the prisoner's possession, and notice to him to produce it, may prove the note and the forgery in its absence; and the note having been deposited in bank for collection, the original entries in the book of the note clerk of the bank, proved by the clerk to have been made by him from the note, are competent evidence to prove that the note and endorsement thereon were as described in the indictment. Cocke's Case, 750

2. The indictment charges in one count the forgery of a note, and in another count the forgery of an endorsement upon the note. The jury find the prisoner not guilty on the first count; and then say, "On the second count, viz: that of uttering a negotiable note, knowing it to be forged, we find the prisoner guilty, and affix the term of his imprisonment for the term of two years." The verdict upon the second count is too uncertain to authorize any judgment upon it; and a venire facias de novo on that count should be awarded.

a prisoner, he moves the court to set it aside as contrary to evidence; which motion is on another day overruled. On the day when the motion was made, and also when it was overruled, the record states that the prisoner appeared by attorney; and there is nothing in the record to show that he was present. This is error.

Hooker's Case, 763

4. Upon a rule to show cause why an information should not be filed, the defendant appears and moves the court to quash the presentment on the ground that it does not charge any offense against him; but the motion is overruled. DEBT.

There is a statement of account of rents received through a number of years by an agent for his principal. And at the foot of the account there is a written statement setting out the gross amount of rents received, certain deductions for commissions and expenses, leaving the net sum of eleven hundred and thirty-seven dollars and thirty-five cents; and it concludes, "In the foregoing statement all errors to be corrected. As witness my hand and seal." And it is signed and sealed by the agent:

1st. Quære: If this paper will sustain an action of debt.

2d. If the paper will sustain an action of debt, in declaring upon it, if the plaintiff claims the sum stated in it, as the net rents, it must be averred that there is no error in the bond. And if she seeks to recover more or less than the sum stated, she should aver such error in the bond as will sustain her demand.

DECREES.

1. In a suit in equity to recover land C is a party. He dies, and the suit is revived against his administrator, but not against his heirs; and then there is a decree. The heirs are not concluded by the decree upon the principle which binds parties to a cause.

Early v. Garland's lessee, 1

2. In such a case there being nothing in the bill and proceedings having special reference to the part of the lot held by C, which is in controversy in an action of ejectment, the decree does not ascertain that C was a pendente lite purchaser; and the heirs of C are not estopped from setting up an adversary title anterior to its date.

Idem, 1

3. Though the decree is conclusive evidence that such a decree was made,

4. Tichenor v. Allen, 15

5. A decree erroneous in itself, or if collusive between the parties to it, cannot be examined into in a collateral proceeding; but it is conclusive upon the matters thereby adjudicated until set aside in some proceeding for the purpose. 4. A party having an interest or claim to land held adversely by another, may, under the Code, ch. 116, § 5, p. 500, sell and convey the same; and his grantee may maintain ejectment for it.
Carrington v. Goddin, 587

5. In an action of ejectment, the tenant, without disclaiming title to any part of the land in the declaration mentioned, proves upon the trial that he is only in possession and claiming title to a part of it. A verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff for all claimed in the declaration, is not erroneous; or if it is, it is not an error by which the tenant is injured, or for which he can complain in an appellate court.

EQUITABLE JURISDICTION AND RELIEF.

1. When creditors of a discharged bankrupt may go into equity to impeach the discharge, and to set aside fraudulent conveyances made by the bankrupt before his bankruptcy. See Bankrupts, passim, and
Tichenor v. Allen, 15

2. Although a stockholder of a corporation may enjoin it from employing the property or powers of the corporation in a way wholly or materially different from that which was designed by the act of incorporation, yet he has no right to enjoin it from doing what is in direct furtherance of the object of its creation and is for the benefit of all the stockholders as such; though it may be injurious to such stockholder in another character, or the interest of some other person or the public may be injuriously affected by the work about to be executed.

5. A court of equity may hold a guardian to account, and his sureties with him, for the payment of any balance found due to the ward; though the guardian lives out of the state and has no property within it.
Pratt v. Wright & als., 175

6. D purchases land subject to a trust to secure a debt due, and retains the amount of the debt out of the purchase money, to pay it. He dies indebted to more than the whole of his personal estate. The land is the primary fund to pay the debt; and the widow of D may institute a suit in equity to have the land sold and the debt paid, and to have her dower out of the residue of the purchase money; though D's heirs are infants.
Daniel & als. v. Leitch, 195

7. In such case what prayer in widow's bill will not vitiate the proceedings as against the infant heirs, so as to release a purchaser under the decree. See Infants, No. 2, and Idem, 195

8. Where the proceedings to have a sale of infants' land have been irregular, 833 *how they may be corrected. See Infants, No. 3, and Idem, 195

9. When purchaser under a decree for the sale of infants' lands, will be compelled to complete his purchase. See Infants, No. 3, 4, and Idem, 195

10. Courts of equity have at least as large a discretion in giving time to perfect the title in cases of sales made under their decrees as in cases of purchases by private contract. Idem, 195

11. Wife brings suit against her trustee and purchaser from him, to recover the trust property sold and hires. Pending the suit she dies, and bequeaths her property to her husband. Husband may bring an independent suit against trustee, purchaser and wife's administrator, to recover the property sold and the hires not paid to the wife: Or he may file a bill setting out the proceedings in the previous suit, and ask to have the benefit of said proceedings.
McDaniel v. Baskervill, 228

12. Devise to trustees for use of A for his life, with the privilege to live on the farm and use the slaves so far as necessary, for support of himself and family; but not to be liable for any debt A then owed or thereafter might owe; and at his death to his children. Creditors of A not having recovered a judgment against him, cannot come into equity to subject the trust property, though the debts were contracted for necessaries for the support of the family.
Armstrong's adm'r & als. v. Pitts & als., 235

13. Though a creditor's debt is evidenced by deed, yet where there has been gross laches in its prosecution, and the account cannot be settled without injustice to the estate of the deceased debtor, a court of equity will not give the creditor relief.
Tazewell's ex'or v. Whittle's adm'r, 329

14. Laches in the assertion or prosecution of a claim is not always enough to defeat it. The laches must be such as afford a reasonable presumption of the satisfaction or abandonment of the claim; or such as to prevent a proper defense by reason of the death of parties, loss of evidence or otherwise.
Tazewell's ex'or v. Saunders' ex'or & al., 354

15. Courts of equity will decree interest upon a bond or judgment beyond the penalty, against the principal debtor.

16. A claimant of land in possession under his deed, the question of its validity, independent of the ground of fraud, is proper to be tried at law; and a court of equity has no jurisdiction to try it.

18. In an action at law on a bond against a surety, he defends it on the ground of usury; but there is a judgment against him. The surety then files a bill for relief against the judgment, on the ground of after discovered evidence; but there was evidence to the same point before the jury. The after discovered evidence being merely cumulative, it is not ground for relief.
Harnsbarger's adm'r v. Kinney, 511

19. In such a case the surety seeks relief on the ground that the principal obligor had sold to the obligee a tract of land for three thousand dollars, which was to be credited on the bond, but that only twenty-five hundred had been so credited. This defense might have been made at law, and is no ground for relief. Idem, 511

20. The surety further charges that the obligee agreed upon the sale and purchase of said land, to release the sureties; but although there is proof that pending the negotiation, the obligee said he would take a bond for the balance from the principal obligor, with his sons as sureties, and would wait with him for the money during his life, upon his paying the interest, and it was proved also that the principal obligor was anxious to relieve his sureties, yet in the final execution of the contract nothing having been provided to carry out the arrangement, and the obligee retaining the old bond credited with the price of the land, and the obligor paying interest upon it, there is no ground for relief on that account. Idem, 511

21. The obligor having been remiss in paying the interest upon the bond promptly, as he was required to do, on two occasions when he sent an agent to pay the interest due, directed him to pay the interest up to the period when the interest would next become due. This, however, was voluntary on his part, and not required by the obligee; but endorsements of the payments were made upon the bond. This is no ground of relief to the surety. Idem, 511

22. A bill is filed by one of three sureties, for relief against a judgment recovered on a bond, which sets out a parol promise of the obligee, made at the time
834 *the surety signed the bond, that the plaintiff should not be required to pay any part of it, and that said obligee would give him a written indemnity to save him harmless, as the ground of relief. As proof to sustain the case made by the bill would be inadmissible, the bill is demurrable.

ESTATES.

1. Devise to G for life, and at his death in fee simple to his eldest son then living. A son E, is afterwards born. This is a contingent remainder in fee in the son E, dependent upon his being alive at the death of G.
Baylor's lessee v. Dejarnette, 152

2. Testator says, "I give the use and profits of all my estate real and personal to my daughters who may remain single. Should they all marry or when they die, then it is my will that my property shall be equally divided among my surviving children. My land in the county of King George, called Dissington and Friedland, I give to my son G. I do this in consideration of the attention and kindness that he has paid and will continue to pay to his sisters. Testator had three sons who had means to support themselves, and six daughters, five of whom were at the time unmarried. He lived on the land mentioned as given to G, and it was all the land he owned, and he owned about thirty slaves: held:

1st. By the first clause of the will an estate for life was given to the daughters in the property therein described; determinable as to each on her marriage.
Hooe & als. v. Hooe, 245

2d. That the devise of the land to G, which was in the third clause of the will, is not an exception out of the general devise to the daughters, nor a revocation of said devise pro tanto, upon the ground of repugnancy thereto. Idem, 245

3d. That the daughters did not take a mere equitable right to the use and profits of the property devised, dependent, as to the land, upon a legal estate vested in possession in G; but took such a legal estate in the use and profits of the testator's whole estate, including the land, as entitled them to retain possession thereof until they should marry or die; and the estate given to G will not vest in possession until that time.

3. B died in 1807, and by his will devised a tract of land to each of his two sons J and F. He then says, "It is my will, if my said son J die without issue, that the property heretofore given him shall go to his brother F, who in that case will lose the land heretofore given him. It being my will and desire then and in that case, and upon the happening of the event of my son J's death, that the land near W which would otherwise be F's share, be sold and the money equally divided between my surviving children. J dies without issue. J took an estate tail in the land devised to him, which was converted by the statute into a fee simple; and therefore the limitation over to F is void.

EVIDENCE.

1. In ejectment the tenant claims under a purchaser at a judicial sale; the record of the cause in which the sale was made is legal evidence for him as a link in his chain of title, though the plaintiff was not a party in the cause.
Baylor's lessee v. Dejarnette, 152

2. In a case of caveat the caveator claims under a patent issued to W in 1756, which does not refer to any survey. To show that the patent was founded on a survey, caveator offers in evidence a copy from 835 the books of the surveyor of *Augusta county, of a certificate of a survey and plat made for W, dated in November 1749. The certificate does not contain the calls for course and distance or other marks, but these are given on the plat, and they agree with the locative calls of the patent. FREE SCHOOLS.

1. A statute having provided for a system of free schools in a particular district
837 *in a county, and provided for commissioners to establish and manage the schools; some of the inhabitants of the district may file a bill in behalf of themselves and the other inhabitants, against the commissioners, to test the validity of the act, and the propriety of the proceedings of the commissioners under it.
Bull & als. v. Read & als., 78

2. An act is passed providing for a system of free schools in a particular district in a county; and it provides that it shall not be carried into effect until the people of the district shall, by a vote taken for the purpose, approve it. A majority of the people of the district having approved it by their vote, the act is a valid and constitutional law. Idem, 78

3. The act provides for the election of certain commissioners who are authorized to establish schools in the district, and to levy taxes for their support. This is constitutional. Idem, 78

4. The commissioners being authorized to establish schools and levy taxes sufficient to defray the expenses thereof; they may build the necessary school-houses, and levy sufficient taxes to pay for them.
Idem, 78

5. The act authorizes the commissioners to levy a capitation tax upon the white male inhabitants, and an ad valorem tax upon the property in the district, sufficient to raise the amount necessary to defray the expense of the schools. This provision is to be construed in accordance with the constitution; and the capitation tax is properly levied upon the white male inhabitants above twenty-one years of age only; and the ad valorem tax upon slaves is properly levied upon slaves over twelve years of age and valued each at three hundred dollars. And the ratio of the capitation to the ad valorem tax may be greater than that prescribed in the constitution, article 4, § 25. Idem, 78

5. In such case there is a suit in equity by a creditor of testator against G, before the birth of E, and a decree after his birth without making him a party. He is bound by the decree. Idem, 152

6. A devise of land charged with payment of one-fourth of testator's debts. By accepting the devise the devisee becomes liable personally, in respect to the subject devised to him, for the one-fourth of testator's debts; and the creditors are not bound to look to the general estate of testator before asserting their claim against the devisee and the subject devised. Idem, 152

HUSBAND AND WIFE.

1. T lends to his daughter D a married woman, three negro women during her life, and they go into the possession of 838 the *husband; and by deed T gives her the future increase of the three women. D survives her husband, and keeps possession of the three women as belonging to her; and whilst so in her possession they have a number of children: held:

1st. The women not having been expressed to be given for the separate use of D, and not having been conveyed to a trustee, they were the property of the husband for the life of the wife.

2d. The gift of the future increase of the women was a valid gift.

10. When the objection to a presentment may be taken in the appellate court. See Criminal Jurisdiction and Proceedings, No. 4, and Idem, 785

INFANTS.

1. D purchases land subject to a trust for the payment of a debt due, and retains so much of the purchase money to pay it. He dies indebted for more than his personal estate will pay, leaving a widow and infant children. The land being the primary fund for the payment of the debt, the widow may file a bill against the creditor and the infants, to have the land sold and the debt paid, and for her dower out of the residue of the purchase money.

Daniel & als. v. Leitch, 195

2. After stating the case, and that it would be for the interest of the infants to have the whole land sold and the proceeds invested in certain slaves, and praying for a sale, the payment of the debt and the investment of the residue of the purchase money in slaves, she also prays that if the trust creditor will consent, the land may be sold subject to the trust: but this the creditor declines. The addition of this prayer does not vitiate the proceeding as against the infant heirs; but the decree directing a sale and the payment of the debt, a purchaser under the decree may obtain a valid title to the land sold, and will be compelled to complete the purchase. Idem, 195

3. A sale of a part of the land having been made under a decree in the widow's suit, and that sale having been confirmed by the court, even if the proceeding was irregular as to the infant heirs, yet the purchaser will not be discharged from his purchase if the title can be perfected
839 *in a reasonable time: And the guardian of the infants having filed his bill according to the statute, in which he asks to have the sale confirmed as very beneficial to the infants, the court may in that case confirm the sale, and thus assure to the purchaser a good title against the infant heirs; and compel him to complete his purchase. Idem, 195

4. After a sale of infants' land has been confirmed by the court, although the proceeding has been irregular, yet if the title of the purchaser can be made good, and it is for the interest of the infants to confirm the sale, the purchaser will not be released from his purchase; but if the interest of the infants is injured by the sale, it will be set aside. Idem, 195

5. Courts of equity have at least as large a discretion in giving time to perfect the title in cases of sales under their decrees, as in cases of purchases by private contract. Idem, 195

2. A proceeding for a contempt in disobeying an injunction, is not an order in the cause; but is in the nature of a criminal proceeding.

Balt. & Ohio R. R. Co. v. City of Wheeling, 40

3. The court for good cause shown may overrule a motion to dissolve an injunction and continue it to the hearing, without adjudicating the principles of the cause; in which case no appeal will lie from the order. Idem, 40

4. What is an order adjudicating the principles of the cause. See Appellate Jurisdiction, No. 5, and Idem, 40

5. A foreign corporation being a party and not having answered, and the answer not being necessary for a discovery, the absence of such is not a ground for refusing to dissolve an injunction. Idem, 40

6. On a motion to dissolve an injunction all the allegations in the bill not denied by the answer are taken as true, and it is no objection to the motion to dissolve, that exceptions to the answer for insufficiency have not been acted on. Idem, 40

7. As a corporation cannot be sworn, it must put in its answer under its common seal. Such answer is not evidence for the corporation, though responsive to the bill; but it puts in issue the allegations of the bill to which it responds; and this as well on a motion to dissolve an injunction as upon the hearing. JAMES RIVER & KANAWHA CO.

1. The James river and Kanawha company not having completed the improvement of the Kanawha river, as prescribed in their charter, and not having charged tolls as authorized by said charter, are not liable for damages occurring in the navigation of the river, for not having such an improvement as the charter prescribes.

James River & Kanawha Co. v. Early, 541

2. The said company being authorized by law to charge tolls on the Kanawha river not exceeding those allowed to be charged by their predecessors the James river company, are bound to keep the navigation of the river in the condition in which the James river company were required to 840 keep it, and are liable for any *damages sustained by their failure so to keep it. Idem, 541

3. The James river company was only required to improve the Kanawha river in the mode suggested in the report of the principal engineer of the state made in January 1820, and referred to in the act of the 17th of February 1820. This did not contemplate a continued improvement, but that specified works should be done at specified places. And for damages occurring in consequence of obstructions at other places, the successors of the James river company are not responsible. Idem, 541

4. The ninth section of the act of February 27th, 1829, Sup. R. C. p. 469, does not require the company to place buoys or beacons on a snag lodged temporarily in the river, at a place at which, by the plan of improvement suggested by the principal engineer, and adopted by the act of February 17th, 1820, no work was required to be done. Idem, 541

5. The tenth section of the act of February 27th, 1829, only refers to depositions of sand, &c., in the artificial channels and sluices made in the improvement of the navigation of the river, and not to such depositions in the natural channels of the river. Idem, 541

LACHES.

1. Though a creditor's debt is evidenced by deed, yet where there has been gross laches in its prosecution, and the account cannot be taken without injustice to the estate of the deceased debtor, a court of equity will not give the creditor relief.

Tazewell's ex'or v. Whittle's adm'r, 329

2. Laches in the assertion or prosecution of a claim is not always enough to defeat it. The laches must be such as to afford a reasonable presumption of abandonment of the claim, or such as to prevent a proper defense by reason of the death of parties, loss of evidence or otherwise.

LANDLORD AND TENANT.

1. A lease being forfeited by the act of the lessee in subletting the premises, the forfeiture will be waived if the lessor, with knowledge of the forfeiture, accepts rent, or sues out a distress for rent, accruing after the forfeiture.

McKildoe's ex'or v. Darracott, 278

2. A subletting is not a continuing act of forfeiture, and if the forfeiture is once waived, it cannot afterwards be retracted. Idem, 278

LARCENY.

Upon a trial for the larceny of a bank note the property of G, of the value of twenty dollars, it is error to instruct the jury, that if they believe from the evidence, that G lost a bank note of the value of twenty dollars, and that the same was afterwards found in the possession of the prisoner, they ought to find him guilty unless his possession of the note was explained by testimony. Hunt's Case, 757

2. The mere possession of goods which had been actually lost, does not furnish any conclusive or even prima facie proof of guilt: of itself it does not raise the suspicion of guilt. Idem, 757

3. To constitute larceny in the finder of goods actually lost, it is not enough that the party has general means by the use of proper diligence, of discovering the true owner. He must know the owner at the time of finding, or the goods must have some marks about them understood by him, or presumably known by him, by which the owner can be ascertained: And he must appropriate them, at the time of finding, with intent to take entire dominion over them. Idem, 757

4. A person is staying at a tavern, and the landlord offers him a gun to go and shoot robins, which he takes, and after shooting once or twice near the house,

2. A deed made by a limited partnership conveying all its property in trust to pay a debt to a firm of which the special partner is a member, at a time when the debts 843 of the partnership exceeded *the value of its property, and when the acting partners knew that the partnership must stop business unless the special partner or his firm would advance money to enable them to carry on the business, and without an undertaking on his part to make such advances, though they may have had some expectations that he would do it, is void as to the other creditors of the partnership.

3. Under such circumstances confessions of judgments in favor of some creditors in order to give them a preference, are void as to the creditors. Idem, 683

4. A special partner taking a deed of trust to secure a debt due to a firm of which he is a member, under such circumstances, makes himself liable as a general partner to the creditors of the partnership.
Idem, 683

5. In the distribution of the assets of such partnership among its creditors, a debt due to a firm of which the special partner is a member, is to be paid ratably with the debts due to the other creditors.
Idem, 683

6. A court of equity having obtained jurisdiction of a suit by creditors to set aside a deed improperly made to give preference to a creditor of the partnership, and to have a distribution of the assets of the partnership among all the creditors, may proceed to do complete justice in the cause, and to make a personal decree against the special partner who has made himself liable as a general partner, in favor of creditors, for the balance due them respectively after distributing the assets of the partnership ratably among them. Idem, 683

7. The fact that the creditors have recovered judgments at law against the general partners, will not defeat their remedy against the special partner. Idem, 683

8. The share of the special partner in the debt due to the firm of which he is a member, will be retained under the control of the court, and applied to the satisfaction of the creditors of the partnership.
Idem, 683

9. To ascertain the share of the special partner in said debt, the court will direct an enquiry into the ability of the firm of which he is a member to pay their debts, independent of their claim upon the partnership, and into the interest of the special partner in said firm; and will direct that if no evidence is offered, it shall be presumed that the firm is able to pay its debts, and

As witness my hand and seal." And it is signed and sealed by the agent.

1st. Quære: If this paper will sustain an action of debt.

2d. If the paper will sustain an action of debt, if the plaintiff claims the sum stated in it as net rents, he must aver that there is no error in the bond. And if he seeks to recover more or less than the sum stated, he must aver such error in the bond as will sustain his demand.

POWERS.

Testator empowers his executors to set apart so much of his estate not specifically bequeathed, as they may think sufficient to produce a clear income of two thousand dollars, which is directed to be paid to certain legatees for their lives. And after some unimportant provisions, he gives the balance of his estate among his nephews and nieces: and then he says, "And for the purpose of making such division with greater facility, I hereby give to my executors, or such of them as may 844 *choose to act, full power to sell or otherwise dispose of, the whole or any part of said property, in such time and manner and on such credit as to them may seem most beneficial for the whole."

1st. Quære: If the legal title to the real estate vested in the executors.

Carrington v. Goddin, 587

2d. The executors had full power and authority to sell all or any part of the real estate; and a bona fide purchaser from them is not bound to show that such sale was necessary for the purpose of making division among the devisees.

Idem, 587

3d. A bona fide purchaser will not be affected by the failure of the executors to account for the purchase money.

4th. The executors by deed reciting that it was made in execution of the powers vested in them, in consideration of an exchange of land made with A (one of the executors) and for the consideration of one dollar paid by the purchaser, convey a lot belonging to the estate of their testator. Such a deed on its face is not invalid, but passes the title to the purchaser. Idem, 587

12. Bill by vendee of land to enjoin the payment of the purchase money on the ground of defect of title to a part of the land, makes vendor and adverse claimant parties, and charges generally fraud in the latter in procuring his deed to the land. Vendor answers and also charges adverse claimant with fraud:

1st. The general allegation of fraud in the bill is not sufficient to raise that question.

2d. That there is no privity between plaintiff and adverse claimant, and the equity between the latter and the vendor does not arise upon the pleadings and proofs between plaintiff and defendants, and is not therefore the proper subject of a decree between codefendants.

Steed v. Baker & al., 380

13. In an action at law on a bond against a surety, he defends it on the ground of usury; but there is a judgment against him. Roberts v. Roberts, 639

15. According to the practice in Virginia, upon objection to a sale of land made by a commissioner, it is not necessary to ask that the biddings may be opened by the offer of a substantial advance upon the price reported. But the court will consider the objections to the sale, and confirm or set it aside as the merits of the case may require. Idem, 639

16. On a bill claiming a share of a tract of land, and asking for partition, and for general relief, the plaintiff's right to partition being established, under the prayer for general relief there may be a decree for an account of rents and profits.

The act, Code, ch. 77, § 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, relates only to conveyances, devises and dedications of property for the use of "religious congregations," in the limited and local sense of that term; viz: for the members of those religious congregations, who from their residence at or near the place of public worship, may be expected to use it for such purpose. Idem, 301

3. No deed which does not respect the rights of the local society or religious congregation, and no deed which does not design the enjoyment of the uses of the property conveyed, by the local religious society or congregation, can be placed within the influence of the statute. Idem, 301

4. A deed conveying property in trust for the use of the local society, is not without the operation of the statute, by reason that it sanctions the appointment of the ministers, and authorizes them to use the house for preaching, without any reference to the vote or wish of the congregation; it being a Methodist church, and the ministers being to be appointed by the conference, according to the constitution of that church. Idem, 301

5. Deed conveys a house of worship in trust for a local religious congregation; and provides, that the trustees are at all times to permit the ministers belonging to the Methodist Episcopal church, who shall be duly authorized by the conferences of the church, to preach in the house. Upon a question of the right of a minister to preach in the house, that question is to be determined by enquiring, not whether he represents the wishes of a majority of the members of the society, but whether he has been appointed and assigned to the society in accordance to the laws of the church. Idem, 301

6. The general conference of the Methodist Episcopal church in the United States had the constitutional power to adopt the plan for the separation of the church, adopted in 1844. Idem, 301

7. A society of the church which, according to the plan of separation, is a border society, having by a majority of its members resolved to adhere to the Methodist Episcopal church south, is entitled to the use of the church house in exclusion of those who repudiate the authority of said church, and refuse to receive the pastors appointed by it. Idem, 301

SALES.

1. The 17th section of 29 Charles 2, ch. 3, in relation to the sale of goods, &c., has not been adopted in Virginia.
Chapman v. Campbell, 105

847 *2. When there is a contract for an immediate sale, and nothing remains to be done by the vendor as between him and the vendee, the vendor immediately acquires a property in the price, and the vendee a property in the goods; and then all the consequences resulting from the vesting of the property follow, one of which is that if it be destroyed the loss falls on the vendee. Idem, 105

3. Any words importing a bargain whereby the owner of a chattel signifies his willingness and consent to sell, and whereby another shall signify his willingness and consent to buy it, in presenti, for a specified price, would be a sale and transfer of the right to the charter: and neither the delivery or tender of the property, nor the payment or tender of the purchase money, is necessary to constitute a contract. Idem, 105

4. A slave on trial for larceny before a County court is sold; and before he is discharged he makes his escape and is not heard of again. The contract of sale being complete, the purchaser is bound for the price, though the slave was not and could not be delivered. Idem, 105

5. An insolvent merchant purchases goods not intending to pay for them, and after getting possession of them, he conveys them and all his other estate, in trust for the payment of his debts; the trustee having no notice of the fraud. The trustee is a purchaser for value without notice, and the vendor cannot reclaim the goods.
Wickham and Goshorn v. Lewis Martin & Co., 427

6. Quære: What fraud in the purchaser of goods will authorize the seller to reclaim them whilst in possession of the purchaser. Idem, 427

7. What is a delivery so as to vest title, where the subject is not a specific thing, but salt to be made. See Contracts, No. 6, and
Lewis v. Arnold, 454

8. As to sales of expectant interests and reversions. See Expectant Interests, No. 1, 2, and Cribbins v. Markwood, 495

SEDUCTION.

1. In an action for the seduction of plaintiff's daughter, to enhance the damages, he may prove that the defendant promised to marry her, and by means of said promise had succeeded in debauching her.
White v. Campbell, 573

2. The action by a father for the seduction of his daughter is founded on the relation of master and servant, and not of parent and child.
Lee v. Hodges, 726

3. In such case the declaration must allege the relation of master and servant, or it will be fatally defective on demurrer. Idem, 726

4. The only change made by the act, Code, ch. 148, § 1, p. 589, in relation to the action of seduction, is to dispense with proof of the loss of service: The act does not give the action in any case where it did not lie at common law. Idem, 726

5. Where a daughter over the age of twenty-one years, who lives away from her father's house, under a contract for her services made by herself after she came of age, for her own benefit, is seduced, the action by the father will not lie either at common law or under the statute. Idem, 726

SETOFF.

1. A plea of equitable setoff under the statute, must show that the offset is such as may be set up under the statute, and must be verified by affidavit.
Watkins v. Hopkins' ex'or, 743

2. In an action on a bond for five hundred dollars, given for the last payment of the purchase money of a tract of land, a plea that the plaintiff was to make defendant a good title to the land upon the payment of the bond, and that the defendant had offered to pay it upon the making of the title, and that the plaintiff had failed and refused to make the title; by reason whereof the consideration had failed to the extent of two hundred and fifty dollars; is not a good plea in substance. Idem, 743

3. In such an action, a plea, that the plaintiff had failed to give the defendant possession of two acres of the land; or a plea, that plaintiff had failed to deliver possession of the land for two months after the time at which by the contract he was to deliver possession; or that he had not delivered the tenement in the plight and condition in which it was at the time of the sale, and in which he was to deliver it, but delivered it in a damaged condition from injuries done or permitted in the mean time to the tenement and freehold; is a good plea setting out a partial failure of the consideration. Idem, 743

SHERIFFS.

1. The act of June 7, 1852, Sess. Acts of 1852, p. 12, authorizing assessments 848 in *certain cases on the office of sheriffs and sergeants, is not in violation of the constitution.
Gilkeson v. Frederick justices, 577

2. An assessment of four hundred dollars upon the sheriff of Frederick county, laid on the 4th of October, and to be paid on the 1st of February following, is not in violation of the act of 1852. Idem, 577

3. If the time of payment fixed by the court was inconsistent with the act, that would not render the assessment void; but it would be corrected as to the time of payment. Idem, 577

SLAVES AND FREE NEGROES.

1. The gift of the future increase of female slaves is a valid gift.
Taylor & als. v. Yarbrough & wife, 183

2. Such gift being to a married woman who survives her husband, the increase of the slaves born after the death of the husband, belong to the wife. Idem, 183

3. As a general rule a court of equity will decree the specific execution of a contract for the sale and delivery of slaves, at the suit of the purchaser, without any allegation or proof of peculiar value.

Summers & al. v. Bean, 404

4. See Specific Performance, No. 2, 3, 4, and Idem, 404

5. See Emancipation, No. 1, and Hepburn & als. v. Dundas & als., 219

6. There are three negroes, children of the same mother, born slaves, and the mother and children are afterwards emancipated. One of the three dies, having acquired real estate, intestate and without children; and the mother is dead. The other two take the estate as heirs to their deceased sister. Idem, 219

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

1. As a general rule a court of equity will decree specific execution of a contract for the sale and delivery of slaves, at the suit of the purchaser, without any allegation or proof of peculiar value.
Summers & al. v. Bean, 404

2. The purchase of slaves being for the life or widowhood of the vendor, upon her refusal to execute the contract, the inadequacy of the purchaser's remedy at law will give equity jurisdiction to relieve him.
Idem, 404

3. In a suit in equity by purchaser of slaves for the life or widowhood of the vendor, there being no controversy as to the right of the remainderman in the slaves, they are not necessary parties.
Idem, 404

4. Testator bequeaths to his widow land, slaves, &c., for her life or widowhood, for the support of herself and her younger children. One of these children grows up and marries, and the widow contracts with her husband to sell him two of the slaves for her life; and these two slaves are not more than will be the share of the wife in the slaves. This is no breach of the trust of the will, and a court of equity will enforce the sale at the suit of the purchaser, with a provision that the slaves be surrendered for division if the widow shall marry.

STATUTES.

SURETIES.

1. A court of equity has jurisdiction to hold a guardian to account, and his sureties with him, to the payment of any balance found due to the ward; though the guardian lives out of the state and has no property within it.
Pratt v. Wright & als., 175

2. As to guardians' bonds. See Guardians, No. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and Idem, 175

3. The surety of an executor having executed the bond, is estopped from pleading that it is made payable to a justice who was not on the bench at the time.
Franklin's adm'r v. P. Depriest, 257

4. By the act, Code, ch. 168, § 3, p. 640, suit may be maintained upon such bond, though it is made payable to a justice who was not sitting in the court at the time of its execution. Idem, 257

5. The statute of limitations in favor of sureties of fiduciaries, Code, ch. 149, § 5, 6, p. 591, does not begin to run until there is a decree or judgment against the executor, fixing his liability. Idem, 257

6. That the decree against the executor was de bonis testatoris, when it should have been de bonis propriis, is an error of which the plaintiff might complain, but it is not an error which can avail the surety. Idem, 257

7. If such a decree was erroneous as to the surety, this would not render it a nullity. So long as it remains unreversed, full force and effect must be given to it as well against the surety as the executor; and it cannot be questioned in an action upon the official bond of the executor. Idem, 257

8. In an action on the official bond of an executor against one of his sureties, to recover the amount of a decree against the executor rendered in favor of the trustee of a woman, the trustee is the proper relator in the action.
Calahan's adm'rs v. J. R. Depriest, trustee, 274

TAXATION BY COUNTIES, &c.

1. An act for the establishment of free schools, provides for the election of certain commissioners who are authorized to establish schools in the district and to levy taxes for their support. This is constitutional.
Bull & als. v. Read & als., 78

2. The commissioners being authorized to establish schools and levy taxes sufficient to defray the expenses thereof, they may build the necessary school-houses, and levy sufficient taxes to pay for them. Idem, 78

3. The act authorizes the commissioners to levy a capitation tax upon white male inhabitants, and an ad valorem tax upon the property of the district, 850 *sufficient to raise the amount necessary to defray the expense of the schools. The capitation tax may be levied upon the white male inhabitants above twenty-one years of age, only; and the ad valorem tax upon slaves may be upon slaves over twelve years of age, and valued each at three hundred dollars. And the ratio of the capitation to the ad valorem tax may be greater than that prescribed in the constitution, article 4, § 25. Idem, 78

4. The constitution of Virginia, article 4, § 22, 23, 25, in relation to taxation and finance, relates to taxation by the general assembly for purposes of state revenue, and do not apply to taxes, levies, &c., by counties, corporations, &c., for the local purposes of such bodies.
Gilkeson v. Frederick justices, 577

5. The general assembly has full power to authorize counties, municipal corporations and the like, to levy taxes within their bounds for their peculiar purposes. And the mode, subjects and extent of such taxation is not limited or regulated by the provisions of the constitution in relation to taxation and finance. Idem, 577

6. The act of June 7, 1852, Sess. Acts of 1852, p. 12, authorizing assessments in certain cases on the office of sheriffs and sergeants, is not in violation of the constitution. Idem, 577

7. An assessment of four hundred dollars upon the sheriff of Frederick county, laid on the 4th of October and to be paid on the 1st of February following, is not a violation of the act of 1852. Idem, 577

8. If the time of payment fixed by the court was inconsistent with the act, that would not render the assessment void; but it would be corrected as to the time of payment. Idem, 577

TAX SALES.

1. It is the duty of a County court, acting under the Code, ch. 37, § 15, p. 203, in relation to land sold for taxes, to admit the report of the surveyor to record, if it conforms to the act. And the court has no authority to enquire into the regularity or validity of the sale made by the sheriff.
Randolph justices v. Stalnaker, 523

2. The Circuit court may proceed by mandamus to compel the County court to admit the report of the surveyor to record. Idem, 523

2. On a bill filed by claimant of trust property sold, to recover it, the trustee is a necessary party. Idem, 228

3. Testator devises land and negroes to trustees for the use and benefit of his son A during his life, with the privilege that he may reside on said farm and have the use of said negroes, so far as may be necessary for his support and maintenance, and for the support and maintenance of his family; and at his death the property to be equally divided among his children. And he directs that the property shall not be liable for any debt which his son A might then or thereafter owe. Creditors of A not having recovered a judgment against him, cannot come into equity to subject the trust property, though the debts were contracted for necessaries for the support of the family.
Armstrong's adm'r & als. v. Pitts & als., 235

4. What sale of trust property is no breach of the trust. See Specific Performance, No. 4, and
Summers & al. v. Bean, 404

5. See Religious Congregations, passim, and Brooke & als. v. Shacklett, 301
Carter & als. v. Wolfe, 301

6. The trustee in a deed of trust to secure creditors without notice of a fraud, is a purchaser for value without notice.
Wickham and Goshorn v. Lewis Martin & Co., 427

7. A trustee in whose favor a decree against an executor has been rendered, is the proper relator in an action on the official bond of the executor, to recover the money.
Calahan's adm'rs v. J. R. Depriest, 274

8. A deed of trust to secure a debt is valid against the general creditors of the grantor after his death, though not recorded.
McCandlish v. Keen & als., 615
Same v. Coke's ex'or & als., 615

9. Though the recording the deed after the death of the grantor is not necessary to give it validity, yet it seems, if recording were necessary to give it validity, the recording after the death of the grantor would be sufficient. Idem, 615

10. The act, Code, ch. 131, § 3, p. 545, which declares that all the real estate of a party dying, which he has not subjected *by his will to the payment of his debts, shall be assets for the payment of debts in the order in which personal estate is to be applied, does not apply, except subject to the charge, to the real estate on which the debtor has created a bona fide lien which is good against himself. Idem, 615

11. See Assets, No. 6, and
Idem, 615

12. The act, Code, ch. 118, § 11, p. 509, in relation to the creditors and purchasers who shall be protected against unrecorded deeds, does not include creditors claiming under a devise for the payment of debts, or under the statute subjecting real estate to their payment. But the creditor who may avoid such a deed must have some lien by judgment or otherwise, which entitles him to charge the subject conveyed specifically.

USURY.

A principal obligor in a bond having been remiss in paying the interest upon it promptly, as he was required to do, on two occasions when he sent an agent to pay the interest due, directed him to pay the interest up to the period when the interest would next become due. This however was voluntary on his part, and not required by the obligee; but endorsements of the payments were made upon the bond. This is not usury; and is no ground of relief to the surety.
Harnsbarger's adm'r v. Kinney, 511

VENDOR AND PURCHASER.

1. The trustee in a deed of trust to secure debts, is a purchaser for value.
Wickham & Goshorn v. Lewis Martin & Co., 427

2. A sale of a reversion in real estate by a young man who had just arrived at the age of twenty-one years, there being no fraud or imposition on the part of the purchaser, and no confidential relations between the parties, will not be set aside for mere inadequacy of price.
Cribbins v. Markwood, 495

3. The English doctrine in relation to the sale of expectant interests, so far as it relates to vested interests, held not to be law in this state. Idem, 495

4. See Powers, and
Carrington v. Goddin, 587

5. A conveys real and personal property on a consideration of a sum of money and of an annuity for the life of the grantor, if she survives the grantee, from the death of the grantee; and in the deed the grantee covenants that his estate shall pay to the grantor if she survives him, the annuity.
1st. This does not create a charge upon the property conveyed, so as to entitle the grantor to subject the same to the payment of the annuity after the death of the grantee, in preference to other creditors of the grantee.
2d. The conveyance is in consideration of the covenant of the grantee that his estate shall pay the annuity; and the vendor's lien does not attach upon the property.
McCandlish v. Keen & als., 615
Same v. Coke's ex'or & als., 615

6. A case in which it was held from the nature of the property conveyed and of the consideration for it, a part of which was an annuity to be paid if the grantor survived the grantee, that the grantor did not retain a lien upon the property conveyed, for the payment of the annuity.

WILLS.

1. Testator made his will in 1842, purchased a tract of land in 1849, and died in 1852. His will in respect to this land, is to be construed as the law was prior to the Code of 1849.

Raines v. Barker & als., 128

2. The construction given to the act of 1785, authorizing the devise of after acquired lands, in the case of Allen v. Harrison, 3 Call 289, adhered to.

Idem, 128

3. A case in which it was held that a tract of land purchased after making the will, did not pass by it, although testator disposes of "the balance of his estate."

Idem, 128

4. Testatrix by her will, made when she possessed no real estate, gave two slaves to her daughter M, and six to her 852 *son S, and then says, "All the balance of my property of every description, real or personal, I give and bequeath to my son S;" but if her daughter had a child or children, three of the slaves given to S should go to them. Land afterwards acquired by the testatrix does not pass by the devise to S.

Gibson v. Carrell & als., 136

5. Testator devises lands, and charges that the devisee shall pay one-fourth of his debts. The charge prevents the running of the statute of limitations against a debt not barred at the death of the testator.

Baylor's lessee v. Dejarnette, 152

6. But the charge in the will does not revive a debt barred by the statute.

Tazewell's ex'or v. Whittle's adm'r, 329

7. The will of W having been made in 1746, before a survey or patent to him, the land embraced in said patent did not pass by his will, but descended to his heir at law.

9. The name of a testator at the commencement of an olograph will is an equivocal act, and unless it appears affirmatively from something on the face of the paper, that it was intended as a signature, it is not a sufficient signing under the statute. Code, ch. 122, § 4, p. 516.

Ramsey & als. v. Ramsey's ex'or, 664

10. A paper is propounded for probat to the County court of C, as the will of B, and is rejected on the ground that B was incompetent to make a will. Afterwards the paper is propounded for probat to the Circuit court of C, and that court, with the knowledge that it had been rejected in the County court, admits it to probat. The sentence of the County court is conclusive against the will, and the sentence of the Circuit court is a nullity.

2. In an action on a joint bond against the personal representative of a deceased obligor, a surviving obligor is an incompetent witness for the defendant.

Brown's adm'r v. Johnson, 644

Isbell's ex'or v. Johnson, 644

3. Where a witness is offered as competent on the ground, that though interested in favor of the party offering him, his interest is equal or greater the other way, this last interest must be as direct and immediate as the former. Idem, 644

4. In an action against one of two obligors in a bond, the interest of the other arising from his liability to the defendant for contribution, is more direct and immediate than his liability as obligor in the bond to the obligee; and he is therefore an incompetent witness for the defendant. Idem, 644

5. If the liability of one obligor in a bond is defeated on a ground not personal to himself, (as infancy, bankruptcy or death,) the liability of all the other obligors is at an end; and therefore one obligor is an incompetent witness for his co-obligor in an action on the bond. Idem, 644

DECIDED IN THE Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.

April Term, 1857, Richmond.

1. Negotiable Paper—Dishonored—Transfer of—Effect of Payment to Transferror.—Payment by the maker to the payee and endorser of a negotiable note, after it has been protested for non-payment, taken up by the payee and transferred by him to his creditor as collateral security for a larger debt, such payment being made without knowledge of the transfer, is not a good defence to an action brought on the note by the transferee and holder against the maker.

2. Same—Same—Payment by Endorser—Effect on Negotiability.†—Payment of a dishonored note by an endorser, does not extinguish its negotiability as to him and all parties liable thereon to him; though it discharges the liability of subsequent endorsers, whose liability will not be revived by his putting the note again in circulation.

3. Same—Overdue—Transfer of—Subject to Equities.‡—Where an over-due note is transferred, the holder takes it subject to all the defences and equities to which it was subject in the hands of his immediate endorser, whether or not he has any notice thereof: except that an accommodation note in his hands is not therefore invalid.

4. Same—Same—Same—Subject to What Equities—Quære.—Quære: If the equities to which such over-due note is subject, in the hands of the endorsee are or are not only such equities as attach to the note itself; as illegality or want of failure of consideration, *or a release or payment, or a counter claim agreed to be set off, which is equivalent to payment.

5. Same—Same—Same—Set-Off between Maker and Payee.§—A set-off as between the maker and the payee acquired after the transfer of an over-due note, though acquired without notice of the transfer of the note, cannot be set off against the holder.

6. Same—Same—Endorsement Passes Legal Title.‖—By the endorsement of negotiable notes, though after due, the legal title passes without notice to the maker. But in the case of transfers of choses in action not negotiable, only the equitable title passes, and the maker may make payments to the payee or obligee until he has notice of the transfer.

7. Same—Same.—Statute—Not Applicable.¶—The act, Code, ch. 144, § 14, p. 583, in relation to suits by assignees does not apply to negotiable paper, though such paper has been transferred after due.

8. Same—Pleading and Practice—Variance between Declaration and Note—How Taken Advantage of.*—The declaration on a negotiable note, states the

Negotiable Paper—Dishonored—Transfer of—Effect of Payment to Transferror.—The proposition of the principal case, that off-sets acquired or payments made after the endorsement of an overdue note, though the off-sets were acquired or payments made before notice of the endorsement, constitute no defence as against the endorsee, was approved in Smith v. Lawson, 18 W. Va. 224, 225.

Same—Pre-Existing Debt—Valid Consideration.—It will be conceded on all hands, that a pre-existing debt is a valid consideration for the pledge of a negotiable note, as of any other property. These words used by JUDGE MONCURE in the principal case were approved in Cammack v. Soran, 30 Gratt. 295. See also, foot-note to Cammack v. Soran, 30 Gratt. 292, where authority in points are collected.

†Same—Dishonored—Payment by Endorser—Effect on Negotiability.—See Smith v. Lawson, 18 W. Va. 212.

‡Same—Overdue—Transfer of—Subject to Equities.—It seems well established that, where an overdue negotiable note is transferred, the holder takes it subject to all the defence and equities to which it was subject in the hands of his immediate endorser, whether he had notice thereof or not. The principal case is cited in Arents v. Com., 18 Gratt. 758, 779; Cottrell v. Watkins, 89 Va. 811, 812, 17 S. E. Rep. 328; Karn v. Blackford (Va.), 20 S. E. Rep. 149, as authorizing the proposition. §Same—Same—Same—Set-Off between Maker and Payee.—Exchange Bank v. Knox, 19 Gratt. 747, says: "It is a principle of law, too well settled to admit of doubt or argument now, that a set-off as between original parties, acquired after the assignment for a bona fide purpose, of the subject in controversy and notice thereof, cannot be set off against a holder for value. 12 Johnson R. 343; 1 John. ‖Same—Same—Endorsement Passes Legal Title.—Endorsement of a dishonored negotiable instrument passes the legal title without notice to the maker; for such notes are still negotiable. ¶Non-Negotiable Paper—Assignment of—Effect of Statute.—Bentley v. Fire Ins. Co., 40 W. Va. 729, 23 S. E. Rep. 585, and Bantz v. Basnett, 12 W. Va. 779, 780, cite the principal case as authorizing the proposition that, though the statute changed the common-law principle that choses in action, not negotiable, could not be assigned, and validated such assignments, and gave the assignee an action in his own name, the assignee has only equitable title, and the assignor retains legal title. endorsement and delivery as at the time of the making; and the proof is that the delivery was after the note fell due: this is no variance: and if it was, could only be taken advantage of at the trial by a motion to exclude the evidence, or to instruct the jury to disregard it.

9. Instructions—Weight of Evidence—Case at Bar.††—Where the plaintiff's case is clearly made out, and the only question is whether the defendant has made out a good defence; it is not deciding upon the weight of evidence to instruct the jury upon the assumption of the facts as true, which the evidence tended to prove if they believe it, that the defence is not sufficient; if the instruction itself is correct.

This was an action of debt in the Circuit court of Essex county, brought by Miller & Mayhew against R. M. Davis, to recover the amount of a note for six hundred and ninety-four dollars and seventy-five cents, payable six months after date, at the Exchange Bank at Richmond. The declaration was in the common form. The note was executed by Davis to Edward L. Fant & Co., and was endorsed by them to the plaintiffs after it fell due.

The defendant pleaded nil debet; and payment before notice of assignment: on which issue was joined. On the trial it was proved that the note was regularly protested for non-payment, on the 31st of July 1850, at the Exchange Bank in Richmond, and was returned to the Merchants Bank of Baltimore, where it was 3 *taken up by Fant & Co. on the 6th of August, with money advanced to them by the plaintiffs; and when Fant & Co. had thus gotten possession of the note, they assigned it to the plaintiffs as a security for a large debt which they then owed and still owe to the plaintiffs. Of this assignment Miller & Mayhew sent the defendant a notice; but he did not receive it until after the 9th of August; on which day he paid the amount of the note to Fant & Co. and took their receipt.

When all the evidence had been introduced, the plaintiffs moved the court to instruct the jury, that upon the facts which the evidence tended to prove, if they believed it, the receipt from E. L. Fant & Co. to the defendant, constituted no sufficient defence against the action of the plaintiffs in this cause. Which instruction the court gave. There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiffs; and the defendant applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was allowed.

Morson, for the appellant, insisted:

1st. That the declaration being in the common form of an endorsee against the maker, upon an endorsement before the note was due, it was not sustained by the evidence, which showed the transfer to the plaintiffs after it was due, and had been taken up by Fant & Co. And he insisted that the plaintiffs should have stated their case specially. He referred to Bank of U. States v. Jackson's adm'x, 9 Leigh 221.

2d. That the plaintiffs having taken the note after it was due, and after it had been retired by the parties who held it at the time it was dishonored, it was open to all the defences to which paper not negotiable was open. 2 Rob. Pr. 251; 1 Parsons on Cont. 213, 216, 217, and note. That the note having been taken as a collateral security, the plaintiffs were not holders for value. Prentice & Weissenger v. Zane,
4 2 Gratt. 262; and therefore *on both grounds the defendant having paid the note without notice of its transfer, the payment was valid, and protected him.

Griswold, for the appellees, insisted:

1st. That after a general verdict, the objection taken to the form of the declaration cannot be sustained. 2 Tucker's Com., book 3, p. 304-310; Chitty on Bills 360; Young v. Wright, 1 Camp. 2d. That although the endorsee of a note past due when taken, takes it subject to the equities of the maker, yet the equities of which the maker may avail himself are only equities inherent in the note at the time of the transfer. 1 Parsons on Cont. 214, 215, 216, and the cases in the notes; Whitehead v. ††Instructions—Weight of Evidence.—In R. & D. R. Co. v. Noell, 86 Va. 24, 9 S. E. Rep. 473, the court said: "It is a fundamental maxim that the court responds to questions of law, and the jury to questions of fact. The court must decide on the admissibility of evidence, that being a question of law; but not as to its weight after it is admitted, that being a question of fact; and the decided cases, says Mr. Conway Robinson, evince a zealous care to watch over and protect the legitimate powers of a jury. They show that the court must be very careful not to overstep the line which separates law from fact. They establish the doctrine that when the evidence is parol any opinion as to the weight, effect, or sufficiency of the evidence submitted to the jury, any assumption of a fact as proved, will be an invasion of the province of the jury. 1 Rob. MONCURE, J. Several questions arise in this case. I will consider in the first place the main one, which is:

Whether payment made by the maker to the payee or endorser of a negotiable note, after it has been protested for non-payment, taken up by the latter, and transferred by him to a creditor as collateral security of a larger debt, such payment being made without knowledge of the transfer, is 5 a good defence to an action *brought on the note by the transferee and holder against the maker?

A negotiable note may be transferred at any time while it remains a good, subsisting, unpaid note, whether before or after it has arrived at maturity; Story on Prom. Notes, § 178; and in the latter case, even though it be protested for non-payment and bear upon its face the marks of its dishonor. Payment of a dishonored note by an endorser does not extinguish its negotiability as to him and all parties liable thereon to him; though it discharges the liability of subsequent endorsers, whose liability will not be revived by his putting the note again in circulation. Beck v. Robley, reported in a note to 1 H. Bl. 89, is perfectly consistent with this. Blake v. Sewall, 3 Mass. R. 556; and Boylston v. Greene, 8 Id. 465, in which it was held that a note once paid by a party to it, ceases to be negotiable, were founded on a misapprehension of what was decided in Beck v. Robley; and were overruled in Guild v. Eager, &c., 17 Id. 615, which conforms to Gomez Serra v. Berkeley, 1 Wils. R. 46, and Callow v. Lawrence, 3 Maule & Sel. 95; as indeed do all the cases on the subject which I have seen, except the two cited supra from 3 and 8 Mass. See 2 Rob. Pr. new ed. 235–6.

But though a negotiable note may be transferred as well after as before it becomes due, the rights of the endorsee are very different in the two cases. 2 Rob. Pr. new ed. 252. In the case of a transfer of a note before it becomes due to a bona fide holder for value, he takes it free of all equities between the antecedent parties of which he has no notice: and it has been held that even gross negligence would not alone deprive him of his right. He thus often acquires a better right than that of the endorser under whom he claims. In the case of a transfer of an over-due note, the holder takes it as a dishonored
6 note, subject to all *the defences and equities to which it was subject in the hands of his immediate endorser, whether he has any notice thereof or not: He receives nothing but the title and rights of such endorser. An exception exists in the case of an accommodation note, which is said, in general, to be governed by the same rules as negotiable paper for consideration. So that a bona fide endorsee of such a note, whether before or after maturity, and though knowing it to be an accommodation note, may enforce it against the prior parties. In that case an endorsee of an over-due note acquires a right, though the endorser under whom he claims has none. Sturtevant v. Ford, 43 Eng. C. L. R. 61; Carruthers v. West, 63 Id. 143; Story on Prom. Notes, § 178; 1 Parsons on Contracts 213–217.

But what is the nature of the equities subject to which an endorsee of an over-due note takes it? Are they only such equities as attach to the note itself; as illegality or want or failure of consideration, or a release or payment, or a counter claim agreed to be set off (which is equivalent to a payment)? Or do they embrace also claims arising out of collateral matters, such as a general set-off? On this subject there is much contrariety of decision. In England it was decided in Bronaugh v. Moss, 10 Barn. & Cress. 558, 21 Eng. C. L. R. 128, that the endorsee of an over-due bill or note is liable to such equities only as attach on the bill or note itself; and not to claims arising out of collateral matters, such as a general set-off is. This is a leading case, and has since been uniformly followed in that country. Stein, &c. v. Yglesias, &c., 1 Cromp. Mees. & Ros. 565; Whitehead v. Walker, 10 Mees. & Welsb. 696. In the latter case it was averred in the plea that the endorsee received the bill with notice of the set-off; and yet it was held to be no defence. Parke, B., said, "If the note be released or discharged, the plaintiff, under such circumstances, cannot make a 7 *title to it. But a set-off is not an equity; it is a mere collateral matter; it is a right to set off a cross demand against the plaintiffs' cause of action, which was introduced to prevent a multiplicity of actions." Alderson, B., said, "If the doctrine advanced on the defendant's part were correct, no one would be able to tell whether certain instruments were negotiable or not; for their negotiability would depend on the will of a third person. No one could tell whether the maker would set off his claim against the prior party or not: if he will not, the bill is negotiable, otherwise it is not." In a very recent case decided by the Court of exchequer, Oulds v. Harrison, 28 Eng. L. & E. R. 524, it was held that the right of an endorsee of an over-due bill of exchange to sue the acceptor, is not defeated by the existence of a debt due from the drawer to the acceptor, and notice by the latter to the drawer before endorsement, of his election to set off the amount against the bill; nor is the endorsee affected by the existence of a right of set-off as between the acceptor and the drawer, although the bill was endorsed without value and for the purpose of defeating the set-off. Parke, B., delivering the judgment of the court, said, "although the plaintiff gave no value, the bill is transferred to him by endorsement, and he has a right to sue upon it as much as any endorsee who is the holder for value. There is, therefore, no defect in his title on that account. The only question then is, Does the supposed fraud vitiate the title, and in what way?" "We think it is no fraud. The holder is under no legal obligation to allow the debt to be set off against the claim on the bill, unless he has entered into a contract to that effect with the defendant. We think this contract would create an equity in favor of the defendant, or attach to an over-due bill." "It is wholly contingent whether the defendant will have a debt due to him from the plaintiff when the bill is sued on; and 8 *if there be, whether the defendant will choose to plead a set-off."

The doctrine of Bronaugh v. Moss has been recognized and followed, I believe, in most of the states of the Union in which the question has come up for adjudication. See the cases cited in note (c), 1 Parsons on Contracts 215; and in 2 Rob. Pr. new ed. 253. In Massachusetts and South Carolina all set-offs between the original parties existing at the time of the transfer of the title, are allowed: So in Maine; and so also in North Carolina. Id. In New York the course of decision has fluctuated; and the point was considered doubtful in Miner v. Hoyt, 4 Hill's R. 193, 197. In this state there has been no decision on the subject.

But whatever conflict of authority there may be upon the question, whether the equities, subject to which an endorsee takes an over-due negotiable note, embrace set-offs in favor of the maker against the payee, existing at the time of the endorsement, I have been able to find no case in which it was held, or even said, that set-offs between those parties, arising or acquired after the endorsement, even though without notice thereof, are good against the endorsee. On the contrary, it was expressly decided in Baxter v. Little, &c., 6 Metc. R. 7, that they are not. Shaw, C. J., in his able opinion, said, "A note does not cease to be negotiable, because it is over due. The promisee by his endorsement may still give a good title to the endorsee. Notes or other matters of set-off acquired by the defendant against the promisee after such transfer, cannot be given in evidence in defence to such note, although the maker had no notice of such transfer at the time of acquiring his demand against the promisee." The endorsee of a note over due takes a legal title; but he takes it with notice on its face that it is discredited, and therefore subject to all payments, and offsets in the nature of payment. The ground is, that 9 *by this fact he is put upon enquiry, and therefore he shall be bound by all existing facts, of which enquiry and true information would apprise him; but these could only apprise him of demands then acquired by the maker against the payee." These views, I think, are sound; and conclusively show that if set-offs between the prior parties are admissible defences at all against the endorsee of an over-due negotiable note; only such are admissible as existed at the time of the endorsement.

Then, are payments made to the endorser after the endorsement of an over-due negotiable note, but without notice thereof, good defences to an action brought on the note by the endorsee? They seem to stand on the same footing with after-acquired set-offs, if set-offs between the original parties be admissible defences at all against the endorser; and Shaw, C. J., treats them as standing upon the same footing, in his opinion in the case last cited. Speaking of the maker of the note, he says "Having made his promise negotiable, he is liable to any bona fide holder and actual endorsee; and therefore even after the note has become due, in making payments to the original promisee, or in further dealings by which he gives him a credit, he has no right to presume, without proof, that the promisee is still the holder of the note. Besides, in case of payment of a negotiable note, or of a credit which the maker intends shall operate by way of payment, he has a right to have his note given up, if paid in full, or to see the payment endorsed if partial. Should he insist on this right, in the case proposed, he would at once perceive that the person to whom he is making payment or giving credit, is no longer the holder of the note."

It was said by the counsel for the plaintiff in error, that no case can be found in which it has been decided that payment to the endorser of an over-due negotiable
10 *note without notice of the endorsement, is not a good defence to an action brought by the endorsee against the maker. This I believe to be true: At least I have been able to find no such case; and the court has been referred to none by the counsel for the defendants in error. The case cited from 6 Metc. R. 7, was referred to by him. But what is said on the subject in that case by Shaw, C. J., though I think very sound, is yet obiter dictum, and not a judicial decision of the question. On the other hand, however, it may be answered, that no case can be found in which it has been decided, or even said, that payment to an endorser after the endorsement is a good defence against the endorsee. That no decision can be found the other way, may well be accounted for by the fact that payment of a negotiable note is very rarely made without taking in the note, or having the payment, if partial, endorsed thereon; and no occasion has therefore occurred for a decision of the question. That no such occasion has occurred, is itself an argument in favor of the defendants in error.

But in the absence of express authority, I think the question, upon principle, is quite a plain one. The law merchant, which is a part of our law, has made certain paper negotiable. The payee or person legally entitled to it may pass the legal title to another: and the title of that other is just as perfect as if he had been the original payee; or just as perfect as would be his title to any other kind of property legally transferred to him. It follows, that after the transfer, payment can only be made to him; and if made to another, would be a payment in the payer's own wrong or at his own risk. To say that a payment made to the endorser without notice of the transfer is a good payment, is to beg the question. It is in effect to say that such notice is necessary to pass the legal title. If it were necessary to pass the legal title, 11 then it would *follow that payment to the endorser before notice of the endorsement, would be a good defence against the endorsee. But if it be not necessary to pass the legal title, then it follows, I think as clearly, that such a payment is not a good defence against the endorsee. Payment can only be made to the person who is invested with the legal title; and the common law rule of caveat emptor by analogy applies to the case. For though a maker of a negotiable note in making a payment cannot be said to be a purchaser, yet there is at least as much reason for holding him responsible for want of caution in making a payment, as for holding a purchaser responsible for want of caution in making a purchase. Indeed there is more. For due caution will always protect the former against an improper payment; while the greatest caution may not protect the latter against an improper purchase. The former is always safe in making payment to the legal holder of the note, which he may thereupon require to be produced and surrendered to him; while the latter is often deceived by a false possession, and must at his peril look to the title, which may be separate from the possession. See Wheeler v. Guild, 20 Pick. R. 545, 553.

Let us now enquire what is necessary to a transfer of the legal title to a negotiable note, and whether notice to the maker or any other party is required. On this subject the authorities speak plainly and uniformly. A negotiable note is made payable to the payee or order. If no such order be made, payment must of course be made to the payee. If such order be made, payment must be made accordingly, by the very terms of the note. It then stands as a note payable to the person to whom it is ordered to be paid by the payee. How is the order to be made? By the practice of merchants it is made by endorsement on the note; which may be either in full or in blank: and when made, the note must be delivered to the endorsee;
12 *such delivery being necessary to a valid endorsement. 1 Parsons on Contracts 205; Emmet v. Tottenham, 20 Eng. L. & E. 348; Sairsbury v. Parkinson, Id. 351. Endorsement and delivery with intent to pass the property, is a complete transfer of the legal title. Lloyd v. Howard, 69 Eng. C. L. R. 995. If the payee endorse the note in blank, that is, merely endorse his name upon it, the legal title may be transferred from one to another, ad infinitum, by mere delivery with intent to pass the title. Thus it is seen that notice of the endorsement to the maker, is not a necessary ingredient in a valid transfer of title to a negotiable note. The maker, in contemplation of law, is supposed already to have notice. When a negotiable note is endorsed by the payee, it assumes the nature of an accepted bill of exchange; the endorser being the drawer, the maker the acceptor, and the endorsee the payee of the bill. The maker, having made the note payable to order, has accepted this bill in advance. And to require notice to the maker in order to a valid endorsement of a negotiable note, would be like requiring notice to the acceptor in order to a valid drawing of a bill of exchange. Reynolds v. Davies, 1 Bos. & Pul. 625.

There is a material distinction in regard to notice, between a negotiable note, and choses in action not negotiable. "In the latter case (says Shaw, C. J., in the case before cited from 6 Metc. R. 7), notice of the assignment must be given by the assignee to the debtor to prevent him from making payment to the assignor. Without such notice, he has no reason to presume that the original creditor is not still his creditor; and payment to him is according to his contract, and in the due and ordinary course of business. The assignee takes an equitable interest only, which must be enforced in the name of the assignor; and until notice, he has no equity against 13 the debtor which can be *recognized and protected by a court of law or equity." A negotiable note, by its very nature and terms, is designed for circulation in the mercantile world. Its negotiation by mere endorsement and delivery, or by delivery only, is in the usual course of business. Choses in action not negotiable, are not designed for circulation. They may be assigned in equity; but not so as to prejudice the debtor; who until he receives notice of the assignment, may safely make payments to the original creditor.

The Code, ch. 144, § 14, 583, declares that "the assignee of any bond, note or writing not negotiable, may mantain thereupon any action in his own name, which the original obligee or payee might have brought; but shall allow all just discounts not only against himself, but against the assignor before the defendant had notice of the assignment." This section is the same in effect with 1 Rev. Code, ch. 126, § 5, p. 484. It applies only to writings not negotiable; and its only effect is to authorize the assignee of such writings to sue at law in his own name. The legal title still remains in the assignor, in whose name the suit at law may be brought. This section can, by no just rule of construction, be extended to negotiable notes, whether before or after maturity; for in either case they are negotiable. They are not only not embraced, but are expressly excluded by the words of the section. "It were better, perhaps (as was said by Parker, C. J., in Sargent v. Southgate, 5 Pick. R. 312, 319), that dishonored notes should not be negotiable, but assignable only." It has been long settled, however, that they are negotiable; and it belongs to the legislature alone to make them assignable only, if it be better that they should be so. That has not yet been done.

There is no necessity for notice to the maker, of an endorsement of a negotiable note, in order to protect him against loss occasioned by making payment to a 14 *person not entitled to the note. If he sustain such loss, it can only be the result of his own gross laches. He may discharge himself by payment to any person, who is in possession of the note with an apparent lawful right of ownership, unless he has notice that such person is not actually entitled. Though if an endorsement be necessary to give that person a title, the maker, before he can safely pay it, is bound to ascertain if the endorsement is genuine; and, if the endorsement be to a particular person, that the person producing it is the identical person. Story on Prom. Notes, § 113. He is not bound to pay the note, unless it be produced and surrendered to him on payment. It is not sufficient to show that the note has been lost or even destroyed, or that it has become over due; for he has a right to it as his voucher of payment and as his security against any future claim or demand thereof. Id. § 107. If it be lost or destroyed, whether at the time of the loss or destruction it was over due or not, he is not liable to be sued at law, but only in equity, which, in granting relief, can at the same time require ample indemnity. Id. § 108. These doctrines seem to be well settled in England, and have not been questioned in this state. 2 Rob. Pr. new ed. 219-222.

Then the remaining enquiry upon this branch of the subject is, Whether the defendants in error, to whom the note was delivered by the payees as collateral security of a larger debt, are such bona fide holders as are entitled to enforce the note against the maker notwithstanding its payment by him to the payees after such delivery, though without actual knowledge thereof?

There is perhaps no question connected with the mercantile law which is of more importance, and upon which, at the same time, there is a more distressing conflict of authority than the question, whether a holder of a negotiable note received as 15 collateral security *of a pre-existing debt, is such a bona fide holder as to be free of all equities existing against the note in the hands of the person from whom he received it. The affirmative of the proposition, it seems, is maintained by the decisions in England, of the Supreme court of the United States, in Massachusetts, and in some other states; also by Judge Story in his Treatise on Promissory Notes, § 195. While the negative is maintained in New York, Pennsylvania, and other states. See the cases, or most of them, collected in 2 Rob. Pr. new ed. 249-251. In this state, Prentice, &c. v. Zane, 2 Gratt. 262, is the only case which bears upon the subject, and seems to have been based upon the supposed correctness of the negative side of the proposition; though the case is not referred to in the work last cited. The note in that case was made in Philadelphia; and the decision conformed to the well settled law of the place of the contract. Whether the case would have been decided in the same way if the note had been a Virginia contract, is uncertain. The question may therefore be considered as still unsettled in this state.

But I deem it unnecessary to express any opinion upon the vexed question in this case; in which it may be conceded, pro hac vice, that the negative side of the proposition is correct, and that a holder of a negotiable note as collateral security, holds it subject to the equities existing against it at the time it was received by him. The holders in this case stand in that plight, because the note was over due and dishonored when it came to their hands. That it came to their hands as collateral security of a debt, can place them on no lower ground: though it would have placed them on that ground (on the concession above made), if they had received it before its maturity. The negative of the proposition is based upon this; not that the holder of a note as collateral security is not a holder for 16 value, *in the common law meaning of the word, but that he did not take it "in the usual course of trade," according to the language of the mercantile law; and the only consequence is, that he takes it as the person from whom he received held it. He takes the legal title, if that person held the legal title. It will be conceded on all hands, I presume, that a pre-existing debt is a valid consideration for the pledge of a negotiable note as of any other property. The endorsee of a note so received can maintain an action upon it, not only against the maker but the endorser. He could not maintain an action against the endorser, if he were not an endorsee for value. A mortgagee of property as collateral security of a pre-existing debt, is a purchaser for value, in the meaning of the registry laws. I am of opinion, therefore, that the defendants in error are bona fide holders for value of the negotiable note in question, and that payment by the maker to the endorser after he had transferred the title to the holders, is not a good defence to the action of the latter against the maker.

Indeed, it might perhaps be maintained that valuable consideration is not necessary to protect a bona fide endorsee of a negotiable note against a subsequent payment by the maker to the endorser. Valuable consideration is not necessary to a valid transfer of a negotiable note; which may be the subject of a gift, either inter vivos, or mortis causa. In Milnes v. Dawson, 5 Welsb. Hurl. & Gord. 948, it was held that payment by the acceptor to the drawer of a bill of exchange, after the latter had endorsed it without value to the endorsee, was not a good defence to an action by the endorsee against the acceptor of the bill. "It would be altogether inconsistent with the negotiability of these instruments (said Parke, B.), to hold, that after the endorser has transferred the property in the instrument, he may, by receiving the 17 amount of it, affect *the right of his endorsee." "A bill of exchange is a chattel, and the gift is complete by delivery coupled with the intention to give." It did not appear in that case that the endorsement took place after the bill had become due and payable; and Baron Parke said it was not to be so inferred, though the counsel for the defendant contended that it was. But I do not see that the question was at all material. The legal title to negotiable paper may be transferred without value, whether before or after maturity; and in either case, the endorsee takes it subject to all equities then existing, but not to matters of defence accruing afterwards between the prior parties. The endorsee may sue in his own name as in other cases; but he cannot sue the donor, though he be an endorser, there being no consideration to support the action, which is founded on privity of contract. As to the donor, the endorsement, if it be a contract, is an executory contract, and requires a valuable consideration to support it. As to the prior parties, it is an executed contract, and valid without consideration. More properly speaking, it is no contract at all, but an executed gift. If the transfer be merely colorable, of course any defence may be made to the suit which could be made to it, if it were in the name of the party really entitled. I deem it unnecessary, however, to decide in this case, whether the defence set up would have been a good one if the transfer of the note to the defendants in error had not been for valuable consideration; being of opinion that it was.

It will be observed, that in the foregoing views I have not adverted to the fact that the defendants in error had an interest in the payment of the note to the Merchants Bank, in Baltimore, and therefore furnished the payees with the money for that purpose, by discounting another note for them, nor to the fact that a day or two after the note was taken up and transferred 18 *by the payees to the defendants in error, to wit, on the 7th of August 1850, the latter wrote to the plaintiff in error informing him of the transfer, and requesting payment to be made to them or their order; which letter, however, in consequence of his absence from home, was not received before the latter part of that month. I have not adverted to these facts, because I considered that without them the case is in favor of the defendants in error, and I did not wish to encumber it unnecessarily. I have viewed it in the aspect most favorable to the plaintiff in error.

Before I leave this branch of the subject, it is proper to advert to the manner in which the note in this case is made negotiable. Promissory notes, though payable to order, were not, it seems, negotiable at common law, but were made negotiable in England by statute 3 and 4 Ann, c. 9. That statute was never in force in Virginia. But statutes have from time to time been passed, some of which were in force when the note in this case was executed, placing notes negotiable at a bank, or office of discount and deposit of a bank, in the state, on the same footing as foreign bills of exchange; and now by the Code, c. 144, § 7, p. 581 (which, however, though enacted before, did not go into effect until after the execution of the said note), it is declared that every promissory note for money payable in this state at a particular bank, &c. shall be deemed negotiable. See 2 Rob. Pr. new ed. 172. The note in this case was made "negotiable and payable at the Exchange Bank at Richmond, Virginia," and so was a negotiable note by the operation of a statute then in force. Sess. Acts 1836-7, p. 66, § 6. Being a negotiable note, it is subject to all the rules of the mercantile law in regard to negotiable paper.

Having disposed of the main question in the case, it is now necessary to notice the remaining questions, which I will do very briefly.

19 *The first of these is, Whether there is a fatal variance between the allegations and the proofs, in this, that the declaration avers that the note was endorsed to the defendants in error on the day of its execution, while the evidence shows that it was transferred to them after it was dishonored? I do not see how this question can be raised in this case. It might have been raised in the Circuit court by a motion to exclude the evidence. No such motion was made. The only question which can now be raised is as to the correctness of the instruction given by the Circuit court, that upon the facts which the evidence tended to prove, if believed by the jury, the receipt constituted no sufficient defence to the action. The truth of that proposition is unaffected by the question of variance. But if the question could now be raised, I am of opinion that there is no such variance. While a declaration must, in general, state a time when every material fact happened (at least that was the rule before the Code took effect), it is not generally necessary that the time should be stated truly, unless it constitute a material part of the contract declared upon, or unless the date of a written instrument is professed to be described. 1 Chitt. Pl. 257. The general if not the universal practice is to state endorsements of a negotiable note as having been made at the time of its execution. After setting out the execution of the note, the endorsements are concisely stated as follows: "And the said B then and there endorsed and delivered the said note to the said C; and the said C then and there endorsed and delivered the said note to D." But it is argued, that where the note is transferred to the plaintiff after its maturity, that fact constitutes a material part of the contract under which he claims, and should therefore be stated in the declaration. It has never been decided that there is any difference in the mode of stating endorsements made

20 before and after *maturity; or that in the latter case the endorsements should be stated as having been made after maturity. On the contrary, where an endorsement of a bill was stated in the declaration to have been made before the bill became due, but appeared in evidence to have been made afterwards, this was held not to be a material variance. Young v. Wright, 1 Camp. R. 139. In a suit against the maker of a negotiable note, the endorsements are merely stated, not as parts of the defendant's contract, but to show the plaintiff's title to sue upon that contract. The note being negotiable until paid, that title is complete, whether the endorsements be before or after maturity. If the endorsements be not made in the usual course of business—as for example if they be made after the note is dishonored—the defendant is thereby let in to certain defences which he would not otherwise be allowed to make. But all this is matter of defence, and must come from the defendant. The law presumes, in the absence of proof, that endorsements are made before maturity; because that is the usual course of business. But the presumption may be repelled by proof. The holder of a note which comes to him after it is dishonored, may, like any other holder, sue as endorsee of any person who may have endorsed the note in blank, whether immediately or remotely; in the latter case, striking out the intermediate endorsements, whether special or in blank. If he sue as endorsee of one who endorsed it before maturity, the endorsement would be truly stated as made before maturity. And yet the defendant would be entitled to show in his defence that the note came to the plaintiff after it was due, and subject to certain equities which attached to it in the hands of the person from whom he received it.

The case of Bank U. States v. Jackson's adm'x, 9 Leigh 221, was cited and much relied upon by the counsel for the plaintiffs in error to show that the variance 21 *in question is fatal. But I do not think that it can have that effect. That was a suit by endorsees, not against the maker, but the endorser, not of a negotiable note, but a note not negotiable by the law of Virginia. The contract of the endorser was special and peculiar, and could only be declared on specially. There was a demurrer to the declaration and a special verdict. The court held the special counts to be bad on demurrer, or unsupported by the facts found by the verdict. The difference between that case and this is, I think, sufficiently obvious, without further remark.

The next question is, Whether the court instructed the jury as to the weight of the evidence? The plaintiffs, to sustain their action, offered in evidence the note in the declaration mentioned, and there rested. This evidence, standing alone, would have been sufficient for the purpose. Thereupon the defendant offered in evidence a receipt of the payees, dated August 9, 1850, for the amount of the note. This receipt, standing alone, was not a sufficient defence to the action. The legal presumption in that state of the case was, that the note had been endorsed to the plaintiffs for value before it was dishonored. To counteract this presumption and complete the defence, the deposition of Hawkins was introduced by the defendant, to prove that the note was transferred to the plaintiffs after it was dishonored, though before the date of the receipt, to wit, on or before the 7th of August 1850, and as collateral security of a debt, instead of for value received at the time of the transfer. The evidence tends to prove no other facts, favorable to the defendant, than these. The question then arose, whether the receipt, taken in connection with these facts, if the jury believed them to be proved, constituted a sufficient defence to the action; and the court instructed the jury that it did not. I see no error in this instruction. It expressly refers the weight of the evidence offered to 22 *prove the facts to the determination of the jury. The instruction was not as to the sufficiency of the evidence to prove the facts, but as to the sufficiency of the facts (if believed by the jury to be proved) to constitute a defence to the action. It was the province of the jury to decide as to the former; but of the court, if invoked for the purpose, to decide as to the latter. It would have been more regular perhaps if the court had instructed the jury that if they believed from the evidence that the note was transferred to the plaintiffs before the date of the receipt, though after the note was dishonored, and as collateral security of a pre-existing debt, then the receipt constituted no sufficient defence to the action. But as there is no conflict in the evidence and no uncertainty as to the facts which it tended to prove; and as upon those facts, viewing the evidence most favorably for the defendant, the receipt is no sufficient defence to the action, I think the instruction is substantially unobjectionable. It is certainly more so than was the instruction in Pleasants v. Pendleton, 6 Rand. 473; which, however, was sustained by this court.

The remaining question is, Whether "there is error in the verdict and judgment, because the costs of protest are found against the defendant, while there was no sufficient legal evidence of the fact of protest before the jury?" This question might have been raised in the Circuit court by a motion for an instruction framed for the purpose; or by a motion for a new trial. But it was not: and it cannot be now raised in this court. If it had been raised in the Circuit court by a motion for an instruction, the evidence of protest might have been thereupon supplied. Non constat that such was not the case. The evidence was not in when the exception was taken to the instruction given in regard to the receipt; but it might have been offered afterwards.

The receipt itself shows that the note

23 was *protested. If the question had been raised by a motion for a new trial, the error in the verdict, if any, could and would have been cured by a release. It is a general rule, that questions not raised in the court below, cannot for the first time be raised in this court. That rule emphatically applies to a question of this kind.

I think there is no error in the judgment, and that it ought to be affirmed.

April Term, 1857, Richmond.

1. Pleading and Practice—Variance between Declaration and Bond Declared on—Demurrer without Craving Oyer—Effect.—A declaration on an indemnifying bond in the name of the administrator de bonis non of the high sheriff, sets out the bond as made to himself: and without craving oyer of the bond, the defendants demur. As there is enough in the declaration to enable the court to proceed to judgment according to law and the very right of the cause, the demurrer should be overruled.
2. Same—Same—How Advantage Taken.—To take advantage by demurrer of a variance between the declaration and the bond declared on, the defendant should crave oyer of the bond.
3. Indemnifying Bonds—Statute Limiting Actions on—Prospective.†—The proviso in the act of February 28, 1828, Sup. Rev. Code 272, § 1, limiting actions on indemnifying bonds to seven years, does not apply to an action on a bond executed prior to the passage of the act.‡
4. Pleading and Practice—Immaterial Issues—Judgment Non Obstante Veredicto.—The court may refuse to receive a plea which presents an immaterial issue, or may strike it out if it has been filed, or may either during the progress of the trial or after verdict, set aside the issue, or in a proper case render judgment notwithstanding the verdict.
5. Statutes—Prospective.§—Though the legislature may have authority to make a law to operate retroactively, yet it must clearly appear that such was the intention.

This was an action of debt on an indemnifying bond in the Circuit court of Henrico county, instituted in July 1847 by Benjamin J. Duval, adm'r de bonis non, &c. of Mosby Sheppard deceased, who sued for the benefit of John and Benjamin Sheppard, against James Malone and Richard H. Whitlock, the obligors in the bond. This bond 25 was taken in December 1827, to *indemnify Mosby Sheppard, the high sheriff of the county, for any injury or loss he might sustain by the levy of an execution then in his hands, sued out by James Malone against the goods and chattels of Benjamin Haley, upon four slaves as the property of Haley, which were claimed by John and Benjamin Sheppard. The proceedings in the suit, and the questions arising in it, are stated by Judge Samuels in his opinion. There was a judgment for the defendants: and the plaintiff applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was allowed.

SAMUELS, J. The printed record of this case, although of small volume, is taken up, in a great degree, with extraneous matter. The portions properly belonging to the record are very confusedly copied; the proper order of their sequence inverted; and we are left to ascertain what is the true record, by searching through the mass of extraneous matter for its detached parts, and putting them in their proper order.

By subjecting the record to this process, it appears, that on the 3d day of December 1827, Mosby Sheppard, sheriff of Henrico county, acting under the statute 1 Rev. ch. 134, § 25, p. 533, took from the defendants an indemnifying bond in conformity with the provisions of that statute. That suit was brought on this bond July 21st, 1847, in the name of Benjamin J. Duval, adminfstrator de bonis non of Mosby Sheppard, at the relation of John Sheppard and Benjamin Sheppard. That the defendants demurred to the declaration. That they at different times filed pleas, that they had performed the conditions of the bond, and the plea of non damnificatus; and they also tendered a plea that the cause of ac- 26 tion did not accrue *within seven years before the institution of the suit. The plaintiff objected to the reception †Indemnifying Bonds.—See generally, monographic note on "Statutory Bonds" appended to Goolsby v. Strother, 21 Gratt. 107.

‡The act, after directing that an addition shall be made to the condition of an indemnifying bond, says: "Provided, that no suit shall be maintained upon an indemnifying bond taken in pursuance of this or the before-recited act, unless the same be commenced within seven years after the date of such bond; saving to infants, femes covert and persons non compos mentis, three years after their respective disabilities shall have ceased."

§Statutes—Prospective.—It is a cardinal rule in the interpretation of statutes that, though the legislature may have the power to make a law operate retrospectively, yet it must clearly appear that such was the intention, for the presumption is that it was intended to operate only on future transactions. See Price v. Harrison, 31 Gratt. 114, and foot-note; Philips v. Com., 19 Gratt. 485, and foot-note.

And even remedial statutes are to be deemed prospective in their operation, and not to be applied to proceedings pending at the time of their enactment, unless a contrary intention appears. of this plea; but the court overruled the objection and received the plea: thereupon the plaintiff filed a replication, alleging that suit had been brought on this bond on the 4th of February 1828, which suit had been revived in the several names of the several successive representatives of Mosby Sheppard's estate named in the replication; that the suit was dismissed by the court on the 19th of May 1846, in the absence of the plaintiff, and without his knowledge or consent, and without any reasonable or sufficient cause; and further, that this (the second) suit on the bond was brought 21st July 1847, as soon as the plaintiff was apprised that said first suit was dismissed. The defendants filed a rejoinder to this plea, denying the existence of the record of the first suit in the replication alleged. The Circuit court decided that there was no such record, and gave judgment for the defendants. Thus the case was decided for the defendants, on the plea of the statute limiting actions on indemnifying bonds to seven years. It is unnecessary in this case to decide whether the court without a jury could properly try the issue as upon a rejoinder of nul tiel record; or whether the replication was or was not immaterial and naught; for however these questions may be decided, in my judgment the case before us presents but two material questions: 1st, as to the sufficiency of the declaration upon general demurrer; 2d, as to the validity of the plea of the statute of limitations.

The declaration on its face shows an inaccuracy in reciting the bond as having been executed to the plaintiff, who is Benjamin J. Duval, administrator de bonis non of Mosby Sheppard deceased; yet there is enough to show that the bond was in fact executed to Mosby Sheppard, the plaintiff's intestate; and the declaration sets forth sufficient matter of substance for the 27 *court to proceed to judgment according to law and the very right of the cause. 1 Rev. Code, p. 511, § 101. If the defendants desired to take advantage of a variance between the bond declared on, and that of which profert was made, they should have taken oyer of the bond. This was not done; and the demurrer was properly overruled. The second question is as to the validity of the plea of the statute of limitations. This plea does not conform to the statute, Sup. Rev. Code, p. 272, although it was obviously founded thereon; but it was so regarded in the argument here, and I shall so consider it.

If the plea presented no bar to the cause of action alleged, the court should have sustained the plaintiff's objection to its reception. It would be an idle waste of time, labor and expense, to engage in the trial of a fact, or series of facts, alleged in pleadings, upon which, if found to be true, no judgment could be rendered. The court of its own motion, even after verdict, may disregard the finding of immaterial facts; and in a proper case judgment may be rendered non obstante veredicto; or if the case be not in a condition to warrant a judgment, a repleader may be awarded. 1 Rob. Prac. (old ed.) 222; Beale's adm'r v. Botetourt Justices, 10 Gratt. 278; Boyle's adm'r v. Overby, 11 Gratt. 202, and the cases there cited. If a court shall improvidently receive a plea tendering an immaterial issue, it may retrieve its error either after verdict, or during the progress of the trial. And it follows, for a stronger reason, that the court may and ought, of its own motion, or on motion made, to refuse to try an immaterial issue.

The statute of February 28th, 1828, Sup. Rev. Code, p. 272, is directory merely and not mandatory; and it contains no clause repealing the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 134, § 25, p. 533. This court decided in the case of Dabney v. Catlett, 12 Leigh 383;
28 same case, 12 Leigh *634; and in the case of Aylett v. Roane, 1 Gratt. 282, that an indemnifying bond taken after May 1, 1828, but of the form and substance prescribed by the stat. 1 Rev. Code, § 25, p. 533, above referred to, was valid and binding. The limitation prescribed by the act of 28th February 1828, is fully satisfied by applying it to either class of bonds taken after the 1st May 1828, when the act took effect; though it was earnestly insisted by the defendants' counsel in the argument here, that the statute applies in this case, although the bond was taken before May 1, 1828; that the statute has a retroactive operation.

It may be conceded for the purposes of this case, that a statute of limitations is to be regarded as affecting the remedy; and that the legislature has authority to vary the remedy, by enlarging or restricting the time within which it may be pursued. Obvious considerations of justice require that in the exercise of their power a reasonable remedy should be saved to any party having a right. It would be harsh legislation to deprive him of his right, under color of modifying and limiting his remedy, either by reserving to him no remedy at all or one that is merely illusory and likely to be of no value. In the case before us, however, I deem it unnecessary, and therefore improper to express any opinion in the question whether the sufficiency of the remedy is to be decided by legislative discretion, or by judicial determination. In our case, the well settled principles of this court require that we shall construe the statute before us as operating prospectively only, although the legislature may have authority to make a law to operate retroactively, yet it must clearly appear that such was the intention.

We have seen that there are two well defined classes of indemnifying bonds taken after May 1st, 1828, under the former and latter statute, respectively, to which the limitation applies: thus full effect may 29 be given *to the later statute, by applying it prospectively only. See Turner v. Turner, 1 Wash. 139; Elliott's ex'ors v. Lyell, 3 Call 234; Williams v. Lewis, 5 Leigh 686; McCance v. Taylor, 10 Gratt. 580.

The limitation insisted on is found in a proviso; and the proper function of a proviso is to modify or restrain in some degree the body of the enactment. It would be perverting its use to apply it to a class of subjects not affected by the body of the enactment.

For these reasons, I am of opinion that the act prescribing a limitation of seven years to actions on indemnifying bonds, is no bar to the case alleged in the declaration.

The decision of the Circuit court overruling the demurrer to the declaration should be affirmed; but the judgment for the defendants upon the plea of the statute of limitations, should be reversed, with costs; the plea of the statute of limitations stricken from the record; and the cause remanded for trial upon the other issues therein; and for further proceedings.

The other judges concurred.

Judgment reversed.

30 *Atkins & als. v. Lewis & als.

July Term, 1857, Lewisburg.

(Absent LEE, J.)

1. Appellate Practice—Evidence—Abstract of Patent—No Objection in Lower Court.—Defendants in ejectment rely upon an outstanding title in a third person, and offer in evidence an abstract of the patent certified by the register, which is received without objection. This is to be regarded in the appellate court as prima facie evidence that such a grant was issued, though the case came up on a demurrer to evidence.

2. Patents—Land Forfeited for Delinquent Taxes.†—A patent for land forfeited for non-payment of taxes, was unauthorized by any law prior to the Code of 1849; and therefore the entry and survey of the land gave the patentee no equity therein.

3. Taxation—Sale of Land—Purchase by Owner—Effect of Patent Granted after Sale.—Though the entry and survey of land were made prior to a sale thereof as forfeited land under a decree of the court, yet the sale having been made prior to the issuing of the patent, and the land having been purchased by the original owner, who paid as the cash payment thereof, more than sufficient to satisfy all taxes, damages and costs due to the commonwealth; and the court having, after the issuing of the patent, directed the balance of the purchase money to be released to the purchaser, and the commissioner of delinquent lands having conveyed the land to him; his title is good against the patentee, who never was in possession, and who claimed the commonwealth's title under the act of March 22, 1842.

4. Ejectment—Outstanding Title in Another—Right of Defendant to Set up.‡—Defendants in possession of land, as against a plaintiff in ejectment who never has been in possession, but claims the commonwealth's title under the act of March 22, 1842, may set up an outstanding title in another, to protect their possession.

This was an action of ejectment instituted in November 1849, in the Circuit court of Kanawha county, by James A. Lewis and two others, against Davidson D. Atkins and four others, each claiming separate parcels of the land embraced within the patent of the plaintiffs. On the trial the defendants demurred to the evidence; and upon that demurrer the court rendered a judgment for the plaintiffs. Where-31 upon the *tenants applied to this court for a supersedeas; which was allowed. The facts are stated in the opinion of Judge Allen.

McComas, for the appellants.
B. H. Smith, for the appellees.

ALLEN, P. This was an action of ejectment instituted before the present Code took effect. On the trial, the lessors of the plaintiff, to make out their title, read to the jury a grant from the commonwealth to them, for six hundred and thirty acres, dated the 30th of December 1842; and offered evidence to show the identity of the land claimed with that described in their patent, and that the defendants were in the possession of it. There was no proof that the lessors of the plaintiff had ever taken possession of the land granted to them. On the contrary, their own evidence tended to show, that the defendants, and those under whom they claimed, had been in the actual possession of the land in controversy, or the portions held by them respectively, anterior to and at the date of the said grant.

Appellate Practice—Secondary Evidence—No Objection in Lower Court.—In B. & O. R. Co. v. Skeels, 3 W. Va. 560, it was said: "This evidence, although secondary, certainly tended directly to prove the contract supposed in the instruction, and the doctrine is too well settled to be called in question that if secondary evidence is introduced without objection in the court below, an objection to it in the appellate court comes too late and will not be considered. Shue v. Turk, 15 Gratt. 256; Atkins v. Lewis, 14 Gratt. 34; Buchanan v. Clark, 10 Gratt. 172; Taylor v. Smith, 10 Id. 558; Roberts v. Graham. 6 Wallace 578; Hummel v. The State, 17 Ohio Law State Rep. 628."

†Patents—Land Forfeited for Delinquent Taxes.—In Morrill v. Scott, 61 Fed. Rep. 770, the principal case was cited as authorizing the proposition that a grant for land forfeited for non-payment of taxes was unauthorized by any law prior to the Code of 1849.

‡Ejectment—Right of Defendant to Set up Outstanding Title in Another.—The general rule, as recognized by the principal case, that in an ejectment suit a defendant in possession may defeat a recovery by showing an older title than that of the plaintiff, in a third party under whom the defendant does not claim, was approved in Usher v. Pride, 15 Gratt. 201. This rule was also recognized in Moody v. McKim, 5 Munf. 374. This rule is based on the principle (subject to exceptions) that the plaintiff's right to recover in an action of ejectment rests upon the strength of his own title and not upon the imperfections and weakness of his adversary's. pp. 39, 40 of principal case. For further authorities in point, see monographic note on "Ejectment."

The lessors of the plaintiff having closed their testimony in chief, the defendants thereupon offered in evidence the record and proceedings, showing the forfeiture and sale of sixteen thousand eight hundred acres of land which had been granted by the state to Albert Gallatin and Savary De Valcoulon, by grant bearing date the 17th of March 1788. From the commissioners' report, being part of said proceedings, it appeared that the tract of sixteen thousand eight hundred acres of land was conveyed by the patentees to Robert Morris, by deed dated the 7th of May 1794, who conveyed the same by deed dated the 5th of March 1795, to Thomas Willing, John Nixon and John Barclay, in trust for an association of 32 individuals styled *The North American Land Company; and that the land was forfeited to the commonwealth for the failure to have the same properly entered on the revenue books, and charged with taxes.

This report of the commissioners of delinquent and forfeited lands was dated on the 29th of September 1842. On the 13th of October 1842 the same was approved and confirmed; and a decree entered by the judge ordering the land to be sold. In pursuance of the decree the land was sold by the commissioners on the first day of the November County court for Kanawha county for the year 1842, and purchased by Josiah M. Steed, as agent of the North American land company. The sale being reported to the Circuit court of Kanawha county, was confirmed by a final decree of that court entered on the 3d day of June 1843, and the commissioners were directed to convey the land to the purchaser on the payment of the deferred installments.

The defendants also read in evidence the record of a proceeding in the names of persons alleging themselves to be surviving trustees of the North American land company, the object of which was to be relieved from the payment of so much of the purchase money bid by their agent Steed, as might remain after discharging the taxes and damages thereon and the costs of the sale. On the 5th of June 1845, a decree was entered in this proceeding, which recited that the first installment of the purchase money paid to the commissioners on the 14th of November 1842, the day of sale, exceeded the amount of taxes and damages and the costs of the sale, by the sum of seven dollars and fifty-seven cents; that the land was sold as the property of the petitioners as trustees of said company, and that the bond for the deferred installments was executed by Steed and his sureties on behalf of said trustees; and there-33 upon it was ordered and decreed *that Steed's bond should be canceled; that the commissioners should pay to the petitioners the said sum of seven dollars and fifty-seven cents, and that the commissioners should be credited in their settlement with the commonwealth for the amount of the bond and the sum of seven dollars and fifty-seven cents.

The defendants also offered in evidence a deed dated the 25th of October 1851, executed by James M. Laidley the surviving commissioner of delinquent and forfeited lands in Kanawha county, to the North American land company, by that name and description, for the tract of sixteen thousand eight hundred acres.

The evidence of the defendants being closed, the lessors of the plaintiff offered in evidence the books of the commissioners of the revenue, and the delinquent lists of said county, to show that the said tract of six hundred and thirty acres granted to them had been duly entered on said books, charged with taxes, and had not been returned as delinquent.

They also introduced a witness, who deposed, that he was present at the sale of the sixteen thousand eight hundred acres of land before mentioned, by the commissioners of delinquent and forfeited lands; and at the instance of the patentee Lewis (one of the lessors of the plaintiff), gave public notice on the day of the sale, which was heard by the commissioners and J. M. Steed, who purchased the whole of the said sixteen thousand eight hundred acres of land as the agent of the North American land company; that the said Lewis and others had made a location and survey of six hundred and thirty acres of said land previous to that time; the same six hundred and thirty acres in controversy.

This being all the testimony, the defendants tendered a demurrer thereto, in which there was a joinder; and a verdict being rendered subject to the demurrer, judgment was rendered for the plaintiffs.
34 *Some objections were raised in the argument here, which appear not to have been anticipated in the preparation of the case in the court below. It is insisted that as the defendants relied upon an outstanding title in third persons to defeat a recovery, they should have exhibited the patent or copy thereof to Gallatin and Savary De Valcoulon. In the report of the commissioners of delinquent and forfeited lands, being the commencement of the proceeding resulting in the sale aforesaid, the patent to Gallatin and S. De Valcoulon is referred to and recited, and a certified abstract thereof furnished to them by the register of the land office, in pursuance of law, is incorporated with and made part of the report. This being read without objection, should be regarded as prima facie evidence that such a grant had issued. If a more complete copy had been required, the matter should have been brought to the notice of the party in the court below by a motion for an instruction as to the effect of the abstract as evidence. It would work a surprise to permit the objection made for the first time in argument here, to avail the party.

It is further maintained that there was no sufficient evidence to prove the identity of the land described in the patent for the sixteen thousand eight hundred acres. This objection is obviated by the proof adduced by the plaintiff, as to what occurred at the time of the sale by the commissioners of delinquent and forfeited lands. The proof showed that the lessors of the plaintiff knew the boundaries of the tract of sixteen thousand eight hundred acres, and gave notice to those present at the sale, that they had made a location and survey of six hundred and thirty acres thereof; thus conceding that their patent of six hundred and thirty acres was included within the boundaries of the elder grant.

This brings us to the question
35 really intended to be *presented by the record in this case; that is, whether under the evidence demurred to, taking it most strongly against the parties demurring, the patentees of the six hundred and thirty acres come within the provisions, or are entitled to the benefits of the 3d section of the act of March 22d, 1842. The tract of sixteen thousand eight hundred acres having been forfeited for the failure to enter the same in the books of the commissioner of the revenue, the forfeiture became complete, and the title absolutely vested in the commonwealth on the 1st of November 1836. Staats v. Board, 10 Gratt. 400. Of this forfeiture the grantees of the six hundred and thirty acres can claim no benefit under any law passed prior to the 22d of March 1842. All previous acts provided for bona fide grantees and actual occupants, a class within which the grantees of the tract of six hundred and thirty acres do not fall. See the provisions of the previous laws cited and commented on in Wild v. Serpel, 10 Gratt. 405. The 3d section of the act of March 1842 transfers the title of forfeited lands to such persons (other than those for whose default the title may have been forfeited) as had title or claim, legal or equitable, derived under a patent bearing date prior to the 1st of January 1843, dispensing with actual occupancy, and omitting the qualification of a bona fide claim of title in the junior patentee. In the case of Wild v. Serpel, the junior patent issued in 1836, and there was nothing to prevent the transfer of the forfeited title to the subsisting patentee, the instant the act of March 22d, 1842, took effect, unless in that case such a transfer was intercepted by the institution of proceedings and the decree for the sale of the land in controversy before the passage of the act aforesaid. A majority of the court held that this did not prevent the operation of the act. "No sale (the judge observed) had yet taken place under the order; no
36 right had been acquired by any *other person, and the title still was in the commonwealth, and fully within the control of the legislature." And again, that it was competent to transfer the title "as well after an order of sale as before, provided it were done before any new right was acquired by an actual sale being made under it." In the case under consideration, the report of the commissioners of delinquent and forfeited lands is dated 29th of September 1842, which being approved, the decree for sale was entered on the 13th of October 1842; and the sale was made on the 14th of November 1842, at which time so much of the purchase money as satisfied the taxes and damages and costs of sale was paid down, being all that the commonwealth exacted when the original owner became the purchaser of the land. These proceedings all took place before the 30th of December 1842, the date of the patent for the six hundred and thirty acres. The order confirming the sale, and directing the commissioners to make a deed to the purchaser, though dated on the 3d of June 1843, would relate back to the time of the sale.

The 3d section of the act of March 22d, 1842, transferred the forfeited title vested in the commonwealth to a person who had a title or claim, legal or equitable, held or derived from a grant from the commonwealth. By the policy of the various acts, but two modes seem to have been contemplated for the disposition of these forfeited lands after the time allowed for redeeming them had expired. The title vested in the commonwealth by forfeiture could only be divested by a sale made under a decree of the judge or court, or by a transfer under the operation of law to a party who could deduce his title or claim from another patent. The act made the transfer to another patentee or one claiming under him, and not to a claimant of a mere equity under 37 the commonwealth. *The original owner himself, if he desired to retain his land, was constrained to become a purchaser, and to obtain a deed of conveyance from the commissioners of delinquent and forfeited lands. The law contained a provision by which under a proper proceeding he could be relieved from the payment of so much of the purchase money as was not required to pay the taxes and damages and costs of sale.

The patent for the six hundred and thirty acres recites that it was founded on a survey made on the 21st of June 1842, by virtue of land office treasury warrants. This was prior to the report of the commissioners of delinquent and forfeited lands of the 29th of September 1842. And it has been argued that the entry and survey conferred an equitable title prior to the report and sale of the commissioners; and as it was carried into grant before the first of January 1843, the patentees, under an equitable construction of the statute, should be preferred to the purchaser at the commissioners' sale. This argument would have no ground to rest on unless forfeited lands could be located under a treasury warrant. The counsel therefore has found himself under the necessity of assailing the remark of the judge in his opinion delivered in Levasser v. Washburn, 11 Gratt. 572, "that there was no act then in force authorizing forfeited lands to be entered as waste and unappropriated." It will appear, however, from reference to the laws on the subject, that the observation of the judge was strictly correct. In 2 Rev. Code 528, will be found an act passed January 29th, 1803, which forfeited lands upon which the taxes should have remained unpaid for two years, and subjected them to location. But an act passed January 20th, 1807, 2 Rev. Code 530, declared that such forfeited lands should not be subject to location: and another act passed February 14th, 1811, 2 Rev. Code 536, provided that such lands should 38 remain the property *of the commonwealth, and be subject to such future disposition as might thereafter by law be directed. An act of January 23d, 1812, 2 Rev. Code 536, provided that the taxes due or chargeable, or thereafter to become due or chargeable on lands, should remain a lien upon said lands until discharged; and allowed further time for the redemption of all lands which had become or should become forfeited for the non-payment of taxes, and directed the lands to be sold after the time for redemption had expired. The time for redemption was subsequently enlarged, until by the act of February 9th, 1814, 2 Rev. Code 542, sales were again authorized. The act of February 20th, 1817, 2 Rev. Code 558, arrested the sales, and declared that the arrears of taxes and damages should continue a lien on the lands on which they were chargeable. Such lands were again made liable to entry, survey and grant as waste and unappropriated land, by the Code, ch. 114, § 3, p. 495; but it is believed there was no law in existence in 1842 which authorized the location of forfeited lands by virtue of a land office treasury warrant. By such a warrant the adventurer was authorized to locate waste and unappropriated lands only. An entry on lands previously granted was a void act and conferred no equity.

As was remarked by the judge in the case of Levasser v. Washburn, "In the absence of a statutory provision authorizing the location of forfeited lands, no title could be acquired to such lands by entry and survey, and a patent obtained for them would be merely void." The lessors of the plaintiff must therefore rest on their grant alone. Before it issued such proceedings were had under the act of March 30th, 1837, providing for the appointment of commissioners of delinquent and forfeited lands, and other subsequent acts in amendment thereof, as to confer rights which were not divested by the 3d section of the act of March 39 22d, *1842. Those laws were all in force at the same time. Up to the passage of the act of March 5th, 1846, Sess. Acts, p. 13, prohibiting further sales, the commissioners continued to make reports, and the courts and judges to enter decrees for sale. The laws being in pari materia, such construction is to be given to them as may reconcile and give effect to the various enactments they may contain. By some of these laws the agents of the commonwealth were required to make report, &c. and the judges and courts to order sales. The law of March 22d, 1842, transferred the forfeited titles under certain circumstances to subsequent grantees who should obtain a grant previous to the first of January 1843. Although such agents may have commenced a proceeding to sell under one set of laws, yet if no right had been acquired in virtue thereof, there was nothing to obstruct the transfer under the operation of the act of March 22d, 1842, to a subsequent patentee. But when, as in the present case, an actual sale had been made and the price paid, the purchaser has acquired rights of which the commonwealth could not deprive him without the imputation of bad faith. By virtue of the proceedings commenced and carried on by the agents of the commonwealth in pursuance of law, the beneficial ownership was transferred to him who had purchased and paid the price, provided the sale was not set aside. The acts making a transfer contemplated a transfer of the whole of the forfeited title. It could not have been intended to transfer the mere shell of the legal title forfeited to the commonwealth and remaining until conveyed to the purchaser. Until so conveyed, it must be held in subordination to his rights. I think, therefore, no beneficial interest continued in the commonwealth which was transferred to the patentees of the six hundred and thirty acre tract.

The only remaining question is, Whether the defendants in the court below
40 could avail themselves of the *outstanding title forfeited and sold as aforesaid, to defeat a recovery in this action? This suit was instituted before the present Code went into operation, and it is therefore not necessary to enquire what may be the effect of abolishing writs of right and substituting the action of ejectment in place of it in all cases. As a general rule, under the law when this suit was commenced, the plaintiff in ejectment must recover on the strength of his own title, and possession gives the defendant a right against every man who cannot show a good title. This general rule is subject to exceptions; thus it was decided in Middleton v. Johns, 4 Gratt. 129, that a person having held actual possession of land for more than fifteen years under color of title, and being then ousted by a mere trespasser without pretence of title, might recover in ejectment against the trespasser, although it did not appear that the land had ever been granted by the commonwealth. In Tapscott v. Cobbs, 11 Gratt. 172, the court held that where a party in peaceable possession of land is entered upon and ousted by one not having title to or authority to enter upon the land, the party ousted may recover in ejectment upon his possession merely: And his right to recover cannot be defeated by the defendant by showing an outstanding title in another with which the defendant had no connection. In the case under consideration, there was no evidence tending to prove that the lessors of the plaintiff were ever in the actual possession of the land, or any part thereof. Their grant did not even confer upon them constructive seizin. The commonwealth's title to the land as part of her waste and unappropriated domain, had passed to the first grantees: And as the law did not authorize the location of forfeited lands, nothing passed to the junior grantee. The evidence introduced by the lessors of the plaintiff tended to prove that the defendants were in actual occupation of portions of the 41 land, and that their possession *and the possession of those under whom they entered, commenced long anterior to the date of the patent for six hundred and thirty acres. They had that peaceable possession which the law protects against all except him who has the actual right to the possession, and it was competent for them to show a subsisting outstanding title in a third party, to defeat a recovery and protect such possession. This they have done by showing the grant to Gallatin and Savary De Valcoulon and the exhibition of the proceedings; showing that title is claimed thereunder, by parties asserting a beneficial interest in the land.

I think on the demurrer to evidence the law was for the plaintiffs in error, the defendants in the court below, that the judgment should be reversed with costs, and judgment entered in their favor on the demurrer.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Allen, P.

1. Bonds—Payable to Commissioners—New Commissioners Substituted—Who May Maintain Suit.—Commissioners appointed by a court of equity to sell lands, make the sale and take bonds for the purchase money, made payable to themselves; and before the money is paid the commissioners are removed and others are appointed. The last commissioners are entitled to sue at law on the bonds, in the names of the first to whom the bonds were made payable.

2. Pleading and Practice—Action for Benefit of Another—Declaration.†—Though it is usual to state in the declaration or by endorsement thereon, or on the writ, that the action is brought for the benefit of the parties entitled, yet this is not essential. And if the defendants have any doubt whether the suit is brought for the benefit of the last commissioners, they can by motion have a rule upon them to avow and prosecute or disavow and dismiss the action.

This was an action of debt in the Circuit court of Kanawha county, brought in the name of C. E. Doddridge and S. A. Miller against D. J. W. and John N. Clarksons, on three bonds. There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiffs; whereupon the Clarksons applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was allowed. The case is stated by Judge Moncure in his opinion.

Price and McComas, for the appellants.
Fitzhugh, for the appellees.

MONCURE, J. This is an action of debt brought in the name of Doddridge and Miller against D. J. W. and John N. Clarkson, on three bonds for the sum of four thousand seven hundred and twenty dollars and sixty-six and two-thirds cents each, dated December 25th, 1851, and payable nine, eighteen and twenty-four 43 *months after date. The obligees in whose names the action is brought, are styled "commissioners" in the bonds; and the said sum of money is therein described, respectively, as the " 'first,' 'second' and decree in the cause, took bonds payable to himself for the money. The court said (at page 710): "Nor are the powers of the receiver at all varied or increased by the fact, that he is the obligee in the bond. The legal title and right of action are thereby vested in him; but he cannot sue except by the direction of the court which appointed him, and whose agent he is. He may any time be superseded and another appointed in his place to collect the money. Clarksons v. Doddridge, 14 Gratt. 42."

Where the right to receive the money due on a claim is in the assignee, without the corresponding right to bring an action for it in his own name, he has a right to bring an action at law in the name of the assignor; and he will be regarded, even by a court of law, as the substantial plaintiff in the action. Sangston, secretary of the Baltimore Agricultural Aid Society." At page 764, the court said: "This form of security was no doubt adopted to enable him (Sangston) to sue for and collect the debts due the society, without the expense and inconvenience of his bringing before the courts the numerous parties interested in the proceeds of sale. It is clear that the legal interest in these bonds is vested in Sangston alone. Upon well settled principles the descriptive words used in the instruments may be rejected, and suits at law or in equity may be maintained thereon in his name, without the addition of other parties. 'third' payment on salt property of the late Charles G. Reynolds, sold to D. J. W. Clarkson this day." The declaration is in the ordinary form. There was a general demurrer to the declaration; in which the plaintiffs joined. The defendants also tendered a special plea in bar, averring, in effect, therein, that the said bonds were executed to the plaintiffs as commissioners appointed in a chancery suit to sell certain lands; that before the said action was commenced, the said plaintiffs were substituted by the appointment of other commissioners in the said suit, to wit, Quarrier and Gillison; and that thereby the right of action on the said bonds was taken from the said plaintiffs, and vested and now remains in said Quarrier and Gillison. To this plea the plaintiffs objected; and the objection was sustained by the court; "being of opinion that the plea aforesaid does not present a good and sufficient bar to the action brought in this case in the name of Doddridge and Miller, to recover the sums secured to be paid by the several writings obligatory upon which it is founded; and that the present commissioners have a right to sue upon said bonds in the name of said Miller and Doddridge." To this opinion the defendants excepted: and showing no ground in support of their demurrer to the declaration, it was overruled; and judgment was rendered for the plaintiffs for debt, interest and costs. That judgment is now before this court for revision on a writ of supersedeas.

The only error assigned in the judgment is in the rejection of the special plea. Did the court err in rejecting it? Was the action properly brought in the names of the commissioners to whom the bonds were 44 *payable? Or ought it to have been brought in the names of the new and substituted commissioners?

It is a general rule, that an action on a contract must be brought in the name of the party in whom the legal interest in such contract is vested. The legislature alone has power to make an exception to this rule. An exception is made by the Code, ch. 144, § 14, p. 583; which authorizes the assignee of any bond, note or writing not negotiable, to maintain thereupon any action in his own name which the original obligee or payee might have brought. The assignee acquires only an equitable right with a capacity, expressly given him by statute, to assert it at law in his own name. But the legal title still remaining in the obligee or payee, a right of action is incident thereto; and the assignee may, at his election, sue at law in his own name, or in that of the obligee or payee for his benefit. Garland v. Richeson, 4 Rand. 266. Another exception seems to be made by the Code, ch. 116, § 2, p. 500.

It is also a general rule, that the legal interest in an obligation for the payment of money is vested in the obligee or his personal representative. The exceptions to this rule also must be derived from the statute law; and are few in number. An exception arises in England under the statute of bankruptcy, which expressly vests the bankrupt's right of property and of action in his assignees; who may therefore maintain in their own name an action on a bond payable to the bankrupt. A bond payable to a corporation aggregate, is not an exception to the rule; though an action thereon must be brought in the name of the corporation, and not of the persons composing it when the bond is executed, or their personal representatives. The corporation itself, and not the persons composing it, is the obligee; and the case there-45 fore falls within *the rule and not the exceptions. A different rule is said to be applicable to a bond payable to a person who is a corporation sole; in which case, an action at law upon the bond must, after his death, be brought in the name of his personal representative, and not of his successor. There is a strong instance of this kind in a case very recently decided by the Court of queen's bench, in which it was held that a bond given to the ordinary by an administrator, under the statute of distributions, passes, on the ordinary's death, to his personal representative, and not to his successor. Howley v. Knight, 14 Ad. & El. 240, 68 Eng. C. L. R. 238.

In the case under consideration, the bonds are payable to Miller and Doddridge, the old commissioners, in whom, therefore, by the very terms of the bonds, and according to the general rule of law before stated, the legal interest in, and right of action on, the bonds were vested. There is no law in existence which divests this legal interest and right of action. The court of chancery, it is true, was authorized by law to substitute new, in place of the old, commissioners. But the effect of such substitution was not to transfer the legal interest in the bonds from the old to the new commissioners. It only authorized the new commissioners, upon giving the security required by law, to collect the bonds; and to bring suit, if necessary for the recovery thereof, in the names of the old commissioners. The right of the new commissioners to receive the money, does not imply a right to bring an action therefore in their own names. A person may have a right to receive money, without any corresponding right to bring an action for it in his own name. This happens whenever a chose in action, not negotiable by the law merchant, and not coming under the provisions in the Code, ch. 144, § 14, is assigned. The assignee has a right to receive the money, but not to bring an action therefor in his own name. He has, 46 *however, an ample remedy. He has a right to bring an action at law in the name of his assignor; and he will be regarded, even by a court of law, as the substantial plaintiff in the action. The court will protect his rights, and will not permit the nominal plaintiff to receive the money, nor to release the debt, nor to dismiss the action. The same principle applies to this case. The Circuit court was therefore right in saying that the present commissioners have a right to sue upon the bonds in the name of Miller and Doddridge, the obligees.

But it was argued, that even if they had a right to bring such a suit, it ought to appear that the suit was brought by them or for their use; and that as the declaration does not show that the suit was so brought, the fact, if it had been so, should have been replied to the plea. It is usual, when an action is brought in the name of one person for the use of another, to state the fact in the body of the declaration, or by an endorsement thereon or on the writ. And it is useful and convenient to do so, to give notice to the defendant of the rights of the substantial plaintiff, and to enable the court to protect them by its orders. But this is not necessary. The statement is no material part of the pleadings. The cause of action is complete without it. It was, therefore, no bar to the action in this case that new commissioners had been substituted to the place of the plaintiffs, notwithstanding it may not appear on the record that the suit was brought by the former, or for their use. The defendants are in no danger of being compelled to pay the money into the wrong hands. They have an ample remedy to prevent that; but not by a plea in bar of the action. Their remedy is by motion. If they really apprehend that the action was not brought by or for the use of the new commissioners, and that the old commissioners are fraudulently at-47 tempting to recover *and collect the money for their own use, they can, by motion, obtain a rule requiring the new commissioners to avow and prosecute, or to disavow and dismiss the action. And the court, if it have cause to suspect any such thing, may and ought, ex mero motu, to award such a rule. The action was no doubt brought by and for the use of, the new commissioners. The fact is plainly inferable from the opinion of the court expressed in the bill of exceptions. It also appears, from an exhibit produced and read by the defendants in connection with their plea, that the new commissioners were appointed for the very purpose of bringing an action on the bonds. The action was in fact brought shortly thereafter. The attorneys who brought it, and the new commissioners, bear the same surnames (Quarrier and Gillison), and may be the same persons.

I am of opinion that there is no error in the judgment, and that it be affirmed.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Moncure, J.

He may, when out of debt, convey it to whom he pleases, although he receives no consideration therefor. If he owes no one he can do absolutely as he pleases with his own, unless restrained by statute. He may in good faith convey his property, or a part of it, to secure the payment of his debts, or a part thereof. He may designate the beneficiaries by name, or by any other mode designate them. He may prefer his creditors; and may, for a reasonable time, postpone the execution of the conveyance which is to strip him of his property. In such conveyance he can reserve to himself no benefit at the expense of his creditors. In cases where he postpones for a definite time the final consummation of the security he has created, and reserves to himself the use of the property during such time, it has been held that that is not to be regarded as delaying or hindering his creditors, within the meaning of the law, because the interest so reserved is liable to creditors acquiring liens by judgment or executions. David Kerr owned a valuable tract of land in the county of Augusta, which he cultivated; and he also owned real estate in the town of Staunton, where he carried on the business of a merchant. In 1842 and in May and July 1846, Kerr executed three deeds, by which he conveyed his tract
49 of land to trustees to *secure certain debts and indemnify certain sureties therein mentioned. On the 30th of October 1846 he executed a fourth deed, which in the proceedings in this case was marked D. By this deed, after reciting a great many of his creditors, he provided that the creditors mentioned in the three previous deeds, and a few named, should be first paid, and then all the others should share pro rata: Among these last was Henry W. Quarles, for the use of Kent, Kendall & Atwater. He then conveyed the tract of land aforesaid, his lots in Staunton, with the buildings thereon, certain slaves, his horses, cattle, sheep and hogs, by number, and their increase, all his farming machinery and utensils, specifying them particularly, about fifteen hundred bushels of corn, yet on the stalk, three hundred bushels of rye (supposed to be) not threshed, about five hundred bushels of oats, about one hundred bushels of wheat, about seventy acres of wheat in the ground, about sixty acres of rye in the ground, about ten tons of hay, stills and stilling utensils, five riding saddles, &c., &c., household and kitchen furniture, specifying the articles, books, glasses, clock, watch, gun, pistols, six or seven barrels of apple cider, and all the personal property of every kind whatsoever, belonging to him; and also if there was any furniture or fixture in the merchant mill on the land conveyed, that might be considered not a part of the property that was thereby conveyed. The trusts of the deed were: 1. That Kerr should be permitted to remain in possession of the property until the trustee was required to execute the trust. 2. That if he paid the debts secured by the deed, on or before the 30th of October 1848, it should be void. 3. If he did not pay them all by that day, then it should be the duty of the trustee, if required in writing by a majority in amount of debts of the creditors therein before mentioned, or if Kerr or his legal representatives should request
50 it, to *sell the property, real and personal, or so much as might be necessary, at public auction, for cash, after advertising the same for three weeks; and out of the moneys arising from the sale, he should pay first the expenses attending the execution of the trust; and then the debts before described, or such of them as should then be due, in the order before directed; and the remainder of the purchase money he should pay to Kerr, his heirs, &c. And it was provided that Kerr might, if he conceived it to be the interest of the parties connected with the conveyance, at any time before the 30th of October 1848, direct the trustee to carry the trust into execution in the manner provided in the deed. And further, if any one or more of the creditors thereby intended to be secured, should at any time before the deed was carried into effect, sue out and have executed either on the body or the property of the said Kerr, an execution for his claim, he or they should thereby forfeit all right under the deed, and all claim to participate in the security intended to be provided by it.

On the 10th of November 1846, Kerr executed another deed, whereby he conveyed to Nicholas K. Trout all his goods in his store, and all other personal property in the possession of Kerr, and belonging to him, at his store-house and lumber-house in Staunton, upon trust to pay certain debts therein described. The goods were to be retailed in the store-house for three months for cash; and if the debts secured were not then paid, the goods might be sold by the trustee at auction. This trust seems to have been executed, at the time prescribed.

In November 1846, Thomas D. Quarles, who sued for the benefit of Kent, Kendall & Atwater, recovered a judgment against David Kerr; and an execution against his body having been sued out thereon, he in January 1847 took the benefit of the 51 act for the relief *of insolvent debtors, surrendering nothing but his equity of redemption in the deeds before mentioned.

In March 1848 Kerr and the trustee Trout filed a bill in the Circuit court of Staunton, by which they convened the trustees and creditors in the first four deeds; and in that suit the trust property was sold; an account of the debts taken; and in June 1851 there was a decree for the payment of the debts in the first, second and third deeds, and of Gratt. 590, the court said: "There is no doubt that the provisions of a mortgage or deed of trust may be of such a character as of themselves to furnish evidence sufficient to justify the inference of a fraudulent intent. Such is the case where the grantor reserves a power over the property conveyed incompatible with the avowed purposes of the trust and adequate to the defeat thereof. This principle was enunciated in Lang v. Lee and others, 3 Rand. 410, and has been repeatedly recognized by this court in subsequent decisions. Sheppards v. the debts in the first class of the fourth deed; and for the payment pro rata of the second class, except the debt due to Quarles for the benefit of Kent, Kendall & Atwater: this debt the court excluded from participation in the trust fund, on the ground that execution had issued thereon against Kerr, and he had been compelled to take the benefit of the act for the relief of insolvent debtors.

In July 1852 Quarles, and Kent, Kendall & Atwater filed their bill in the Circuit court of Augusta county, in which they set out the recovery of their judgment, the execution of the four deeds above mentioned, and the proceedings in the suit instituted by Kerr and Trout. They say that the debts secured by the first three deeds and the preferred debts in the fourth, have been paid, and that there is still a balance of the trust fund in the hands of the commissioners appointed in that case to distribute it. They charge that the fourth deed, bearing date the 30th of October 1846, is fraudulent, and intended to hinder and delay the plaintiffs. That these plaintiffs had instituted suit against Kerr as early as August 1845; that he had delayed a trial for several terms by sham pleas, and that on the very day before the commencement of the term at which it was expected the plaintiffs would obtain their judgment, this deed was made. They charge that the deed is fraudulent on its face; and they refer to its provisions as evidence of the fraudulent purpose of the grantor.

52 *The unsatisfied creditors secured by the deed, and the trustee and commissioners in the first case, are made parties defendants; and the prayer is for an injunction to restrain the commissioners from paying over the money in their hands; that the deed may be set aside as fraudulent; and that so much of the money in the hands of the commissioners as may be necessary to pay their debt, may be applied to that purpose.

David Kerr and one or two of the creditors answered the bill. He denied the fraud, and endeavored to explain the different provisions of the deed. The bill was taken for confessed as to the other defendants. There was no parol evidence taken by either party; but all the deeds before mentioned and a transcript of the record in the first cause were filed: and the cause came on to be heard upon this evidence, in July 1854, when the court below dissolved the injunction, and dismissed the bill. Whereupon the plaintiffs applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

SAMUELS, J. We are met at the threshold of this case by the objection that the questions involved therein have been adjudged by the Circuit court of Augusta county in the case of Kerr v. Kinney, &c., and that the decree therein remains in force, not having been superseded or reversed on appeal, nor set aside by the Circuit court itself. The record in the case of Kerr v. Kinney, &c., is made part of this record; and upon inspection of the bills in the cases respectively, it appears at once that they are founded, in a great degree, on different facts, and seek different relief. The bill in Kerr, &c., v. Kinney, &c., is based upon the hypothesis that the deed, exhibit D, the chief subject of contro-53 versy *is a valid security, and prays relief by having the debts and liabilities secured by that and other deeds ascertained and enforced. The trustee, who is a party plaintiff, prays the judgment of the court on the validity of so much of the deed D as excludes from its benefits such of the cestuis que trust as should sue out process of execution against the person or property of Kerr the grantor before the trusts were fully executed. In the case before us, Quarles, &c., v. Kerr, &c., the bill is founded upon the alleged fact that the deed D is fraudulent; and prays relief by having it set aside so far as it interfered with the judgment and execution for complainant's debt. Facts so widely different required different decrees. It cannot be said that the facts and relief appropriate to them in the case before us, have been passed on, when the Circuit court passed on the facts and relief in the other case.

The Circuit court in Kerr, &c., v. Kinney, &c., could not have set aside the deed D, for fraud, as it was not alleged in that case; so that court could not acquit Kerr of fraud in making the deed, in advance of the charge of fraud.

Waiving any enquiry as to the mode and form of the plea, still the decree of the Circuit court is no bar, for the further reason, that it is merely interlocutory and not final. Story's Equ. Pl. § 791, 2 Daniel's Ch. Pr. p. 756.

The case before us grows out of a conflict between the general dominion of Kerr the grantor over his property, and the limited dominion of Quarles, &c., over the same property, acquired by judgment and process of execution. The question to be decided is, Under which of these conflicting claims the property shall be held liable?

It will aid us in the investigation of our case, to trace the outlines of the dominion held by the owner, and that held by his creditors, over the owner's property, 54 *so far as they are involved in this case. The owner, if he have no creditors, has power to dispose of his property in any way whatever. If, however, he has creditors, his power is subject to the qualification that it be not exercised so as to delay, hinder or defraud creditors. Stat. 13 Eliz. ch. 5; 1 Rev. Code, ch. 101, § 2, p. 372.

Many cases are to be found in the reports of the English courts, and of the states in which the statute 13 Eliz. ch. 5, has been adopted. Whilst all these courts have endeavored to give effect to the statute, it is still manifest that there is an irreconcilable conflict in their decisions. An act, or combination of acts, done in one jurisdiction, might have the effect to hinder, delay or defraud creditors, although if done in another jurisdiction, no such effect would follow: and this, because of a difference in the laws for the collection of debts in the several jurisdictions.

In Virginia, our courts have gone as far, or farther, than any other, to sustain the owner's dominion; and enough may be found in the decisions of this court to indicate the proper rule in this case.

The owner may in good faith convey his property, or a part of it, to secure the payment of his debts, or some of them, or some part or parts of them. He may designate the beneficiaries by name, or in any mode by which their identity may be ascertained. He may postpone for a reasonable time (to be judged of in each case) the period for executing the provisions of the conveyance; and he may prescribe the order in which the creditors are to be paid.

The owner cannot divide his property into two parcels, and protect himself in the enjoyment of the one by giving up the other; he cannot require his creditors to accept part and release for the residue. He may, however, surrender all his property to such creditors as will receive it in sat-
55 isfaction of their debts, and *release the owner. Skipwith's ex'or v. Cunningham, 8 Leigh 271; Phippen v. Durham, 8 Gratt. 457. The reason for the distinction between a partial and a total surrender, grows out of the statute which forbids only fraudulent conveyances of present property, but is silent as to property to be acquired in future. See Thomas v. Jenks, 5 Rawles' R. 221; 1 American Leading Cases 69.

The owner can reserve no benefit to himself, at the expense of his creditors. In case he shall postpone for a definite time, the final consummation of the security he creates, and shall either expressly, or by operation of law, reserve to himself the use of the property during that time, he is not regarded as delaying or hindering his creditors, with the meaning of the law, because the interest so reserved is liable to creditors acquiring liens by judgments or executions. Nor is it material that a creditor may be compelled to resort to a court of equity for aid to subject the reserved interest. Cochran v. Paris, 11 Gratt. 348; Dance v. Seaman et als., 11 Gratt. 778. The authority of courts of equity when in session, and of the judges thereof in vacation, is ample by injunction and by appointment of receivers with adequate powers, to preserve the rights of creditors having liens. The difference in the degrees of promptitude with which common law process and equitable process respectively afford relief, is not to be regarded as such delay as brings a case within the statute.

The value of property as the means of paying debts, is made up of several elements; to wit, the nature, amount and certainty of the subject itself, and the time at which it may be made available. In the case before us, the property of the grantor Kerr is divided into parcels; that embraced by the deed D, and that omitted therefrom. It was said in the argument here, that the deed D includes all Kerr's property,
56 as well *that specifically and minutely described, as that contained in the subsequent deed of the date November 10th, 1846. This I hold is not the proper construction of the deed D. The minute specification of numerous articles of small separate values, shows that it was intended to name every piece of property; and that the terms "all the personal property," &c., were not intended to embrace the stock of merchandise worth thousands of dollars. This is the cotemporaneous construction of the deed by Kerr the grantor, by Trout the trustee, and by the cestuis que trust, the creditors. Eleven days after the execution of that deed, another deed dated November 10th, 1846, was executed by the same grantor, conveying the stock of merchandise to the same trustee, in part for the benefit of some of the same cestuis que trust. These deeds have been treated and enforced as separate and independent securities, without opposition or complaint from any party; and it cannot be insisted, now for the first time, in this court, that the deed of November 10th, 1846, is subordinate to the deed D. It is therefore manifest, as already said, that Kerr divided his property into two parcels; one embraced, the other omitted, in the deed D. The parcel embraced by the deed is vaguely and uncertainly subdivided as to the time when it may be made available by creditors: two years are named as the period for consummating the trust, but this period may be shortened at Kerr's pleasure; or it may be prolonged by the difficult, if not impracticable, process of executing the trust. Kerr was to retain the property until a sale should be made under the deed. This reserved interest and Kerr's equity of redemption were liable to creditors not claiming under the deed; and thus, so far as time entered into the value of the security, the omitted creditors were at Kerr's mercy. If the reserved interest should be separately sold, it would produce but little, because of its un-
57 certain duration; *or if the whole subject be sold, out and out, still the difficulty recurs in appropriating the proceeds: the omitted creditors, to the extent of their demands, would have title to the avails of the reserved interest; the favored creditors, to the extent of their demands, would have title to all other avails of the property. After they should be satisfied, the residue, if any, representing the equity of redemption, would be applied to the debts of the omitted creditors, if not satisfied by the avails of the reserved interest. It would be impracticable to make an apportionment between parties whose claims are so uncertain.

The division made by Kerr the grantor in the deed D, between the interest reserved to himself and that granted for the benefit of the cestuis que trust, is uncertain, for another reason: the reserved interest was to continue until the trust was consummated; this could not be done until the expiration of two years, unless directed by Kerr; nor after, unless by his direction, or by direction in writing by creditors holding what is called a majority in amount of debts. The amounts of the debts are vaguely stated. The trustee has power, after a sale, to adjust the amounts; but he has no power to fix the amounts preliminarily to making a sale at all. The face of the deed shows that the creditors reside at different places, widely separated, and thus a suit in chancery would be indispensable to ascertain who might direct a sale; whilst such a proceeding, of uncertain duration, should be pending, the grantor was to enjoy the property.

The deed D omits the grantor's stock of merchandise, which is shown to be of great value. It seeks to impose on his creditors secured in the deed, the alternatives of looking to the deed only for security, and giving up for an indefinite time the right to pursue the debtor's other property 58 by legal process, or of forfeiting *any claim under the deed. This is a palpable attempt to use one portion of the debtor's present property to protect another portion from his creditors. We have seen that this cannot be done when the protection sought is for all time; and the principle is the same when it is sought for a limited time; the difference is in degree only. The hindrance or delay of creditors is reprobated by the statute without regard to the duration of the hindrance or delay. Under the circumstances of this case, a delay of two years in the pursuit of Kerr's property, was equivalent to giving up all claim upon it.

If any thing more were needed to condemn the deed D as fraudulent, it would, in my judgment, be found in the fact that it was executed on the last judicial day preceding the commencement of the term at which the appellants obtained their judgment; and in the fact that it embraces large quantities of property consumable in the use, and which must be used within the two years, to be of any value. It was merely illusory as a security for debts to be paid two years or more thereafter. I am aware of the cases in this court, in which conveyances of property of like nature have been held good. Recognizing the binding authority of those cases, as establishing that such conveyances of such property are not necessarily fraudulent and void, still I am of opinion that this court has not, and could not in advance declare that no weight as evidence shall be allowed in any case to the fact, that the conveyance is illusory for the purpose of securing debts.

I am of opinion to reverse the decree of the Circuit court, and to render a decree subjecting the avails of property, embraced by the deed D, now under the control of the court, to the satisfaction of the appellants' judgment; and applying the residue thereof, if any, to the trusts declared by that deed.

July Term, 1857, Lewisburg.

1. Adversary Possession—Acknowledgment of Claimant's Title by Possessor—Effect.—When the possessor of land has acknowledged a title in the claimant, then the possession will not be deemed adverse; and whenever the act of the possessor acknowledges a right in the claimant, the statute of limitations will not operate, because such acknowledgment deduced from circumstances negatives the idea of adverse possession.

2. Case at Bar.—In 1825 N bought land of M, and received possession and a bond for the title. In 1826 N contracted with B to convey him the land upon his doing certain work and paying certain debts for which N was bound as his surety. B did the work but did not pay the debts, but they were paid by N, and they had a settlement in November 1831, when B owed N one hundred and eleven dollars, with interest. In 1827 B conveyed the land to secure a debt he owed B & Co., and in 1830 B conveyed the land to secure a debt to E; and in April 1835 E purchased the land of B, and was to pay him when B removed the incumbrances upon it, and B executed to him a title bond. E was put into possession, and he and his widow have retained the land ever since, claiming, as is stated by his executors in their answer, under B's title bond. In 1853 N files a bill against M, B, B & Co. and E's executors, to have the land subjected to pay his debt; charges notice on the part of B & Co. and E; and the notice is admitted by E's executors. HELD:

   1. Bonds—Presumption of Payment—When it Begins to Arise—Case at Bar.—The presumption of satisfaction of N's debt as against E, can only begin to arise from 1835, when he had notice of it; and twenty years not having since elapsed, the legal presumption has not arisen.
   2. Presumption of Grant—Case at Bar.†—The executors of E having in their answer stated that E has always claimed under B's title bond, a conveyance cannot be presumed.
   3. Statute of Limitations—Adversary Possession.—E recognizing by his acts the title in N, his is not a possession adversary to N, and the statute of limitations cannot operate to protect his possession.
   4. Bonds—Presumption of Payment—Repellable.‡—Even if the time had elapsed from which the legal presumption of payment might arise,

This was a suit instituted in 1853, in the Circuit court of Greenbrier county, by John A. North against Henry Erskine's executors, Patrick Beirne, Elisha Buckingham and others. The case made by the plaintiff in his bill is as follows: On the 3d of October 1825 John A. North purchased of George W. L. McClenachan a tract of land near Lewisburg, containing thirty-four and one-quarter acres, known in the division of McClenachan's land, as lot No. 15; and he received the bond of McClenachan, binding himself to make North a title to the land. In February 1826 North made a contract with Elisha Buckingham, by which Buckingham bound himself to build certain parts of a house for North; and among other things, North bound himself to assign to Buckingham the said title bond of McClenachan, upon the completion of the work and the payment by Buckingham of two notes due to Parris for which North was surety, amounting to about two hundred and thirty dollars. Buckingham completed the work, but did not pay the notes, which were paid by North; and upon a settlement between them in November 1831, Buckingham acknowledged himself indebted to North in the sum of one hundred and eleven dollars and sixty-nine cents, with interest from the 25th of December 1827: And he having failed to pay this sum, North did not assign to him the title bond. The foregoing was the case of the plaintiff, and was fully sustained by the written evidence.

The plaintiff further stated, that in August 1827 Buckingham, to secure a debt he owed to P. Beirne & Co., conveyed to Marcus H. Goshen, with other property real and personal, including his wagons and teams and household furniture, the parcel of 62 land *aforesaid of thirty-four and a quarter acres; and in September 1830 he made another deed, by which he conveyed the same property to secure a debt due to Henry Erskine. He charged that both Beirne & Co. and Erskine & Co. had full notice of his prior equity; and that Buckingham had no title to said land, nor could he procure a title until he had fully paid off the debt due to the plaintiff, and for the payment of which he had retained the said title bond.

The plaintiff further charged that Buckingham had left the state in the year 1838 or 1839, and had remained abroad. And making the executors of Erskine, Beirne, the heirs of McClenachan, Buckingham, and Goshen the trustee, parties, he asked, that McClenachan's heirs might be required to convey the title to the said land; that his lien thereon might be enforced, and that it might be sold for the payment of his debt; and for general relief.

Erskine's executors answered the bill. They said, it was true Buckingham had conveyed the land in trust to secure a debt due to Henry Erskine & Co., amounting to one thousand and forty-three dollars. That in April 1835 Buckingham had sold the land to Henry Erskine, and given him a title bond for it, and had put him in possession, a possession which he retained until his death, and which had since been retained by his widow, claiming it under the said title bond. That Erskine was to give seven hundred dollars for the land, to be paid in the debts of said Buckingham, and the land was to be cleared of all incumbrances. That the debt secured by the deed of trust had never been paid, except as it was reduced by the price of the land.

They say they suppose that at the time of the purchase of said land Erskine had notice that a balance of purchase money was due to the plaintiff, which operated as ple: By the obligor's express admissions, within the twenty years, that the debt was unpaid; by his implied admissions to that effect, from paying interest, or part of the principal, which fact is provable by extrinsic evidence, or even by cotemporaneous endorsement by the obligee himself; or by showing the obligor's inability to pay during that period; or by suspension of power of collection by stay-law, or by war; or even by the near relationship of the parties."

Again, in 2 Min. Inst. (4th Ed.) p. 838, it is said: "It has long been established that, at common law, after the lapse of twenty years from the time when it became payable, a bond should be presumed to have been paid; so that, in the absence of any proof to repel the presumption, the lapse of that time would sustain a plea of 'payment at the day.' It is, however, only a presumption, which may be disproved by any satisfactory evidence that it is not true, as, (1), By express acknowledgment of the obligor within the twenty years that the debt was still due; (2), By his implied acknowledgment, derived from his having within that time paid interest on it, or, it is said, a part of the principal, which may be proved by extrinsic evidence, or by an endorsement of a credit for the payment made on the bond by the obligee himself, while the obligation was in full force, and before the presumption attached; (3), By showing the debtor's inability to pay during the period; (4), By the long continued absence abroad of the debtor, or, it is said, of the creditor; (5), By showing that the collection of the debt had been long suspended by injunction, or by a state of war; and (6), By the near relationship of the parties. an incumbrance upon the land, as no 63 title had *been made. But they do not admit that Erskine had either actual or constructive notice of the debt due to Beirne & Co. They had been informed that the debt of Beirne & Co. had been paid by Buckingham in work; and they furthermore rely upon the lapse of time and the presumption of payment arising therefrom, as a protection against the debt.

Beirne also answered the bill. After referring to the deed of trust to secure his debt, he denied that his debt had been paid; the only payments made upon it being endorsed upon the bond, and a considerable balance remaining due. To repel the presumption of payment from lapse of time, he exhibited two papers, by which his debt was recognized by Buckingham, as a subsisting debt, in July 1838; and he alleged that Buckingham absconded from the county in 1839 or 1840, and was then regarded as insolvent; and the removal of the trustee Goshen from Virginia interposed serious obstacles to a sale by the trustee.

He stated further, that in January 1827 Buckingham executed and delivered to him an order to North the plaintiff, requesting him to deliver to P. Beirne & Co. the title bond for the thirty-four acres of land which North had agreed to let him have for building his house, as soon as said Buckingham had finished the same according to contract. That this order was presented to North, who by an endorsement thereon accepted the same, and agreed to assign to P. Beirne & Co. the said title bond, as soon as said Buckingham completed the work on plaintiff's house agreeably to his contract with him. That nothing was said at the time of the acceptance by the plaintiff, of any right he had to retain the title bond as an indemnity against his liability to Parris as surety of Buckingham; and that he took the acceptance as security for the debt to Beirne & Co., supposing that as soon as the 64 work on the house was *completed according to contract, North would assign the title bond to him. That in August following he took the deed of trust to secure his debt; at which time he had no notice of the equity asserted in the plaintiff's bill.

The documents set out in the bill and answers are correctly described. The deed to secure the debt due to Beirne & Co. describes the land in controversy as one lot or parcel of land lying in the county of Greenbrier, adjacent to the town of Lewisburg, containing thirty-four acres and some odd poles, more or less, it being the same land which John A. North purchased of George W. McClenachan, which lot or parcel of land was designated as lot No. 15, and which the said Buckingham purchased of the said John A. North. In the deed to secure the debt due to Erskine & Co. this land is described as a parcel of land containing thirty-four acres, lying near the town of Lewisburg, it being the lot of ground that said Buckingham purchased from John A. North, and North purchased the said thirty-four acres from Washington McClenachan. The title bond executed by Buckingham to Henry Erskine in April 1835, describes the land sold as a lot of ground near Lewisburg, containing thirty-four acres; and the condition is, that so soon as the said Buckingham clears the said lot of all incumbrances which are now on it, and makes unto the said Erskine a good title to said lot, that said Erskine is to pay Buckingham, in his debts, the sum of seven hundred dollars for said lot.

In the progress of the cause the court directed an account of the debts of the plaintiff and defendants; and the commissioner made a report showing that there was due to the plaintiff two hundred and ninety-five dollars and seventeen cents; that there was due to P. Beirne & Co. seven hundred and eleven dollars and 65 *twenty-six cents; and that there was due to Henry Erskine & Co. three thousand one hundred and thirty-one dollars and thirty-five cents.

The executors of Erskine excepted to the report of the commissioner as to the debt due to Beirne & Co. on the ground, 1st. That the lapse of time raised the presumption of payment. 2d. That there had been an adversary possession in Erskine for more than fifteen years. 3d. That the circumstances strengthen the presumption of payment from lapse of time. And they relied on the two papers filed by Beirne with his answer. They also objected that there should have been an additional credit upon the debt. Upon the last two points the facts are stated by Judge Daniel, as they are upon the question of the solvency of Buckingham at the time he left the country.

When the cause came on to be finally heard, the court held that North was to be first paid out of the proceedings of the land; that the debt of Beirne & Co. was to be next satisfied; and then that of Erskine & Co. And it was decreed that unless Buckingham or some one for him should, within one month from the date of the decree, pay the plaintiff his debt and the costs of suit, and should also pay to Beirne his debt, that certain commissioners named, should proceed to sell, &c. And a commissioner was appointed to convey the title from the heirs of McClenachan to Buckingham before the sale of the land by the commissioners. From this decree the executors of Erskine applied to this court for an appeal; which was allowed.

DANIEL, J. In the view which I take of this case, it is not necessary to consider the general proposition in respect to the right of a party, who has been in the 66 *possession of land, for a sufficient length of time to bar an entry, under an executory agreement for its purchase made with one who had himself acquired the possession under a like agreement with a third party, to set up his possession as adverse to the rights of the latter, and to resist by the plea of the statute of limitations the claim of the latter to execute his lien for an unpaid balance of purchase money due by his immediate vendee.

The state of the facts admit, in my opinion, of the application of a well-established and indeed undisputed principle, under the operation of which the defence of Erskine's representatives and heirs, so far as it is rested on the pretension of a possession adverse to the lien of North, must fail. The principle to which I advert is the one stated by Judge Lomax in his Digest, as regulating the fourth class of cases in which an adversary possession will be negatived. The terms in which he announces the principle are, that when the possessor has acknowledged a title in the claimant, then the possession will not be deemed adverse; and wherever the act of the possessor acknowledges a right in the claimant, the statute will not operate, because such an acknowledgment deduced from circumstances, negatives the idea of adverse possession. 1 Lomax's Digest, 2d ed. p. 625.

It is admitted that Erskine acquired possession under the title bond of Buckingham executed in 1835; and in the condition of said bond it is stipulated that so soon as Buckingham clears the lot of all incumbrances which are now on it, and makes unto Erskine a good title to said lot, Erskine is to pay Buckingham, in his debts, the sum of seven hundred dollars for said lot.

Here was an acknowledgment by Erskine that there were incumbrances on the land, and the payment by him of the purchase money (by giving Buckingham a 67 *discharge of his indebtedness to Erskine to the extent of seven hundred dollars) was made dependent on Buckingham's clearing off the incumbrances and making a good title. Erskine must be held to have known what those incumbrances were. It is a familiar rule that a purchaser stands affected with notice of all that is apparent on the face of the instruments under which he claims, and of such other facts as those already known put him on enquiry for, and as such enquiry, pursued with ordinary diligence and prudence, would bring to his knowledge. 2 Rob. Pr. 29, and cases there cited.

We must presume that, if not otherwise informed of the character and extent of the incumbrances mentioned in the title bond, he enquired for and obtained the information from Buckingham before or when he became a party to it, and accepted the stipulations contained in the condition.

Indeed, it is not denied in the answer of Erskine's executors, that Erskine bought with such knowledge. On the contrary, they say "they suppose that at the time of the purchase of said lot the said Erskine had notice that a balance of purchase money was due to the plaintiff, which operated as an incumbrance on the land, as no title had been made." It further appears that in the deed of trust, executed by Buckingham in September 1830, for the security of Erskine, the lot in controversy is conveyed and is there described and identified as "the lot of ground that said Buckingham purchased from John A. North, and North purchased the said thirty-four acres from Washington McClenachan, agreeably to the plat and survey of the said Washington McClenachan." And in the title bond of McClenachan to North we see that the lot is designated "as lot No. 15 in the division of his (McClenachan's) land into lots as laid down in the plat and survey thereof, made by Josiah Shanklin."
68 *From these facts and considerations we can draw no other conclusion than that Erskine had full and accurate information as to the state of the title, and as to all liens and incumbrances on the property; and as there is no satisfactory proof that there were, at the date of Buckingham's title bond to Erskine, any other incumbrances on the lot than North's lien for the balance of the purchase money, and the deed of trust to Goshen for the benefit of Beirne (with the exception of the deed of trust before mentioned, made for the benefit of Erskine), the further conclusion is equally clear, that North's lien was one of the incumbrances intended to be embraced by the term "all incumbrances," used in the condition of said bond: and hence there arises necessarily the implication of an acknowledgment by Erskine of the validity and subsistence of the lien aforesaid. The case thus falls obviously within the influence of the rule already stated, and there is nothing in a possession acquired under such circumstances on which to found the statutory bar, or the analogous defence in a court of equity.

The presumption of a grant contended for by the appellants' counsel in his argument, is, it seems to me, equally groundless. For whether it is sought to presume such a grant to Erskine or to Buckingham, it is obvious that the lapse of time from which to make the presumption cannot have its commencement at any point anterior to the date of the acknowledgment by Erskine of North's lien; and the interval between that date and the date of the institution of the suit, is something short of eighteen years. From the period of Erskine's acknowledgment of North's lien, the latter stood, obviously, on the same ground, in equity, in respect to said lien, that he would have occupied had he been the immediate vendor of Erskine; and it is well settled by the decisions of this court 69 in Hanna *v. Wilson, 3 Gratt. 243, and other cases, that in a suit brought by a vendor against his vendee to subject the land sold to sale for the purchase money in arrear, the lien of the vendor is not affected by any lapse of time short of the period sufficient to raise the presumption of payment.

The argument in favor of presuming a grant to Erskine, labors under another insuperable difficulty: For the appellants, so far from relying on such a presumption in their answer, set up their claim in terms which exclude all idea of a grant to Erskine. They say in their answer, that Erskine was put in possession of the lot at the time of the execution of the title bond in 1835; and that this possession "was held by him the said Erskine from that time down to the time of his death, and has been held by his widow ever since, claiming it under the title bond aforesaid. Here is an admission that from the commencement of Erskine's possession down to the date of the answer, there had been no change in the character of the possession or in the title to which it should be referred. And I apprehend that it is a well established principle that a grant will never be presumed in favor of a party who by his answer expressly or impliedly admits that no grant has been made. Roberts v. King, 10 Gratt. 184.

The only question between North and the appellants, remaining to be considered, is, Whether or not we should presume a payment of North's debt?

And here again it seems to me obvious that we cannot look beyond the date of Buckingham's title bond to Erskine for the period from whence to reckon the lapse of time whereon to found the presumption. The subsistence of the debt at that date is a fact which we must take to be established by the implied acknowledgment of Erskine, contained in the condition of the bond.

The presumption having been repelled
70 by an *acknowledgment within twenty years, the general rule would require the lapse of twenty years from the date of the acknowledgment in order to establish the presumption. And the circumstances of the case, so far from being of a character to justify us in departing from the general rule, and receiving a shorter period than twenty years as the basis of the presumption, favor, in my opinion, the opposite conclusion.

North had no lien for the payment of his debt on any property of Buckingham, other than the land in question. There is no pretence that the debt has been paid either by Beirne or Erskine in ease of their subsequent incumbrances. Unless, then, North has received payment from Buckingham, the inference is that the debt is yet unpaid. That he did thus obtain or could thus have obtained satisfaction of his debt, is rendered extremely improbable by the testimony in respect to Buckingham's pecuniary condition. The testimony of McPherson, taken alone, is sufficient to show that he was insolvent in a month or two after the date of his title bond to Erskine; for it appears thereby that an execution against him, which issued from the clerk's office of the Superior court of the county in May 1835, returnable to the July rules, was returned "No property found liable to distress." The testimony of the other witnesses does not, I think, conflict with this conclusion. Frazer evidently regards him as an insolvent man for many years before he left the state. Though he succeeded in making out of his effects two several sums of money (both of which it is to be inferred from his testimony were inconsiderable in amount), the one under a distress warrant, and the other under an old execution, his testimony yet tends strongly to prove that he was not in possession of a sufficiency of unencumbered property to have satisfied North's debt. The articles of furniture and other personal property mentioned in the 71 deposition *of Dunn as being in the possession of Buckingham in 1833 and in 1834, and which the witness thinks continued in his possession in 1840, are of the same character and description with those conveyed in the deeds to Erskine and Beirne; and there is no evidence to show that they were not in fact the same. This evidence is not inconsistent with that of McPherson and Frazer. Indeed, Dunn says he was much involved, and that he contracted a debt with him in part for necessary supplies, amounting to seventy dollars, which he "could not get pay for."

The inability of Buckingham to pay North's debt out of any other property than the lot in question, is thus, I think, satisfactorily established. He appears to have been unable to pay, and the presumption is, he did not pay. Not only so, but it is shown that he moved from the state, and permanently abandoned it as a residence as early as in the winter of 1841-2, only seven years after the date of this acknowledgment of the debt by Erskine. If, therefore, there had been a lapse of twenty years instead of something less than eighteen from the date of such acknowledgment to that of the institution of the suit, the rules of law applicable to the case would declare the presumption of payment to be clearly rebutted: Wood v. Deen, 1 Ired. R. 230; Daggett v. Tallman, 8 Conn. R. 168; Mann v. Manning, 12 Smeedes & Marsh. 615.

The rights of Erskine, therefore, so far as they depend on his contract with Buckingham in 1835, and possession under it, are subordinate to North's lien.

His claim under his deed of trust of 1830 stands upon no better footing. The deed is the conveyance of a mere equity by a party, out of possession, who had never had the possession, and who had as yet neither a right to the possession of the land nor a right to the possession of the evidences of the equitable title under which he 72 claimed. There is no testimony *in the cause which tends to prove a possession by Buckingham at a period earlier than at some date in 1832. Were it necessary, to the establishment of North's right to take precedence of the deed of trust, to prove that Erskine had notice of North's lien at the time of the execution of the deed, all the elements of the proof are to be found in the transaction itself. Erskine is presumed to have known that Buckingham had no other than an equitable title, and the deed itself refers to North as the source from which it was acquired.

Nor do I think that any sufficient reason is shown why North should not also take precedence of Beirne. Beirne's incumbrance, like Erskine's, is taken on a mere equity, from a party who had not yet acquired the possession or even a right to the transfer of the evidences of the equitable title of the party from whom he had purchased. Not only so; but Beirne took this deed of trust with full notice and a clear acknowledgment of North's title. The paper of the 9th January 1827 refers to the contract between North and Buckingham; and is an order by the latter on the former for a delivery of the title bond for the land, to Beirne, on the completion of the performance of the contract by Buckingham. In a few months thereafter, to wit, on the 24th of August 1827, Beirne obtains his deed on this same lot, and on other property, real and personal. In the deed the lot is described as "one lot or parcel of land lying and being in the county of Greenbrier, adjacent to the town of Lewisburg, containing thirty-four acres and some odd poles, more or less, it being the same land which John A. North purchased of George W. McClenachan, which lot or parcel of land is designated as lot No. 15, adjoining lot No. 16, which John Mays and William Smith purchased of the aforesaid G. W. McClenachan, and which lot or parcel 73 of land, as above described, *the said Buckingham purchased of the said John A. North." Here is a plain and minute reference to the several links in the title to the land. There is no intimation in the answer of Beirne of any change in the title or in the evidences of the title between the date of the order and that of the deed. He knew, therefore, that Buckingham had not in the meantime acquired the legal title. He knew that he was obtaining a lien on a mere equity; and he stands charged with full notice and with a plain recognition of North's prior lien.

It is insisted, however, by the counsel of Beirne, in his argument here, that the order of the 9th of January 1827, and the qualified acceptance thereof, endorsed thereon by North, when taken together, amount to an admission by North, that all which Buckingham had then to do, in order to entitle him to a delivery of the title bond, was to complete the building of the house, and to an agreement on the part of North that he would deliver over the bond to Beirne on such completion. It cannot be denied that the papers, read without a reference to the state of things existing at the time, are susceptible of such a construction. And if it appeared that Beirne did in fact so understand the papers, and acted on that understanding, and thereby sustained loss, the argument of an estoppel on North to deny the construction contended for, would be one of great force.

Against the claim of Beirne so to construe the papers it may be fairly argued, that they referred to the contract between Buckingham and North; that on looking to that contract Beirne must have seen that Buckingham's right to the assignment of the title bond depended not merely on his completing the building of the house, but also on his paying the two notes to Parris, in which North was the security of Buckingham; that he must have further 74 seen that one of those *notes was not in fact payable till March 1827, and that he could hardly have supposed that Buckingham, in his embarrassed condition, had anticipated the payment, or that North would surrender the title bond till it was paid; that the language used by North in his acceptance, "As soon as Elisha Buckingham completes the work of my house agreeably to his contract with me, I will assign the within specified title bond agreeably to my contract, to P. Beirne & Co." was in some respects equivocal: And that fair dealing to North no less than a prudent regard to his own interests, required of Beirne that he should have enquired of North whether the notes to Parris were paid, and if not, whether it was the purpose of North to bind himself by the acceptance aforesaid to deliver over the title bond before they were paid.

On the other hand, however, it is to be observed that North, as the writer of the acceptance, and as the party undertaking to be bound by it, was especially called upon to be clear and explicit. He saw that by the terms of Buckingham's order he was required to let Beirne & Co. have the title bond as soon as Buckingham should finish the house according to the contract. If by the acceptance he did not mean to deliver the bond on the happening of that event, but only on the complete performance of the entire contract between him and Buckingham, by the payment of the notes aforesaid by the latter, it was his duty to have so qualified his acceptance, and in terms not liable to be misunderstood. According to the construction which he places on his own language, it was well calculated to mislead. And if Beirne had shown that he had been misled by it to his injury, it seems to me that equity would have required us to visit the loss on North as the party most in fault, rather than on Beirne. But in fact, there is nothing to show, and Beirne no where asserts, that relying on the 75 title bond as a security, *freed from North's debt, he had been for a moment stayed in his pursuit of other means of Buckingham to satisfy or secure his debt. His deed of trust seems to contain a sweeping conveyance of all the property then owned by Buckingham, down to the most minute articles of household and kitchen furniture. It is not pretended that he paid any thing for the order. It was taken to secure an existing debt. There is no proof that North received or was to receive any thing for the supposed surrender of his lien, or that Beirne came to any loss by supposing it to be surrendered. There is, therefore, no consideration for the agreement, on the part of North, which it is sought to construe out of the language of his acceptance.

There are, too, strong circumstances to show that, if Beirne ever understood North as intending such an admission or agreement as is now supposed by his counsel, he soon came to view the subject in a different light. For in his answer he admits that North more than once, perhaps several times told him that he held a lien on the lot for about one hundred dollars, though he does not doubt that these communications were made after the date of the deed of trust from Buckingham for his (Beirne's) benefit, as it appears that it was not ascertained till November 1831, by the settlement between North and Buckingham, what the balance due by the latter was. Now, what is more unnatural and improbable, than that Beirne should have refrained, on these occasions (if he really then understood North's acceptance in the light now insisted on by his counsel), from referring North to his acceptance, and insisting that it was not admissible for him then to set up such a lien in the face of his own agreement and admission: Yet, he does not aver that he denied on any one of these occasions, the justice of North's pretension. And so far from relying in his answer on such 76 *supposed agreement and admission as an estoppel, he in another part of his answer expresses a perfect willingness that an account should be taken by a commissioner of the court, to ascertain what may be still due on the several incumbrances. It is true he submits to the court whether the endorsement on the written contract of February 1826, made in the handwriting of North, and signed and sealed by Buckingham, does not operate a release and discharge of whatever lien North may have had by virtue of the said contract. The said endorsement admits, it seems to me, of no such construction as that suggested. On the contrary, whilst it ascertains the balance due by Buckingham on the settlement of the Parris notes, which North surrenders to Buckingham, it contains no intimation of a purpose on the part of North to surrender his lien on the land for such balance. The legal effect of the transaction, as between North and Buckingham, was to substitute the sealed acknowledgment by Buckingham of the amount due North on account of his having paid the notes, in place of the notes. North, instead of holding a lien on the land for the amount appearing to be due by the notes, was thenceforward to hold his lien only for the smaller and true amount, found due on the settlement, of which the sealed acknowledgment of Buckingham was the evidence. And as the said acknowledgment (if it might have been) has not been excepted to as evidence either by Beirne or Erskine, it may be properly referred to as proof of the true balance of debt for which North had a right, as against both of them, to execute his lien on the 17th of November 1831, the date of the acknowledgment.

It is further to be observed, that there is no evidence of any demand ever having been made by Beirne on North for the delivery of the title bond. If he really considered that he was entitled to the 77 possession of it, *it is difficult to conjecture why there is an entire absence of proof, as well as of averment, on his part, of his having called for it.

The question as to any presumption, in Beirne's favor, of a payment or satisfaction of North's debt, or of a release of his lien, arising from lapse of time, seems to me to have been already satisfactorily answered, in effect, by what I have said in respect to the like presumption set up by Erskine. For though more than twenty years have elapsed between the date of Buckingham's sealed acknowledgment just spoken of, and the institution of the suit, the facts of Buckingham's insolvency and removal from the state long before any such presumption could attach, and of the absence of any other source than the land, from which North could have procured payment, are, under the influence of the authorities which I have cited, amply sufficient to repel the presumption.

The questions remaining to be disposed of are those between the appellants and Beirne.

And in comparing, in the first place, the rights of Erskine and Beirne under their respective deeds of trust, I throw out of view, as unnecessary, any enquiry as to whether Erskine, at the time of obtaining his deed, is to be held as having had notice, either actual or constructive, of Beirne's deed. The two incumbrances are both upon a mere equity given by a party not in possession. And as to any benefit which Erskine's representatives can claim from the fact that his deed was duly recorded, the same benefit is enjoyed by Beirne, as his deed was also duly recorded. If, therefore, we throw out of consideration all question of notice, the equities of the respective claimants under the two deeds would appear to be exactly equal, with the exception that Beirne's deed was the first executed and the first recorded. This exception is, however, all sufficient to 78 turn the scales in favor of Beirne, *as priority, in time, is, in such cases, according to a familiar rule, equivalent in equity to superiority of right.

And as to any questions between these two parties, growing out of the contract between Buckingham and Erskine in 1835, and the possession of the latter under it, they seem to me to have been mainly anticipated in considering the like questions between North and Erskine. And I do not think that the considerations which have been urged by the counsel of the appellants, as growing out of the transactions evidenced by the exhibits Nos. 2 and 3, filed with Beirne's answer, can affect the result. The first of these two exhibits is a statement, under the seal of Buckingham, made the first day of July 1830, showing how the proceeds of a tract of land sold, under the deed of trust to Beirne, in November 1828, were to be applied. The transaction, from the history given of it in the statement, appears to have been in all respects fair and reasonable. Certainly there is nothing on the face of it whereon to found any suspicion of fraud on the part of Beirne. He was to apply to the credit of the debt secured by the deed of trust, the whole of the price bid for the land at the sale. Whether Buckingham would go on to complete his contract with Mays, and thus place it in his power to perfect the title, on which event the finality of the sale and the payment of the additional sum of three hundred and seven dollars by Miller, the highest bidder at the sale, depended, was a matter which Beirne could not control. Under this state of things, I know of no rule forbidding Beirne from agreeing with Buckingham that the latter should go on and finish his contract with Mays, and thus perfect the title; and that out of the whole price which Miller would then pay for the land, the one hundred and eighty-eight dollars bid by Miller at the sale, and which was all that could be obtained for the land in 79 *the then condition of the title, should be credited on the bond secured by the deed; whilst the three hundred and seven dollars, the residue of the whole purchase money to be paid by Miller for an unencumbered title, should go as a credit to the other debts of Buckingham due to Beirne, and not secured by the deed.

And in any conceivable aspect of the transaction, I am wholly at a loss to conceive how Erskine or his representatives can have any grounds to complain of it, seeing that neither his deed of trust nor his contract with Buckingham was then in existence.

The other exhibit, No. 3, seems to be a statement under the seal of Buckingham, of a settlement of all matters of account between him and Beirne, subsequent to the deed of trust, and not connected with it. It is true, that on the settlement there is an item of debit of five dollars and twenty-five cents, "amount for drawing and recording deed;" and as the deed provides for the payment of the expense attending the drawing, recording and certifying the deed out of the moneys arising from a sale under the deed, it is argued that if the bond secured by the deed had not been paid by the one hundred and eighty-eight dollars, it is fair to presume that it too would have been brought into the settlement. For why (it is asked) bring the trifling debt of five dollars and twenty-five cents, secured by the deed, into the settlement, and omit the six hundred and sixty-four dollars, also secured by the deed. The sum of three hundred and seven dollars, "the amount received of Miller, after deducting one hundred and eighty-eight dollars, credited on bond secured by deed," is the main item of credit to Buckingham; and as by the agreement evidenced by the sealed paper of the 1st July 1830, the three hundred and seven dollars were to be applied to the discharge of the debts not secured by the deed, the fair explanation, I think, is, that the true object of the settlement was 80 *to show how Beirne had disposed of the three hundred and seven dollars. After charging Buckingham with the debts ot secured by the deed, there would have been a small balance of five dollars and ninety-nine cents due to him. The expenses of drawing and recording the deed were in all probability not paid by Beirne till after the deed was recorded; and when he paid them, he no doubt charged them to Buckingham as an item of debit against the three hundred and seven dollars. Having paid them, there was no legal necessity for his waiting till a sale should take place under the deed. Buckingham, if he could have objected, did not object to Beirne's retaining them out of the small balance in his hands. By retaining them, the trifling balance of seventy-four cents was left due to Buckingham on the settlement.

To bring the bond into the settlement, and to go into a calculation of interest, apply the credits, &c., was a matter foreign to the main object of the settlement. Besides, the language used both in the sealed instrument and in the settlement, in respect to the one hundred and eighty-eight dollars, repels the idea that the bond would be or had been paid in full, by the one hundred and eighty-eight dollars. In the former, it is required that it should be "placed as a credit" on the debt secured by the deed; and in the latter, it is stated that it was so applied.

And again: the argument, of a payment in full of the bond, is strongly repelled by the consideration that if such had been the fact, the bond ought to have been in the possession of Buckingham. Yet Beirne continues to hold it, and files it and its endorsements, with his answer, as an exhibit in the cause.

Upon the whole, I see nothing in the papers referred to, to weaken the implication of an acknowledgment by Erskine, in his contract of 1835 with Buckingham, that Beirne's debt was one of the in-81 cumbrances *to be cleared off by Buckingham, or to affect the bearing and influence of such acknowledgment on the rights of Erskine sought to be founded on his possession under said contract. The defences which Erskine seeks to raise out of his possession, as against Beirne, are the same with those relied on in his controversy with North. And I am of the opinion that the facts and course of reasoning which led to the conclusion that those defences could not prevail against North, apply sufficiently to the case as between Erskine and Beirne, to show that they ought not to prevail against Beirne.

And, on the question of a presumption of payment, it is to be observed that Beirne has the advantage of the additional fact that the trustee (Goshen) in the deed of trust for Beirne's benefit, moved from the state as early as in the fall of 1842.

The only proof of any sale under the deed, is that furnished by Beirne in the exhibits Nos. 2 and 3, and in his endorsement on the bond of a credit of the net proceeds of such sale. And the only proof of any further payment on the bond, is also furnished by Beirne, in a further endorsement on the bond. To these proofs, the commissioner,

I think, properly referred as the basis of his statement of the balance due to Beirne.

It seems to me that the decree is right in all respects, and ought to be affirmed.

82 *Cox & als. v. McMullin.

July Term, 1857, Lewisburg.

(Absent LEE, J.*)

1. Tenants in Common—Equitable Title—Appropriation of Specific Portion.†—There are two tenants in common of land having but an equitable title. One of them cannot appropriate to himself any specific portion thereof, or do any other act whatever in derogation of the right of the other to enjoy equally with himself the common property and every parcel of it.

2. Same—Legal Title Held by One Joint Owner—Conveyance by Him to Stranger—Effect.‡—The legal title to the land held in common being conveyed to one of the joint owners, he reciting that he owns the whole, conveys one-half of it to a third person, and purports to convey the upper moiety. But it will be held that the deed passed only an equal undivided moiety of the common subject: and that the other joint owner and the grantee held in common the whole subject, and every part thereof.

3. Same—Conveyance of Specific Portion by One Tenant—Effect upon Partition.§—Although a party holding in common with others, can do nothing to impair or vary in the slightest decree the rights of his cotenants; yet if he execute a deed for a specific portion of the common subject, or make a contract in regard to it; and upon partition such portion falls in severalty to the party so making the deed or contract, he will be bound by his act.

4. Partition—How Made—Under Statute.|—In the partition of real estate, each part owner is entitled to have in severalty a part equal to his interest in the whole subject, if this is practicable, with a due regard to the interests of all concerned. But if such partition cannot be made without imparing the portions of some others, the property may be divided into shares of unequal values, and the inequality may be corrected by a charge of money on the more valuable in favor of the less valuable portion, or by other means recognized in the law of partition. Code, ch. 124, § 2, p. 526.

5. Same — Allotment — Assignment.¶—The general rule of partition requires an allotment of the several parcels to the part owners: yet it may benefit both classes of owners to assign the parcels; or it may benefit one class without injury to the other, to assign rather than to allot. And in either case, the commissioners may avoid the risk of an unfortunate allotment, by resorting to an assignment.

83 *This was a bill in the Circuit court of Kanawha county, filed by William A. McMullin against Charles A. Cox and others, for the partition of a tract of eighty acres of land bounded on the Kanawha river, and which constituted what was called a salt property. The plaintiff and James M. Laidley and two infant children of Grant, owned one moiety of the property, and Charles A. Cox and his brothers and sisters, children of William A. Cox deceased, owned the other moiety. The case, as made out by the pleadings and evidence, is substantially as follows:

In 1815 a patent issued to John Wilson for two hundred acres of land bounded on the Kanawha river. On the tenth May 1816 Wilson conveyed to James E. Harris one-fifth part in quantity of this tract, which was to be laid off at the upper end of the survey: This land was afterwards conveyed to John J. ‡Same—Deed from One Tenant—Effect.—In Woods v. Early, 95 Va. 313, 28 S. E. Rep. 374, the principal case is cited as authority for the proposition that the conveyance from a tenant in common carries to the grantee or grantees only an undivided interest in the property, it matters not by what description the interest in the property is conveyed.

In Buchanan v. King, 22 Gratt. 422, it was said: "It is well settled that a conveyance by metes and bounds of part of an estate held in common, though valid against the grantor, cannot prejudice the rights of the co-tenant, unless followed by entry and adversary possession. The grantee becomes thereby merely a tenant in common with the co-tenants of his grantor; his possession is in presumption of law, the possession of all, and is to be deemed in support and not in derogation of the common title. Robinett v. Preston, 2 Rob. 273; Hannon v. Hannah, 9 Gratt. 146."

§Same—Conveyance of Specific Portion of Property by One Tenant—Effect upon Partition.—In accord with the proposition succinctly and clearly laid down in the third headnote, see McKee v. Barley, 11 Gratt. 346; Robinett v. Preston, 2 Rob. 277. See also, principal case cited as to this point in Worthington v. Staunton, 16 W. Va. 208, 240.

|Partition—How Made.—On this subject, see Howery v. Helms, 20 Gratt. 1, and foot-note; in which note it is shown that, while at common law partition must be in kind, yet, by statute (Code of 1849, ch. 124, § 2, p. 526, Code 1887, § 2564). when necessary for the best interest of all concerned, a sale may be decreed.

In Roberts v. Coleman, 37 W. Va. 158, 16 S. E. Rep. 487, it was said: "Notwithstanding this statute, prima facie partition must be in kind; each parcener being allotted his several share. Custis v. Snead, 12 Gratt. 260; Cox v. McMullen, 14 Gratt. 82."

¶Same — Allotment — Assignment. — In Henrie v. Johnson, 28 W. Va. 194, it was said: "The court has no right to make an arbitrary allotment. It should, so far as it can do so without injustice to others, assign each co-tenant that part most valuable to him. If there are several parcels, it need not divide each parcel, but may assign one parcel to each co-tenant. (Freem. on Co-tenancy and Partition, § 522; Smith v. Barber, 7 Ohio, part 2, 118; Hill v. Dey, 14 Wend. 204; Cox v. McMullen, 14 Gratt. 82.)"

January 1819 John Wilson executed two deeds, by one of which he conveyed to Joseph Lovell one undivided fourth part of the remaining one hundred and sixty acres; and by the other he conveyed a like undivided fourth part to Alexander Grant. The land conveyed to Joseph Lovell came by intermediate conveyances to Frederick Brooks; and he held the lower part of the tract on the river, whereon are salt wells, &c. The part conveyed to Alexander Grant he conveyed to James Bream; and he dying, it was conveyed by Mrs. Bream to Mrs. Betty W. Lovell for life, with remainder to her children. The part held by Bream, and after him by the Lovells, lay on the river next above that held by Brooks.

Although the patent for this land was issued to John Wilson, Andrew Donnally seems to have had some equitable claim to it; and he seems to have been in possession of the eighty acres not conveyed away by Wilson, prior to 1821. On the 16th of 84 August of that *year he entered into a covenant with James Wilson, by which he bound himself to Wilson that he would proceed to bore for salt water on this eighty acres of land, owned as he says, by the said Donnally, lying on the Kanawha river between the furnaces of Cabell and Trimble and those of Lovell. And if the said Donnally shall obtain good salt water for one furnace of the usual size, he shall proceed to erect one good furnace, &c. And then the said James Wilson is to be entitled and Donnally covenants to convey to him, one equal undivided moiety of the said eighty acres of land; so that the said Donnally and Wilson shall be joint and equal owners and proprietors of the said eighty acres, as tenants in common. And the said Donnally covenants that he has full right, lawful power and authority to convey the said land, and that his title thereto is full, complete and indefeasible, and that he will convey to the said Wilson a moiety of the said land as aforesaid, clear of all incumbrances; and will warrant the same to the said Wilson and his heirs against the claims of all persons whatsoever. Wilson then covenants to convey to Donnally certain lands, and to build certain machinery for the manufacture of salt; and the parties then declare, that the salt well, furnace or furnaces, and the lands therein before covenanted to be bored, constructed or conveyed, are to be held, used, enjoyed and worked, at the joint expense of the said Donnally and Wilson, to be a joint and equal property between them; they equally sustaining the losses and receiving the rents and profits thereon. In January 1829 James Wilson assigned his interest in this agreement to Peter Grant.

In August 1822 an article of agreement was entered into between Donnally, James Wilson, Bream, Lovell and Ruffner, which recited that they were the joint owners of a tract of one hundred and sixty acres of land, in the following proportions, 85 viz: Donnally and Wilson one-half, James Bream one-fourth, and Lovell and Ruffner one-fourth; that upon said land coal had been discovered near the furnaces; that the front or bottom land upon the river had been divided; and for the purpose of settling their rights to the hill land and coal, it is agreed, that Donnally shall be at liberty to take coal for two furnaces, Wilson for one furnance; Bream for two furnaces; Lovell for one furnace, and Ruffner for one, and no more. That the parties may take coal to burn in their own families, and also any small quantity which they may find it convenient to haul to town or in the neighborhood, but not for the purpose of making salt. This arrangement was to be taken for a division of the hill land, which from its situation was incapable of a convenient division by boundaries. In April 1844 William R. Cox, who had purchased out John Ruffner's interest, covenanted to abide by the terms of the foregoing agreement.

On the 1st of February 1830 John Wilson conveyed to Donnally the eighty acres of land before mentioned; and on the next day Donnally conveyed one moiety thereof and of a salt well thereon, to John J. Cabell. The deed recited the fact that Donnally owned eighty acres of the land patented to John Wilson, on which tract there was a salt well, one-half of which eighty acres and of the salt well it was his purpose to convey to Cabell; and then proceeded to grant, bargain and sell to Cabell the said forty acres of land above described, being one-half of the said eighty acres; which said forty acres so conveyed, with half the salt well thereon, lies next below and adjoining another forty acres owned and occupied by the said John J. Cabell and Walter Trimble. And he conveys to Cabell, subject to the agreement aforesaid, in relation to the coal on the two hundred acre tract.

86 *In July 1832 John J. Cabell conveyed to James Hewitt, who had married a daughter of Peter Grant, all his interest in and title to (it being one equal half thereof) a certain salt gum or well on the land owned equally by said Cabell and the heirs of Peter Grant, with every right and privilege necessary to the full and complete enjoyment thereof. And in October 1833 Andrew Donnally, by deed reciting his agreement with James Wilson, the assignment of his interest in that agreement by Wilson to Peter Grant, and the death of Grant, conveyed to the children of Peter Grant, one of whom was Mrs. Hewitt, the undivided moiety of the said eighty acres of land. And about the year 1845 seven of these children conveyed their interest in said tract of land to the plaintiff, William A. McMullin, who afterwards conveyed a moiety of his interest to James M. Laidley.

In October 1833 John J. Cabell conveyed to William R. Cox and Samuel Hannah all his right, title and interest in and to forty acres of land, with a salt well thereon, adjoining the lands owned and occupied by Walter Trimble, it being the land conveyed to him by Andrew Donnally. The said land and the salt well thereon to be held subject to the agreement with Lovell, Bream and others. And Cabell covenanted to complete the boring of a well then in progress, or at least go to four hundred feet if the requisite quantity of salt water should not be sooner found. Hannah afterwards sold his interest in this property to the defendant Charles A. Cox; and William R. Cox died, having bequeathed his interest to his children, of whom Charles A. Cox was one.

It appears from the evidence that the eighty acres embraced in the agreement between Donnally and James Wilson, fronted about sixty-eight poles on the Kanawha river, and that the land between the river and the bluff was a narrow 87 strip through which the *public road ran; and there was little room in this space which was not occupied either by McMullin and Laidley or the Coxes. It appeared further, from the report of the surveyor made in the cause, that Cox occupied the part of the lot next to Trimble, and McMullin occupied the part next to Lovell: but McMullin obtained the salt water he used from the well bored by Donnally under his agreement with James Wilson, which is on the upper part of the tract; and Cox procured the water used by him, from two wells on the lower half of the tract, one of which was bored by Cabell, and deepened by Cox, and the other was bored by Cox. The land above the bluff seems to have been principally valuable for coal.

In the progress of the cause commissioners were appointed to divide the land, between the river and bluff, between McMullin and Laidley on the one part, and Charles A. Cox and the devisees of his father on the other; and to divide the surface of the hill land between these and also Brooks and the Lovells. These commissioners made a report, by which it appeared that they had divided the land between the river and the bluff into two equal parts as to quantity; and they had assigned the lower part containing the wells bored by Cabell and Cox, to McMullin and Laidley, and had assigned the upper part to Cox, reserving to McMullin and Laidley all the right, title and interest they might have in and to the salt well on that moiety: and they made no allowance to Cox for the wells which had been bored by Cabell under whom he claimed, or by himself, nor for the buildings he had put upon the land assigned to McMullin and Laidley. The hill land was divided into lots, and assigned by the commissioners to the different parties; and as to that there was no complaint; but Cox excepted to the report of the division of the land between the river and the bluff, on the ground, 1st. That it made no
88 division of the salt *wells, except to give the entire well on the part allotted to Cox and the heirs of Wm. R. Cox, to the other party. 2d. That it gave the lower half of the front on the river to McMullin and Laidley, with its two salt wells, engines and fixtures, the wells having been bored by Cabell and Cox, at their own expense. 3d. Because it assigns to McMullin and Laidley the water cistern built by Cox, at his own expense.

When the cause came on to be heard, the court overruled the exceptions, and confirmed the report; and made a decree directing that Cox should surrender to the complainant and Laidley the moiety of the lot assigned to them, with the tenements and two salt wells thereon; and that complainant and Laidley should surrender the other moiety to Cox, except the salt well, and sufficient space for all necessary fixtures to work the same, and a right of way thereto and therefrom, and for pipes and conduits to conduct the salt water therefrom; but they were to surrender to the Coxes the use of one-half of said salt well, to be used and enjoyed by them until the further order of the court; the question as to the right of the Coxes to one moiety of the well being reserved for future consideration.

And on the motion of the Coxes, it was ordered that a commissioner of the court should take an account of rents and profits and of permanent improvements put upon the lot assigned to McMullin and Laidley by the Coxes, and those under whom they claim; and also an account of the rents and profits of the salt well on the lot assigned to them. And accounts were also directed at the instance of the plaintiff, of the rents and profits of the lot assigned to him and Laidley, so far as the same was in the possession of the defendants, or those under whom they claim, and also an account of the value of the salt well on the lot assigned to the defendants, and of the buildings and other permanent improvements thereon.

89 *The defendants afterwards filed a petition for a review of the decree, which was allowed; and when it came on to be heard, the court held, that the defendants were entitled to one moiety of the salt well on the lot assigned to them; that it was error to decree the whole moiety to McMullin and Laidley, they being entitled to but six-ninths; and that it was also error to decree the surrender of possession of the property by the defendants before the account of rents and profits and improvements, without requiring good and adequate security to be given by the complainant for any sum that might be due the defendants upon such settlement. And correcting the decree in these respects, and also in some matters of form, the court made a decree similar in all other respects to that which had been made. And from this decree Charles A. Cox and the devisees of William R. Cox applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

Fry, for the appellees.

SAMUELS, J. At the date of the covenant between Donnally and James Wilson,

Digitized by Google

August 16, 1821, Donnally had but an equitable title to the fee simple in the land, the subject of that covenant; and although his covenant, if he had the legal title, might have operated under the statute of uses as a covenant to stand seized to the use of James Wilson of one undivided moiety thereof, with warranty, yet having but an equitable title, this result could not at that time follow. See 1 Rev. Code, p. 370, § 29. Whether the fact that Donnally afterwards, on the 1st day of February 1830, acquired the legal title from John Wilson, could retroact on his covenant with warranty to stand seized to the use, and by estoppel or rebutter be held to pass the legal title to James Wilson, it is not 90 material *in this case to enquire. See Doswell v. Buchanan's ex'ors, 3 Leigh 365. Whether the estate was legal or merely equitable, the interests of Donnally and James Wilson were the same; that is, an equal undivided moiety to each. These part owners obviously regarded themselves as having a merely equitable title on the 16th August 1821, the date of their covenant, and on the 1st January 1829, when James Wilson assigned his interest to Peter Grant. After this assignment Peter Grant in his lifetime, and his heirs after his death, held in common with Donnally. In this state of the subject Donnally, one of the part owners, could not appropriate to himself any specific portion thereof, or do any other act whatever in derogation of the right vested in Grant's heirs, to enjoy equally with himself the common property, and every parcel of it. Robinett v. Preston's heirs, 2 Rob. R. 273; Varnum v. Abbott, 12 Mass. R. 474. Whether Donnally did by his deed of February 2d, 1830, attempt to convey to John J. Cabell the upper portion of the upper half of the common subject, or only an undivided moiety thereof, is not very clear, as the terms of the deed are somewhat ambiguous and repugnant in themselves. Construing the deed, however, in reference to the rights of the parties, and the condition of the property, it must be held that the deed passed only an equal undivided moiety of the common subject; and that Cabell and Grant's heirs thereafter held in common the whole subject, and every part thereof.

Although a party holding in common with others can do nothing to impair or vary in the slightest degree the rights of his cotenants, yet if he execute a deed for a specific portion of the common subject, or make a contract in regard to it, if upon partition such portion shall fall in severalty to the party so making the deed or contract, he will be bound by his act. McKee v. Barley, 11 Gratt. 340.

91 *The interest of one undivided moiety held originally by Donnally, and transmitted by successive conveyances to the appellants, and the like interest held by James Wilson, and transmitted by like conveyances to the appellees, remain a common subject, except in so far as they have been varied by the agreement of August 8th, 1822, between Donnally, Wilson, Lovell and Bream, ratified by Cox April 1st, 1844, in regard to the use of the coal lands, a portion of the common subject.

The law of partition of real estate requires that each part owner shall have in severalty a part equal to his interest in the whole subject, if practicable, having a due regard to the interest of all concerned. Yet it frequently occurs, that because of the limited extent or the nature of the property, it is impossible to make partition as above indicated, without impairing the value of all the portions, or of some of them. In such cases the law affords other means for doing exact justice to each and all: instead of dividing the property into shares of equal values, it may be divided into shares of unequal values; and when so divided the law as it originally stood, and as amended by the statute, Code, ch. 124, § 2, p. 526, will correct the inequality by means of a charge of money on the more valuable in favor of the less valuable portion, or by other means recognized in the law of partition.

There is enough in the record to show that the common property is of little value for any purpose other than the manufacture of salt; that the coal lands, a portion of the subject, was partially severed by Donnally and Wilson from the land lying between the hill and the river, by their contract with Lovell and Bream, dated August 8th, 1822, and ratified by Cox 1st April 1844. There is, moreover, enough to show that the space lying between the hill and the river is only sufficient for the salt furnaces, 92 and their necessary buildings *and fixtures, as contemplated by Donnally and Wilson, in their contract of August 8th, 1822, with Lovell and Bream; that is to say, two salt furnaces to Donnally, and the same number to Wilson. To give to each class of part owners the full enjoyment of their interests under the contract about the coal lands, and of their right to have two salt furnaces and the means of working them, it seems inevitably necessary to divide the land lying between the hill and the river into two parcels of equal quantity. The general rule of partition requires an allotment of those parcels to the part owners; yet it may benefit both classes of owners to assign the parcels; or it may benefit one class without injury to the other, to assign rather than to allot; in either case the commissioners might avoid the risk of an unfortunate allotment, by resorting to an assignment. The commissioners to make partition are vested with ample powers to give to each part owner a several proportion of the subject equal to his relative proportion in the whole subject. Before a final decree of partition can be made, commissioners should be appointed to ascertain and report to the court whether there be any inequality in the values of the parcels of land, of equal quantity, lying between the river and the hill, and the extent thereof; and further to ascertain and report the best mode of correcting the inequality, if any; whether by a charge of a gross sum of money payable at once; or of an annual sum of money payable for a definite time or for all time; or if these means be found impracticable or inconvenient, then by what other means provided by the law of partition.

Although it is said that some of the tenants in common have held portions of the common subject for their separate use, yet the fact is not so alleged in pleading and shown by proof as to justify the court, in the present state of the record, in 93 making a decision *how the fact is, nor in a decision whether such separate use was or was not had under circumstances requiring an account of rents and profits between the two classes of tenants in common. It is also said that permanent improvements adding to the present value of the common subject, have been made by some of the parties now before the court, or those under whom they claim, and to whose rights for compensation for improvements they succeed; but there is not enough in the pleadings and proof in the cause on which to found a decree. To avoid the danger of doing injustice, it will be best to leave the subject of accounts for rents and profits and of permanent improvements to be disposed of by the Circuit court, with the aid of such lights as the parties in interest may shed thereon.

I am of opinion to reverse so much of the decree as is in conflict with the principles here declared, and to affirm it as to the residue.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Samuels, J.

The decree was as follows:

The court is of opinion, that William A. McMullin, James M. Laidley, Rachel Grant and Ann R. Spalding have title in fee simple to one equal undivided moiety of the tract of land in the bill and proceedings mentioned as containing eighty acres; and that Charles A. Cox, William Cox, Cornelius Cox, Mary Jane Cox, George M. Cox and Francis Cox have title in fee simple to the other equal undivided moiety thereof; and that the land is held by these two classes of part owners as tenants in common.

The court is further of opinion, that in the case as it now stands, partition can be made only between the two classes, without going into a partition between the members of the same class.

The court is further of opinion,
94 that the contract *between Andrew Donnally, James Wilson, Joseph Lovell and J. M. Bream, dated August 8th, 1822, and ratified by William R. Cox, April 1st, 1844, in regard to the coal land, a part of the common subject, is binding upon the parties before the court; and that it has been properly carried into effect by the decree of the Circuit court.

The court is further of opinion, that inasmuch as the property held in common is valuable only for the purposes of manufacturing salt; that as the coal lands have been appropriated by valid contract (almost exclusively) to the purpose of furnishing fuel for salt furnaces limited in number, and divided in proportion to the interests of the part owners; that as the space between the Kanawha river and the hill is the only portion of the common subject suitable for wells, furnaces and other structures necessary in the manufacture of salt; that as the limited extent of this space will afford room only for the two furnaces and other necessary buildings which Donnally and Wilson respectively were allowed to have and supply with fuel under the contract with Lovell and Bream: that therefore the land lying between the hill and the river should be divided equally in quantity by a line running from the river to the hill.

The court is further of opinion, that before partition can be made, commissioners should be appointed to ascertain the line of partition between the parcels of equal quantity; and further to ascertain whether these parcels be of equal or unequal values. If of unequal values, then to report the best mode of correcting the inequality; whether by a charge of a gross sum of money, or of an annual sum payable for a definite time, or for all time; or if these modes be impracticable or inconvenient, then by such other means as are provided by the law of partition.

The court is further of opinion, that the commissioners appointed to make par-95 tition may allot each of the *classes of part owners one of the equal quantities into which the common subject shall be divided. If, however, the interests of both classes will be promoted, or if the interests of one class will be promoted, without injury to the other class, in such case the commissioners may assign the parcels without putting the owners to the risk of an allotment; these parcels with the improvements thereon, annexed to the freehold, to be held in severalty.

The court is further of opinion, that although it is said that some of the tenants in common have held portions of the common subject for their separate use, yet it is not so alleged in the pleadings or shown by the proof in the record as it now stands, as to justify the court in deciding whether such separate use was had, or if had, whether it was under circumstances to require an account of rents and profits. That although it is also said that permanent improvements adding to the present value of the common subject, have been made by some of the parties now before the court, or those under whom they claim, and to whose rights to compensation they succeed, yet there is not enough in the pleadings and proof on which to found a decree; that this court cannot at this time give any directions for an account of rents and profits, or of improvements, but must leave these subjects to be acted on by the Circuit court hereafter, if the parties in interest shall bring them or either of them to the notice of the court in a manner for judicial action.

Digitized by Google

The court is further of opinion, that the decree of the Circuit court, so far as it is in conflict with the principles herein declared, is erroneous, and that there is no other error therein. It is therefore adjudged, ordered and decreed, that so much of said decree as is declared to be erroneous, be reversed and annulled, and the residue thereof affirmed; and that the appellants recover of the appellees their costs expended in the prosecution of their appeal in this court.

96 *Shearman's Adm'r & al. v. Hicks & als.

October Term, 1857, Richmond.

Conveyance of Land—Power of Appointment—Case at Bar.*—T conveys land to S and C his wife, to have and to hold the same to S for his life, with reversion to C and her heirs. And S covenants with T and C that she shall have the privilege during coverture to nominate "by last will and testament or power of appointment," in the presence of two witnesses, such person or persons as she might designate for her heir or heirs to the property aforesaid after the death of S. C died in the lifetime of S, having made an olograph will, by which she devised the property. HELD:

1. Same—Same.—The deed to S and C his wife conferred on her the power of disposing of the land in the lifetime of S.
2. Same—Same—Execution of.—The power of disposition was properly executed by an olograph will; the provision for two witnesses applying not to the disposition by will; but to other modes of executing the power.

Conveyance in Fee—Superadded Power of Appointment.—In Thorndike v. Reynolds, 22 Gratt. 34, it was said: "Mr. Spence says, in his work on Equitable Estates and Interests,—If an estate be conveyed to a married woman in fee, with a superadded power of appointment, though it was formerly held that the power was merged in the fee, it is now settled that the wife has the power to appoint the fee. 2 Spence Eq. Ju. of the court of chancery. The question arose in this court in the case of Shearman's Adm'r v. Hicks & als., and was decided in the same way. 14 Gratt. 99." See also, Ocheltree v. McClung, 7 W. Va. 245.

Trustees—How Discretionary Power Conferred on.—In Whelan v. Reilly, 3 W. Va. 611, it is said: "It is well settled that a discretionary power may be conferred on trustees either by the express terms of the trust or by implication from the nature of the duty imposed on them whenever the object of the trust is certain. Hill on Trustees, 485; Frazier v. Frazier, 2 Leigh 642; Cochran v. Paris, etc., 11 Gratt. 348; Steele v. Levisay, Ib. 454; Robinsons v. Allen and others, Ib. 785; Harrisons v. Brown, etc., 4 Call 477; McGaughey's Adm'r v. Henry, etc., 15 B. Monroe 383; Leavitt v. Beirns et al., 21 Conn. Rep. 1."

See the sequel to this case in Byrne v. Edmonds, 23 Gratt. 202 et seq., where the case again appears before the court of appeals because, on account of some accidental mistake in printing the record, the true will was not presented to the court on the first appeal.

In October 1833 Kimble Hicks conveyed to his daughter Celia Shearman certain slaves and a tract of land. At that time Celia Shearman was married to Thomas Shearman; and they, being childless, by deed bearing date the 16th of March 1835, conveyed this land to John Timberlake. This deed is upon the consideration of one dollar, but it is absolute upon its face; and is with general warranty. By deed bearing date the 18th of March 1835, Timberlake conveyed this same land, on the same consideration, to Thomas Shearman and Celia his wife; to have and to hold the same to Thomas Shearman during his natural life, with reversion in fee to the said Celia Shearman and her heirs. And Thomas Shearman covenanted with Timberlake and the said Celia Shearman, that she should have the privilege, whether she should choose to execute it during the coverture or not, to nominate, by last will and testament, or power of appointment, in the presence of two witnesses, such person or 97 persons *as she might designate for her heir or heirs to the property aforesaid after the death of the said Thomas Shearman. These two last deeds were recorded on the same day. Mrs. Shearman died in 1851, during the lifetime of her husband, having made a will in May of that year, which was duly admitted to probate in the Circuit court of Fauquier county. This was an olograph will; and by it she gave the aforementioned tract of land, after the death of her husband Thomas Shearman, to Kimble G. Hicks, jr., and directed that he should pay to her niece Celia Edmunds one hundred and fifty dollars annually, during her life.

In January 1854 Thomas K. Hicks and others, the heirs at law of Celia Shearman, filed their bill in the Circuit court of Fauquier county, against Thomas Shearman in his own right, and as executor of Celia Shearman, Kimble G. Hicks, jr. and Celia Edmunds, in which they insisted that the deed from Timberlake to Shearman and wife did not vest Mrs. Shearman with the power to dispose of the land in the lifetime of her husband; and further, that if she did have the power, it was not properly executed by an olograph will: And they claimed the land as her heirs at law. Shearman answered the bill, stating that the object of the conveyance to Timberlake and from him to himself and wife, was to secure to him a life estate in the land, and to authorize Mrs. Shearman to dispose of it in the lifetime of her husband.

In the progress of the cause an issue was directed to ascertain if any, and if any, how much of the paper admitted to probate as the will of Celia Shearman, was her will. The jury found a special verdict setting out the facts herein before stated; and referred the question of law to the court. And the court at its April term 1855, made a decree setting aside the paper as not the true last will of Celia Shearman.

Shearman having died before the 98 final decree, and *the suit having been revived against the administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of Mrs. Shearman, he and Kimble G. Hicks, jr. applied to this court for an appeal; which was allowed.

Morson, for the appellant, insisted:

1st. That the covenant by Thomas Shearman the husband, with Timberlake, was effectual to give to Mrs. Shearman the power to make a will disposing of the land conveyed in the deed from Timberlake to Shearman and wife. That no form of words was necessary, but any provision which expressed the intention of the parties would have the effect to give the wife the power. 1 Sugd. Powers 116, 257, 15 Law Libr.; Hunt v. Rousmainere's adm'r, 1 Peters' R. 1, 13 to 17; 2 Story's Equ. Jur. § 1388, 1389, 1390, 1392.

2d. That the power was duly executed by an olograph will. He insisted that that deed provided two modes by which Mrs. Shearman might dispose of the property; one by will, the other by power of appointment in the presence of two witnesses. He referred to Sugd. on Powers 287, 288, and the cases cited there; Dormer v. Thurland, 2 P. Wms. 506; Earl of Darlington v. Pultney, 1 Cowp. R. 260; Ross v. Ewer, 3 Atk. R. 156; Doe v. Morgan, 7 T. R. 103; Dunn v. Amey, 1 Leigh 465; Phoebe v. Boggess, 1 Gratt. 129. He also referred to 3 Lomax's Dig. 11, note 1, to show that since the Code of 1849 a married woman may devise her separate real estate, without any express authority to do so in the instrument giving the estate to her. See Code, ch. 122, § 3, p. 516.

R. T. Daniel, for the appellee, insisted:

1st. That the Code of 1849 did not change the law as to the execution of a power by a married woman, as was evident from the fifth section of ch. 122, in which married women are expressly excepted out of 99 *the provision dispensing with any peculiar modes of executing wills required in the instruments giving the power of appointment.

2d. That the covenant in the deed from Timberlake did not give to Mrs. Shearman authority to make a will. He referred to West v. West's ex'ors, 3 Rand. 373; Roper on Husband and Wife, ch. 18, 19, 32 Law Libr.; 2 Thomas' Coke 586, marg. note a, p. 124; note q, p. 578; 2 Sugd. Powers, ch. 8, § 3; 1 Sugd. Powers, ch. 3, § 1.

3d. That the power, if it existed, was not properly executed by an olograph will. He referred to 2 Thomas' Coke 587, marg. note; 1 Sugd. Powers, ch. 6, § 3; Doe v. Thorley, 10 East's R. 442; Williamson v. Beckam, 8 Leigh 20.

SAMUELS, J. Two questions are presented by the record of this case, both of which must be decided in favor of the appellants before the sentence of the Circuit court can be reversed.

First. Did the deed of March 18th, 1835, executed by John Timberlake to Shearman and wife, confer on the wife a valid power of appointment?

Second. If it did, was the power well executed by her olograph will?

It must be conceded that Timberlake had the right (if he had chosen to exercise it) to convey the estate by deed of bargain and sale to Shearman for life, remainder to Mrs. Shearman in fee, determinable upon an event occurring at her death or before, and if so determined, then over to another in fee. See 1 Rev. Code, p. 369, 370. This right results from the power of the bargainor either to declare the use at once and finally; or to reserve to himself a power to revoke the use and to declare other and different uses; so he may confer on another the power possessed by him. In either case, the law against perpetuities must be 100 respected. *The appointee would take under the grantor of the power. 2 Sugd. Pow. 25; 2 Lomax's Dig. 237, § 23, new edition.

The counsel for the appellees conceded that it was manifest that Timberlake intended to confer on Mrs. Shearman a power to appoint her fee simple estate to a person or persons other than herself or her heirs at law; yet he insisted that the power was merged or extinguished in her estate in fee simple. This position is not well taken; for it seems to be settled that a title in fee simple (acquired as in this case) may coexist with a power of appointment in the same person; and when the power is executed the fee simple may be divested thereby. 2 Lomax's Dig. 207 of new, 149 of old edition; 1 Sugd. Pow. 105; Clere's Case, 6 Coke's Reports, 17 b, and note b.

I am of opinion that a valid power was conferred on Mrs. Shearman, notwithstanding her estate in fee.

This brings up the second question. Was the power well executed by the olograph will of Mrs. Shearman? The grantor of a power may prescribe any form or mode for its execution, and his directions must be complied with, or the execution will be invalid. It is said that the power in this case to "nominate by last will and testament or power of appointment in presence of two witnesses," required that two witnesses should be present, whether the appointment be by will or by other writing. This, in my judgment, is not the proper construction of the grant. A last will and testament is an assurance accurately defined and carefully guarded by law; and when then the grantor authorized an appointment by "last will and testament," he is to be understood as prescribing such and so many of the requisites as may be essential to the making of the instrument. As the grantor authorized an appointment in another mode about which the law makes no specific provision, it was therefore proper that the 101 *grantor should prescribe such safeguards as he deemed sufficient; and accordingly he required the presence of two witnesses. In my judgment a will in due form of law, wholly written and signed by the grantee, is a strict execution of one of the alternative powers with which Mrs. Shearman was vested.

I am aware of the conflicting opinions of eminent English judges in regard to cases like that in hand. Lord King, Lord Mansfield and Lord Kenyon, holding the appointment valid; Lord Hardwicke holding it invalid. Dormer v. Thurland, 2 P. Wms. 506; Earl of Darlington v. Pultney, Cowp. R. 260; Doe, lessee of Harman & wife, v. Morgan, 7 T. R. 103; Ross v. Ewer, 3 Atk. R. 156. In the absence of any controlling authority, I am of opinion the case must be decided on general principles; that Mrs. Shearman's will passed the title to the land over which she had a power, and in which she had a fee simple estate, and that the sentence of the Circuit court revoking the probate of the whole will, is erroneous as to the land conveyed by Timberlake, and should be reversed, and the probate of the will as to that subject be held valid and binding.

LEE, J., concurred in the opinion of Samuels, J., as to the effect of Timberlake's deed, but was inclined to think an olograph will was not a good execution of the power.

DANIEL, J., approved the decree of the Circuit court.

ALLEN, P., and MONCURE, J., concurred in the opinion of Samuels, J.

Decree reversed.

102 *Goddin v. Vaughn's Ex'x & als.

Same v. Mason & als.

January Term, 1858, Richmond.

1. Sale of Real Estate—Purchaser Entitled to Clear Title.—Upon a sale of real estate, whether at public or private sale, where nothing is said about the title, the purchaser is entitled to have a clear title with covenants of general warranty.
2. Same—Same—Exceptions.†—But where the sale is of such a character, and made under such circumstances, as fully and sufficiently to make known to the purchaser the exact nature of the title he is to expect; as where the sale is made avowedly by an executor under the provisions of the will, or by a sheriff or commissioner under an order of the court, he can of course only demand such title as was in contemplation of the parties when the sale was made.
3. Same—At Auction—One Moiety Vested in Infants—Right of Uninformed Purchaser.—A purchaser not informed at the time of his purchase of land at auction, that the title to one moiety thereof is vested in infants, and that it can only be obtained by a suit in chancery, may, when informed of the fact, refuse to proceed with the purchase, and abandon it.
4. Same—Same—Same—Same—Waiving of Rights.—But if such a purchaser, upon being informed of

*__Sale of Real Estate—Purchaser Entitled to Clear Title.__—See Christian v. Cabell, 22 Gratt. 83, and foot-note.

†__Same—Same—Exceptions.__—In Fleming v. Holt, 12 W. Va. 162, it was said: "A purchaser at a public sale of land, made by a trustee, must look to the title of the grantor of the land; and he is entitled only to a deed with special warranty of title. He cannot look to the trustee for a good title, for in making the sale he is but an agent; he cannot look to the creditor, for he sells nothing, and is merely to receive the proceeds of the sale. To such a sale the principle of caveat emptor applies. See Petermans v. Laws, 6 Leigh 529; Saunders v. Pate, 4 Rand. 8; Sutton v. Sutton, 7 Gratt. 237; Findlay v. Toncray, 2 Rob. 374; Bowles on Covenants, p. 418; Goddin v. Vaughn, 14 Gratt. 117."

This language was approved in Jones v. Thorn, 45 W. Va. 193, 32 S. E. Rep. 176.

A sheriff selling under execution, with good faith, incurs no responsibility as to title; there being no implied warranty, raised by law, under such a sale. The rule caveat emptor applies to such a case. Saunders v. Pate, 4 Rand. 8. See also, foot-note to Christian v. Cabell, 22 Gratt. 83; Findlay v. Hickman, 10 Leigh 363.

__Same—Specific Performance—Defect in Title Unknown to Purchaser.__—In Middleton v. Selby, 19 W. Va. 174, it was said: "There is no question, that generally and where any defect in the title was not known to the purchaser at the time of the contract of sale, a court of equity will not decree a specific execution of a contract for the sale of land, unless the vendor can make a good title. (Watts v. Kinney, 3 Leigh 272; Goddin v. Vaughn & Co., 14 Gratt. 117; McCann v. Janes, 1 Rob. 256; Clarke v. Reins, 12 Gratt. 98.)" See, in accord, Linkous v. Cooper, 2 W. Va. 70, citing the principal case. And see foot-note to Griffin v. Cunningham, 19 Gratt. 571.

A purchaser is not bound to pay the purchase money for real estate until a good title, free from cloud which may disturb the purchaser, shall be made to him, unless the contract otherwise provided. Watson v. Coast, 35 W. Va. 473, 14 S. E. Rep. 252, citing the principal case; Tavenner v. Barrett, 21 W. Va. 657, 681; 2 Min. Inst. 791.

__Same—Same—Defect in Title Known to Purchaser.__—If the purchaser knew, when he made his contract, that there was a defect in the title, and that it would take a considerable time to remove it; or acquires this knowledge after his purchase and acquiesces in the delay, or proceeds, with knowledge of the defect, in the execution of the contract, he has no ground of complaint. Vail v. Nelson, 4 Rand. 478.

This proposition was approved in Rader v. Neal, 13 W. Va. 387, 388, citing the principal case, and Vail v. Nelson, 4 Rand. 478, as authority. See, in accord, Dodson v. Hays, 29 W. Va. 594, 2 S. E. Rep. 425.

Yet, when the express contract is for a perfect title, the party cannot be put off with a defective title, even if the defect was by him known at the time. Johnston v. Jarrett, 14 W. Va. 238.

__Same—Same—When Ability to Convey Title Must Exist.__—But the principle is well established that it is not essential that the vendor had at the time of the contract such title and capacity to convey the property, or such means and right to acquire it as would enable him to fulfil it on his part. It is sufficient, if he is able to convey, when he is required by the contract, or the equities of the case. And where time is not of the essence of the contract, the vendor will be allowed a reasonable time to obtain a perfect title. Rader v. Neal, 13 W. Va. 388; Mays v. Swope, 8 Gratt. 46; Dodson v. Hays, 29 W. Va. 594, 2 S. E. Rep. 425, citing principal case. See also, foot-note to Griffin v. Cunningham, 19 Gratt. 571.

the state of the title immediately after the sale, plainly manifests his intention to proceed with the purchase, content to take a conveyance for the moiety which can be made at once, and to look to the court of chancery for the title to the other moiety, he thereby waives the objection which he was entitled to make for the want of a conveyance with general warranty.

5. Chancery Practice—Decree Enforcing Contract Passes Title to Infants' Land—Case at Bar.—M and V are joint owners of real estate, and they enter into an agreement in writing, that if either wishes to sell the property, he may fix a price which he will take, and if the other refuses to give it, he may have the whole property sold at auction. And in case of the death of one or both of the parties, their executors and administrators are directed to carry out the agreement as fully as though they were living. V died leaving a widow and several infant children, having made a will previous to the agreement, by which he forbade his executrix to sell any of his real estate. After V's death, M had the property sold at public auction, on terms which were satisfactory to V's representative, and which were proved to be beneficial to the children. A bill by 103 the widow and children of *V against the purchaser, for a specific execution of the contract, will be sustained, and a decree enforcing the sale will pass the title of the infants; though the proceeding does not conform to the act concerning the sale of infants' lands, nor to that concerning partitions.

6. Same—Interlocutory Decree—Enforcing Contract—No Provision for Deed.—It is not error in an interlocutory decree enforcing a specific execution of a contract against a purchaser, that it does not direct a deed to be made and tendered to him.

7. Same—Decree for Sale of Land on Condition—Counsel for Plaintiff Made Commissioner to Sell Property—Effect.—Where a decree for specific execution of a contract against a purchaser, provides that if the purchase money, or any part of it, is not paid by a day certain, the property shall be sold, it is not error to appoint the counsel of the plaintiffs, there being no objection to the person, the commissioner to make the sale; nor is it error to refuse to associate with him, one of the counsel of the purchaser.

8. Same—Title to Land—Question of Law—Order of Reference Unnecessary.—Where the facts are all before the court, and the objection to the title to land purchased is a question of law, it is unnecessary to refer the title to a commissioner.

9. Purchasers Pendente Lite—Who Are—Case at Bar.†—Whilst suit is pending the purchaser conveys the property in trust to secure a debt. The cestuis que trust are pendente lite purchasers, and are not necessary parties.

10. Deed of Trust—Disqualification of Trustee—Case at Bar.—A trustee in a deed of trust to secure a debt falling due at different periods, advances to the debtor money to pay the first installment, and takes a transfer of it. He can only subject the property to satisfy him after the balance of the debt is paid; and his interest does not disqualify him from acting as trustee.

11. Injunctions—Obtained in Vacation—Filing of Answer.‡—Where an injunction has been obtained in vacation, the defendant may file his answer and move the court to dissolve the injunction, without filing the answer either at rules or in term.

12. Answer—Exceptions Not Well Founded—Failure to Pass upon.§—If exceptions to an answer are not well founded, it is not ground to reverse a decree, that they were not set down to be argued, but the cause was heard and decided without passing upon them.

Joseph Vaughn and C. R. Mason, being the joint and equal owners of the property in the city of Richmond, known as the Swan tavern, and at a later period, as the Broad street hotel, they, by a writing under seal, bearing date the 14th of September 1846, entered into an agreement, by which, reciting their ownership of the property, and that death or other causes may make it necessary or advisable to sell it, they provide as follows: "that should 104 either party desire, it, he shall *fix such price thereon as he may be willing to give or take, and if not acceded to by the other, a sale of the whole shall be made upon the best terms that can be had. And in case of the death of one or both of the parties, our executors or administrators are hereby directed to carry out this agreement as fully as though we were living." There was an endorsement on this agreement, which provides, that "in case either party should wish the premises sold, and not wish to make an offer of what he should give, he shall have the right to say what he will take, and if not acceded to by the other, shall have a right to have the whole publicly sold to the highest bidder, by giving sufficient notice of the same."

Joseph Vaughn died in September 1849, leaving a widow and nine cildren, only one of whom had then attained the age of twenty-one years. His will was written in 1844, and was duly admitted to record in the County court of Hanover. By it he appointed his wife executrix of the will, "with full power and authority to receive and pay debts, and do all necessary and proper acts as I myself would, except it be to dispose of any lands or slaves, which is hereby prohibited."

In September 1854 Taylor & Williams, auctioneers in the city of Richmond, sold the said Swan tavern property at auction, when Isaac A. Goddin became the purchaser thereof, at the price of twenty thousand six hundred and forty dollars, one-fourth in cash, and the balance in six, twelve, eighteen and twenty-four months. At this sale it was not announced by the auctioneer, for whom he was selling the property, and it does not appear from the evidence that Goddin knew who were the owners of it until after the purchase.

It seems to have been supposed by the vendors, that under the agreement between Mason and Vaughn, the executrix of 105 Vaughn could make a good title to *his moiety of the property; and after the sale the question of her authority to convey was submitted to counsel, who seems to have decided against it, and to have advised a suit in equity to obtain the authority of the court to confirm the contract and convey the moiety of the property. Accordingly, in March 1855 a suit was instituted in the Circuit court of the city of Richmond, by Mrs. Vaughn, as widow and executrix of Joseph Vaughn, and his nine children, eight of whom were infants, who sued by their guardian, against Isaac A. Goddin, in which they set out the joint ownership of the property by Mason and Vaughn, the agreement between them, the death of Vaughn, and the sale to Goddin; and they alleged that when the sale was made they had no doubt that Mason and the personal representative of Vaughn could make a perfect title to the property; and that possession of it was immediately delivered to the purchaser. That they are advised the title cannot be made by the executrix, and that the aid of a court of equity is therefore necessary, in order to execute the agreement between Mason and Vaughn, the execution of which would be manifestly for the advantage of both parties. They further stated that Goddin had complied with his contract with Mason, but declined to execute the contract with the plaintiffs without a decree of a court of equity. That he was however anxious to complete his contract; but if he could not obtain the moiety of the lot owned by the plaintiffs, the whole sale would be canceled, as he had purchased on the condition that he should have the whole and not a moiety. They therefore prayed for a specific execution of the contract; and for general relief.

To this bill Goddin filed an answer, admitting his purchase of the property; and averring that he was ready to comply with the contract with the plaintiffs as soon as they could make him a good title to a 106 moiety *of the property to which they were entitled, as he had no difficulty with Mason as to his moiety.

In this suit the court directed an enquiry as to whether the sale was for the interest of the infants: and the commissioner having reported that the sale was beneficial to them, the court, on the 25th of March 1855, made a decree confirming said report, and directing the contract of sale between the plaintiffs and Mason with Goddin to be specifically executed. That the executrix of Joseph Vaughn should receive of Goddin the amount due from him, and his four negotiable notes, payable in six, twelve, eighteen and twenty-four months from their date, to the said executrix; and that upon the receipt of said money and notes, she should execute a conveyance of the property to Goddin, and take from him a deed of trust upon it to secure the payment of said notes as they fell due.

In May 1855 the executrix of Joseph Vaughn reported to the court, that Goddin had failed to comply with the decree; and it was ordered that an attachment should issue against him, unless, upon being served with a copy of the order, he should show cause against it on the 18th of the month. This motion was continued at the instance of the defendant until the 14th of June, when the defendant made his return to the rule, objecting to the title which he was required to take under the decree; insisting that he made no purchase from the plaintiffs, and that they had no power to convey the property to him, either with or without the aid of the court in this cause. And thereupon, it appearing that the sale was made by Taylor & Williams at the instance of C. Mason, the court, with the assent of the plaintiffs, dismissed the bill, without prejudice and without costs; it appearing that the suit was instituted with the assent of the defendant. This decree was on the same day set aside on 107 *the motion of the plaintiffs, and the rule against Goddin was continued until the first day of the next term.

In July 1855 the plaintiffs filed an amended bill, in which the previous bill and proceedings were set out; and an error in the bill in stating that the sale was made by the plaintiffs and Mason, was corrected; and it was stated that the sale was by Mason. It was further stated that Goddin had obtained a conveyance from Mason for his moiety of the property, and had executed a conveyance to secure the payment of the purchase money remaining unpaid, amounting to nine thousand two hundred and eighty-eight dollars; and that he had also executed another deed on the whole of said property to secure debts due to Goddin & Apperson. And making Goddin, Mason and James M. Taylor, the auctioneer who conducted the sale, and trustee in the deed from Goddin to secure Mason, parties, they prayed that Goddin might be enjoined from receiving the rents of the property, and that a receiver might be appointed; and that Goddin might be compelled to elect promptly to take the property on the terms of the sale; and that upon his declining to take it, that partition thereof might be made between the plaintiffs and him, or the sale of the whole decreed.

Goddin demurred to the bill; and also answered. He admitted the purchase of the property upon the terms stated in the bill; but he insists that he was to have a perfect title; and upon no other terms would he have bought. He says that at the time of the sale he did not know who were the owners of the property. He knew from the assurance of the auctioneers that he was to have a good title, and would have time to investigate it after the sale. That after the sale he was informed by the auctioneers that they had sold the property as the agents and by the direction of C. R. Mason, and Catharine S. Vaughn, executrix 108 of *Joseph Vaughn. That it was when the defendant called upon the auctioneers to comply with the terms of the sale, that he was, for the first time, informed of the inability of the parties to make him a perfect title at the time; and then he was informed of the contract between Mason and Vaughn. That some time thereafter, being still willing to consummate the sale on his part; and the said auctioneers, agents for the owners, assuring him that a perfect title would be made to him at an early day, he was put into possession of the property by the said agents, and at once commenced a thorough repair and improvement of the premises. That Mason being anxious to realize his proportion of the purchase money, the defendant settled with him according to the terms of the sale; Mason thereupon conveying his moiety to the defendant; and the defendant conveying the same to Taylor in trust to secure the balance of the purchase money due to Mason. That defendant was willing to facilitate the perfecting the title to the other moiety of the property, and therefore signed the answer prepared for him by the plaintiffs' counsel. But he insists that he is not thereby to be understood as waiving his right to a perfect title to said property, or the obligation of the plaintiffs to do whatever was necessary in law to give him such a title. That when a copy of the decree made in this cause was served upon him, he employed counsel to examine the title which the plaintiffs proposed to make to him for the property; and that counsel, after a careful examination of the case, advised him that he could not get a good title to plaintiffs' moiety of said property under the decree by any deed made under the same. The defendant therefore refused to take a title under said decree.

The grounds of objection to the title are: First. That by the will of Joseph Vaughn his executrix is expressly prohibited from selling his real estate, except 109 *for division. Second. That there is no proof of the alleged contract between Mason and Vaughn; and only an unattested copy is filed in the cause. Third. That the mode prescribed by the statute either for the sale of infants' lands or for partition, has not been pursued in this case, and therefore that the decree would not bind the infants.

The defendant further stated that he had expended between four and five thousand dollars in additions to and improvements upon the property. He insisted it was the plaintiffs who were in default in complying with the contract; and declared his willingness to comply with the terms of the sale whenever a good title was made to him; and that so far from abandoning the purchase, he was forced, on account of the improvements he had made on the premises, as well as for other good reasons, to insist upon a good title being made by the complainants to their moiety. He insisted further, that the property was sold by the plaintiffs as well as Mason, and he objected that from the nature of the property, it being a public hotel, to take it out of his hands and put it into the hands of a receiver, would greatly injure its value; and he denied that there was any danger of loss from his failure to comply with the terms of the sale when a good title should be tendered to him. As to a partition of the property, he supposes the plaintiffs are scarcely serious in what they say. He trusts that the court will compel them to make him a good title to their moiety of the property: and he calls for strict proof of the execution of the contract between Mason and Vaughn, and for whatever else, and for whatever other steps, might be necessary and proper to perfect the title thereto.

There was proof of the execution of the agreement between Mason and Vaughn; and also of the continued possession 110 of the property by Goddin, and of *his expending some four or five thousand dollars in improvements upon it. It also appeared in proof that Mason had conveyed his moiety to Goddin, who had conveyed the same to Taylor to secure the balance of the purchase money; and that Goddin had also conveyed his interest in the whole property to secure a debt to Goddin & Apperson. These parties filed a petition in the cause, asking that they and their trustees might be made parties. And Goddin also filed a petition, asking leave to file a cross bill.

In February 1856 the cause came on to be heard upon its merits, as well as upon the petitions filed, when the court rejected the petitions, but gave leave to the defendant Goddin to file his cross bill as an original bill. The court also overruled the demurrer; and being of opinion that either party was entitled to have the contract of sale executed, made a decree that Goddin should, within ten days after being served with a copy of this decree, pay into the Farmers Bank to the credit of the cause, the sum of nine hundred and fifteen dollars and four cents, being the interest upon the purchase money of that moiety of the property which belonged to Joseph Vaughn, from the 15th of August 1854, when said Goddin purchased the same, to the date of the decree; and also two thousand and sixty four dollars, being the first installment of the principal, which was to be paid in cash; and that he should execute to James Lyons (who was the counsel for the plaintiffs) as commissioner of the court his four negotiable notes for two thousand and sixty dollars each, payable severally at six, twelve, eighteen and twenty-four months from the date of the decree, with interest. And if the said Goddin should fail to comply with the decree, Mr. Lyons was appointed a commissioner and directed to sell the moiety of the said property upon the terms and in the mode prescribed in the decree; he first giving security in 111 the *penalty of five thousand dollars, with conditions according to law.

In March 1856 Isaac A. Goddin filed a bill in the Circuit court of the city of Richmond, seeking to enjoin the sale of the moiety of the Swan tavern property which had been conveyed to him by C. R. Mason, and which he had conveyed in trust to Taylor to secure the balance of the purchase money due to Mason. The bill states the fact of the purchase of the whole property at auction, and the difficulties about the title, as stated in the case of Goddin v. Vaughn, and the proceedings in that case, and the other facts before stated, relied on by him in that case. That the property sold for its full market value at the time of the purchase; and that owing to the stringency in the money market, and of the great depreciation of the value of real estate, it would not, except for the improvements put upon it by Goddin, sell for as much as he gave for it; and that a sale of it for cash or for a large part of the purchase money, would result in a ruinous sacrifice to Goddin. That on account of the delay in making him a good title he had not been able to sell the property when real estate commanded a good price, and the money market was easy; and he had not been able to effect a sale since, in consequence of the defects in said title and of the said altered state of things.

The bill further stated, that the trustee Taylor had by the direction of Mason advertised the property conveyed in the deed of trust to him to be sold on the 26th of the month, for the payment of the bonds given by the plaintiff for the deferred installments of the purchase money.

The plaintiff further insisted that he was entitled to demand and have a perfect and unclouded title to the whole of said property; and that he was entitled to have the opinion of the Supreme court of ap-112 peals *upon that title. That if a perfect title could then be made to him for the whole of said property, he was entitled to have said deed of trust canceled, and the terms of sale and of credit changed and adapted to the altered state of things. That to sell the property conveyed in said deed of trust when there were such clouds upon the title, and pending the appeal in the other case, and especially to sell for six thousand five hundred and thirty-six dollars in cash, as advertised, in the then condition of the money market and the depreciated condition of real estate in the city, would be to inflict wanton and irremediable injury upon the plaintiff.

The prayer of the bill was for an injunction to the sale; that the deed of trust might be delivered up to be canceled; and for general relief. The injunction was granted.

On the 26th of March 1856, in vacation, Mason answered the bill. He states that himself and Vaughn purchased the Swan tavern property; and that they entered into the agreement hereinbefore mentioned. That Vaughn died, and in the year 1854 the defendant caused the property mentioned in said agreement and in the bill to be advertised for sale; and that on the 16th of August of that year the property was sold at public auction, and purchased by the plaintiff at the price of twenty thousand six hundred and forty dollars, and he was immediately put in possession of it, and had so continued ever since. He said it was not true that the plaintiff purchased with the distinct understanding that he was to get at once a clear and indisputable title to the whole property, because he purchased with the full knowledge of the state of the title; and he knew, therefore, that the widow and children of Vaughn were the owners of one moiety of the property. And he knew that defendant was to convey him only one moiety of the property, 113 and that he was *to look to the widow and children of Vaughn for the title to the other moiety. That defendant had conveyed his moiety of the property to plaintiff, who had accepted the conveyance, and was therefore estopped by that act, and his reconveyance of the property, from complicating the title of the defendant with that of Vaughn; for which the defendant insisted he was in no wise responsible.

As to the complaint that if the deed of trust is enforced the plaintiff will suffer loss, the defendant said, that the loss, if any, would be the result of no fault of his, but of the folly of the plaintiff in becoming the purchaser of property which he had no means to pay for, and thus of preventing the defendant from selling his property to others who could have paid for it.

The plaintiff filed various exceptions to the answer of Mason; but as this court was of opinion that they were not well founded in fact, it is unnecessary to state them.

It did not appear that Goddin knew, before the purchase of the property, who were the owners of it, or the difficulties in the way of making the title; except as it might be inferred from the fact, that as assessor for the city of Richmond, in 1850, he had assessed this property as the property of Joseph Vaughn and C. R. Mason; and that two obituary notices of the death of Vaughn appeared in the Enquirer and Religious Herald, published in Richmond, on the 25th and 26th of October 1849.

In May 1856, on the motion of the defendant Mason, the court in vacation dissolved the injunction granted in this case: whereupon Goddin applied to this court for an appeal; which was allowed.

John Howard and Alexander H. Sands, for the appellant, insisted:

1st. That a purchaser is entitled to 114 have a good and *marketable title; and as a general rule is entitled to a general warranty of title. 1 Sugd. Vend. 455; Hall v. Betty, 4 Mann. & Grang. 410; Garnett v. Macon, 2 Brock. R. 185, 244; Marlow v. Smith, 2 P. Wms. 198, 201; Rose v. Calland, 5 Ves. R. 186, 189; Roake v. Kidd, 5 Ves. R. 647; Stapylton v. Scott, 16 Ves. R. 272; Sloper v. Fish, 2 Ves. & Beame 146; Omerod v. Vend. 545; and that though the court's opinion should be in favor of the title, yet the purchaser ought not to be compelled to take it if there were reasonable doubts of its sufficiency. Pyrke v. Waddingham, 17 Eng. L. & E. R. 535, approved in Collard v. Sampson, 21 Id. 352.

2d. That Mason sold the whole property, and was therefore bound to warrant the title to the whole. Sugd. Vend. 310; Lloyd v. Crispe, 1 Eng. C. L. R. 95; Hall v. Betty, 4 Mann. & Grang. 410. That he did not sell under a power from Vaughn, because it was a bare, naked power, uncoupled with an interest, and was terminated by the death of Vaughn. Story Agen. 88, 147, 148; Knapp v. Alfred, 10 Paige's R. 205; Hunt v. Rousmanier's adm'rs, 8 Wheat. R. 1, 74; Huston's adm'r v. Cantril & als., 11 Leigh 136. And that Goddin had done nothing by which he waived his right to such title from Mason.

3d. That the proceedings in the suit were not such as would bind the infant heirs, and pass the title by the decree. That these proceedings were not such as were required either in a suit for the sale of infants' lands, or for partition; and that infants' lands could only be effectually sold in one or the other of these proceedings. Pierce's adm'r v. Trigg's heirs, 10 Leigh 406; Code, ch. 124, p. 526; Sess. Acts 1852, ch. 97, p. 79; Custis v. Snead, 12
115 Gratt. 260; Garland v. *Loving, 1 Rand. 396. And that the case was distinguishable from Daniel v. Leitch, 13 Gratt. 195, because that was a judicial sale.

4th. That it was error not to direct the execution of a deed in the decree, Goddin being entitled to a deed when he paid the purchase money. Sugd. Vend. 212; Hook v. Ross, 1 Hen. & Munf. 310; Ross v. Hook's adm'r, 4 Munf. 97; Beverley v. Lawson's heirs, 3 Id. 323; Grantland v. Wight, 2 Munf. 179. Form of decree given in Sands' Suit in Equity, p. 471, 472.

5th. That the trustees and cestuis que trust in the deed to secure Goddin & Apperson, should have been parties in the first suit. 1 Daniel's Ch. Pr. 252; Anonymous, 3 Swanst. R. 139; Braker v. Deveraux, 8 Paige's R. 513.

6th. That it was error to appoint the counsel of the appellees the commissioner to sell the appellant's property. York Buildings Co. v. McKenzie, referred to in Davoue v. Fanning, 2 John. Ch. R. 268-9.

7th. That it was error not to require the commissioner to give security before proceeding to act; the statute being imperative in all cases of sales by a commissioner of the court.

8th. That the answer of Mason having been filed in vacation, it was not a part of the record, and could only be regarded as his affidavit. 1 Rob. Pr. 139; Tate's Dig. p. 569, § 94; Id. p. 116, § 34, note 2; Id. p. 128, § 59; Code, ch. 171, p. 649, § 1, 2, 3, 4; p. 650, § 34.

9th. That the exceptions should have been set down to be argued. Code, p. 650, § 35; and it was error to decide any other question in the cause before passing upon them. Clarke v. Tinsley's adm'r, 4 Rand. 250. And the exceptions should have been sustained.

James and Wm. H. Lyons, for the appellees, insisted:

116 *1st. That the contract between Mason and Vaughn gave to each the right to have the whole property sold; and that the devisees of Vaughn were bound by it. Therefore, it was not necessary in this case to proceed under the act in relation to the sale of infants' lands, or that in relation to partitions. They cited 2 Tucker's Com. 461; 2 Story's Equ. Jur. § 778. And the sale having been proved to be for the benefit of the infants, and they being plaintiffs in the suit, they are as much bound by the decree as if they were adults. Brown v. Armistead, 6 Rand. 594; Brook v. Hertford, 2 P. Wms. 518; Ellison's Case, 5 John. Ch. R. 261; Macpherson on Infants, p. 363, 382, 383, 386, 41 Law Libr.; Nalder v. Hawkins, 7 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 352.

2d. That the claim on the part of the appellant to a conveyance with general warranty, was for the first time set up in this court, after he had been in possession for three years. That this right was a mere implication, and might be waived by the purchaser. That knowing the infants could not give him such a warranty, he took possession and had held it; and not having made the objection until after the decree, he must be held to have waived it. Vail v. Nelson, 4 Rand. 478; 1 Sugd. Vend. p. 243, note 1; Id. 398, 402; Roach v. Rutherford, 4 Dess. R. 126. They insisted further, that it was the right of Goddin to have a conveyance of such title as the heirs of Vaughn could make, though that was less than under his contract he had a right to demand. And having in his answer insisted upon his purchase, the court was bound to make the decree. They cited 1 Sugd. Vend. 242; 2 Tuck. Com. 466.

3d. That Goddin being the grantee of Mason, he could not require that this last should be made a party in the suit of Vaughn's heirs against Goddin; and 117 *Goddin & Apperson and their trustees being pendente lite purchasers, the plaintiffs are not bound to make them parties.

4th. That it was no ground for reversing the decree, that the plaintiffs' counsel was appointed the commissioner to sell; and that the security required was ample to cover any amount which would be in his hands at one time; that the notes were to be made payable to him as commissioner, and the trust appearing on their face, he could not negotiate them.

5th. That the statute having authorized the judge to dissolve an injunction in vacation, the authority to file an answer in vacation must be held to follow as a necessary consequence. Code, ch. 179, § 12, p. 678; Eden on Inj. 118.

LEE, J. It may not be questioned that where a sale of real estate is made in the ordinary mode and in general terms without any stipulation as to the character of the title which the purchaser is to get, he is entitled to demand that a clear title shall be made, and that it shall be assured to him by deed with covenants of general warranty. And this rule holds good equally where the sale is made at public auction as where it is concluded by private negotiation. In either case, however, where the sale is of such a character and under such circumstances as fully and sufficiently to make known to the purchaser the exact nature of the title which he is to expect, he can of course only demand such title as was in contemplation of the parties when the sale was made. As in the case of a sale by an executor, avowedly as such, under the provisions of a will, or by a sheriff or commissioner under the order of a court, and other cases of the like kind. In these the purchaser can only expect to get the special title which the vendor 118 is authorized to convey, *nor is he entitled to demand covenants of general warranty.

In the cases before us it is alleged that at the time of the sale of the property in controversy, the appellant had full and complete knowledge of the state of the title, and was aware that the title to a moiety was in the heirs of Vaughn, all of whom with one exception were infants under the age of twenty-one years. This however is denied by the appellant who alleges that he purchased in entire ignorance of the state of the title, upon faith of the declaration made by the auctioneer at the time of the sale, that a clear and indisputable title would be made. Nor is there any sufficient proof to establish this knowledge at the time of the sale. But it is proven very distinctly, and indeed may fairly be considered as admitted by the appellant, that after the sale but before any steps were taken to consummate the contract, he was informed of the true situation of the property, and learned that the title to one undivided moiety was in the children of Vaughn as his heirs or devisees, and could only be obtained by a resort to proceedings in chancery.

Now if at this point, the appellant had refused to proceed further with the contract because the title which he was to receive was not such as he had contracted for, he might have been well justified in doing so, and the court of chancery would in vain have been appealed to to compel him to specific performance. But he did not adopt this course. On the contrary immediately after the sale and before a single step had been taken to complete the purchase, being informed by the auctioneer in whom the title was vested, and how and where the title to the moiety of Vaughn's heirs was to be obtained, he expressed no dissatisfaction, but with this knowledge of the state of the title, plainly manifested his intention to go on with his purchase, 119 *content to take a conveyance from Mason for his moiety, and to look to the court of chancery for the title to that of Vaughn's heirs.

It is in vain to say that the agreement between Vaughn and Mason of the 14th of September 1846 was not produced till some months afterwards, and that therefore the appellant did not have full knowledge of all the facts when he decided upon his course. Even where a fraud has been practiced it is not necessary that the party should be aware of all the circumstances of the transaction; it is enough that he should know what he is about to do will confirm the transaction if it were otherwise liable to be impeached. Murray v. Palmer, 2 Sch. & Lef. 474, 486. But there was nothing in that agreement to deter the appellant from proceeding to complete his purchase if otherwise disposed to do so. Its effect would rather have been to confirm him in his purpose. He was told, he says, that a good title would be made to the moiety of Vaughn's heirs, but that it would be necessary to obtain it by resort to the court of chancery. This was deemed satisfactory, and he determined to proceed with his purchase. What was to be the basis of the decree was a matter of very little consequence if the title passed by it. But although the original agreement was not shown him, he was informed of the existence of such a paper and of its provisions. He says in his cross bill that he requested to see the agreement and the will of Vaughn, but that neither was shown him, and that he would at once have rescinded the agreement if he could have foreseen the difficulties and delay to which he was to be subjected. He did not however rescind it, but concluded to proceed with it. In his answer to the amended bill, he says, this was when the auctioneer called on him to comply with the terms of sale, and that some time thereafter he was put into possession. So that if this agreement 120 *could have had any influence in determining his course, he was apprised of its existence before he had taken a single step towards completing his purchase.

Thus, as it seems to me, the appellant with sufficient knowledge of all material facts, did elect to complete his purchase and take the title of Vaughn's heirs; and the decision of these causes must depend on the solution of these questions: first, is the title of Vaughn's heirs good, and can it be fully and effectually transferred to and vested in the appellant under the proceedings that have been had? second, is the appellant still entitled to insist as the condition of his performing the contract, that this title shall be assured to him with covenants of general warranty?

It is no where alleged that there is any defect in the title itself as claimed and held by Vaughn's heirs, no better or other title whatever is alleged to be outstanding in a third person, nor is it pretended that there has been any forfeiture under the revenue laws, or any lien or incumbrance of any kind whatever resting upon it. Their title, then, is good; but it is insisted on behalf of the appellant that this title cannot be transferred to him under the proceedings which have been had. It is argued that the court of chancery cannot convert the real estate of infants by a sale save only under the provisions of the statute authorizing a sale of infants' lands in certain cases at the suit of the guardian, or that providing for such sale in certain cases of partition, and that the proceedings in this case are under neither of those statutes and conform to none of their provisions. This argument, however, omits a most material element in the case. It ignores completely the contract of the 14th of September 1846, or denies to it any effect as a proper basis for the action of the court. It is contended that it confers a mere power upon Mason to make a sale which could not be exer-
121 cised after the death of Vaughn, *and that the case is not helped by the concurrence of the executrix of Vaughn because by the will she is expressly prohibited from selling any lands or slaves. Whether Mason could or could not, by his own act, make a sale of the property after the death of Vaughn that would be binding upon the heirs of the latter is, in the view I take of the case, not material to be decided, although it may be argued with some plausibility that the effect of the agreement was for the purposes of a sale according to its terms, to revive the right of survivorship, and thus enable the survivor to sell and convey the property, being liable of course to account for a moiety of the proceeds to the estate of the deceased joint tenant. Nor do I deem it material to enquire how far the executrix of Vaughn could act under the agreement with the provision in the will prohibiting her from selling lands, though it may be observed that the agreement expressly provided for its being carried out after the death of either party, the contingency of which is recited as a principal inducement to entering into it, and provides that the executors of the parties shall carry out the same as fully as they could themselves if in life; and this agreement was entered into more than a year after the date of Vaughn's will, which appears to have been made in 1844, some time before Mason and Vaughn had acquired the property, their deed from Hodges and wife being dated on the 27th of April 1846. For if Mason could not by his own act, consummate a sale after the death of Vaughn that would be effectual to pass the title to the whole property to the purchaser, with or without the concurrence of the executrix of Vaughn, I think it clear that the agreement conferred upon him the right in equity to have a sale of the property according to its terms, and this right could not be taken away by the death of Vaughn, nor could it be impaired by any will that he might have made or might 122 thereafter make. *It constituted a material element of the joint tenancy and entered into its substance; and the heirs of Vaughn though not named, were yet bound by it, because they took the title that devolved upon them subject to the terms and conditions which it imposed. The regular course of proceeding, it is true, would have been, to file a bill against the heirs of Vaughn and ask for a decree for the sale of the property; this however Mason did not do, but undertook to make the sale by his own authority, and did not seek the aid of a court of chancery either before or after the sale, as the bill which has been filed to affirm the sale is not in his name but in the names of the executrix and heirs of Vaughn. This irregularity however will not necessarily vitiate the proceeding. It has been held by this court that where the guardians of infants had made a sale of their wards' land upon a bill by them to affirm the sale the case would be a proper one for the consideration of the court under the statute providing a mode by which a guardian might obtain a sale of his wards' lands, and that if the court should be satisfied the interest of the infants manifestly required a sale, and that the one that had been made was advantageous to them, it might confirm it instead of requiring a new sale to be made under its decree. Garland v. Loving, 1 Rand. 396. The case in judgment, I consider quite as strong as the case just cited, and I think it entirely competent for the court to confirm the sale made by Mason if the circumstances are such as to render it proper. That they are so, I think sufficiently appears. It is shown that the sale was fairly made and that it was to the interest of the infants that the same should be ratified, whilst the widow and the only one of the heirs of Vaughn that had arrived at full age had fully concurred in it.

That the bill filed is in the names of the heirs and not in that of Mason con-123 stitutes no serious objection. *It can make no difference to the appellant, so he gets the title, whether the suit in which the decree is rendered is prosecuted in the names of the former or in that of the latter. Nor was it necessary that it should conform to the statute for the sale of infants' lands at the suit of their guardian or to that concerning partitions. The power of the court over the subject did not depend upon either of these statutes, but grew out of the general principles of equity, and is founded upon the agreement between

Vaughn and Mason. It was the duty of the court, of course, to see that the names of the infants were used for a proper purpose and to promote a beneficial object, but when satisfied of this, and acting for their benefit, it pronounced its decree, the infants are as much bound by it as if they were of full age, and this even if they had been defendants. That infant plaintiffs are as much bound and as little privileged as one of full age has long been considered the established doctrine in England. Gregory v. Molesworth, 3 Atk. R. 626; Brook v. Hertford, 2 P. Wms. 518; and so laid down as settled law by Judge Carr in Brown v. Armistead, 6 Rand. 594. That the sale was for the benefit of the infants and that it is to their interest that it should be confirmed, is ascertained by the report of the commissioner, and indeed is sufficiently shown by the appellant himself. And I entertain no doubt that the decree of the court carrying the same into effect will bind the infants as effectually as they could be in any mode whatever. Whether Mason could have maintained a bill convening the heirs and the purchaser and seeking to confirm the sale is not at all material to enquire. Certainly the appellant by settling with him for his share of the purchase money and accepting a conveyance for his moiety, and consenting to look to the heirs of Vaughn for their title, took away any interest he might otherwise have had to resort to 124 active measures, *and exonerated him from the duty of initiating the proceedings. And by the decree as it is, the heirs of Vaughn are as effectually bound as they could have been by any decree that might be rendered in a suit prosecuted by Mason.

Much of what has been said will apply to the claim now set up by the appellant to covenants of general warranty for the interest of Vaughn's heirs; some further observations on this point may be added.

I have said that a party who purchases real estate in the usual way without any stipulation as to the title is entitled to demand covenants of general warranty. But this right founded on implication may as I have already intimated, be repelled by the circumstances, or it may be waived by the vendee as evinced in his acts and declarations. A vendee may if he please elect to take what the vendor can give though it may not be all he contracted for, and if with full information he chooses to confirm a contract which he had the right to rescind, he will be bound by it, and no new consideration will be necessary to render the confirmation obligatory. Chesterfield v. Janssen, 2 Ves. R. 125, 140; Roche v. O'Brien, 1 Ball & Beat. 330, 355; Cole v. Gibbons, 3 P. Wms. 290; Morse v. Royal, 12 Ves. R. 355. And even in a case of fraud, if instead of repudiating the transaction, the purchaser deal with the property as his own, he will be bound though he afterwards discover a new circumstance of fraud, for that will be considered as only strengthening the evidence of the original fraud, and will not revive the right of repudiation which has been once waived. Campbell v. Fleming, 1 Adolph. & El. 40, 28 Eng. C. L. R. 29.

The question of waiver of objection to the vendor's title is, in every case, one of fact: did the purchaser intend to waive, and has he actually waived, the objection; but the intention may be inferred from his acts, and no direct expression of it is 125 required. Indeed his *silence may in some cases be tantamount to the clearest expression of being content with the title. 2 Sugd. Vend. (6th Am. ed.) 8; Burroughs v. Oakley, 3 Swanst. R. 159. Where a purchaser knows when he makes his contract that there is a defect in the title, and that it will take a considerable time to remove it, or acquires this knowledge after his purchase and acquiesces in the delay, or proceeds with knowledge of the defect, in the execution of the contract, he cannot afterwards complain. Pincke v. Curteis, 4 Bro. Ch. Cas. 329; per Green, J., Vail v. Nelson, 4 Rand. 478, 481. So, where a purchaser knowing of an objection to a title enters into possession of the estate, he may be considered to have himself executed the purchase, and thus waived his objection. Fludyer v. Cocker, 12 Ves. R. 25; Binks v. Lord Rokeby, 2 Swanst. R. 222. And granting a lease to a person in possession under the vendor, will be held to be a taking possession, for the possession of the tenant is the possession of the landlord. Stephens v. Guppy, 3 Russ. R. 171, 3 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 346. Attempting to resell is an important circumstance upon the question of waiver, but it is of itself not conclusive, as the party may have designed merely to ascertain the value without really intending to sell. Knatchbull v. Grueber, 1 Madd. R. 151, 170. So, the preparation of a conveyance is a strong circumstance, as showing that a stage of proceeding had been reached subsequent to the discussion of title, and it may be supposed, therefore, that all objections had been removed or abandoned. Burroughs v. Oakley, 3 Swanst. R. 159. See, also, Ogilvie v. Foljambe, 3 Meriv. R. 52; 2 Sugd. Vend. ch. 8, § 1, p. 7, et seq. And if a purchaser take possession under a contract, and afterwards rejects the title, he must relinquish the possession, although he may have expended money in making improvements. Nicloson v. Wordsworth, 2 Swanst. R. 365.

Now, as we have seen, the appellant
126 was informed *after the sale but before any step had been taken to complete the contract, that the title to one moiety was in the heirs of Vaughn all of whom except one were infants, and that their title was to be obtained and transferred to him by a suit in chancery; yet with this knowledge he proceeded to take possession of the property and make such repair and improvements as his taste or judgment suggested; he settled with Mason for his moiety of the purchase money, and accepted from him a conveyance of his title; and executed a deed of trust upon the property to secure the payment of part of that purchase money; he fully concurred in the proceeding instituted to obtain the title from the heirs and filed an answer to the bill admitting and stating his readiness and anxiety to complete the same; and even after he had raised obstacles to the completion of the contract in the way proposed he yet still insisted in his answer to the amended bill that the complainants (the executrix and heirs of Vaughn) should be compelled to make him a good title to their moiety, and that he should not be put to the necessity of filing a cross bill for that purpose; and this at a time when, if he did not know it when he filed his first answer, being in the hands of his counsel he must have known that the heirs of Vaughn could not be compelled to convey with covenants of general warranty, though I apprehend, he must be supposed to have known this when he first elected to go on with his purchase. He also executed a second deed of trust upon the property to secure the payment of borrowed money, and he continued in possession receiving the rents and profits down to the decree, resisting the suggestion made in the amended bill for the appointment of a receiver. Under these circumstances, I think it quite too late for the appellant to claim to be entitled to covenants of general warranty for the moiety of Vaughn's heirs either from 127 them or *from Mason, and that he must be held by his acts and conduct to have the right to insist upon such covenants.

The distinction sought to be made between the waiver of a defect in a title and of covenants in a deed cannot be maintained. In either case it is an alleged defect in the title proposed; and if a party shall be held by his acts and conduct to have waived a defect in the substance of the title, a fortiori he shall be held to have waived covenants for assurance of a title acknowledged to be good or in which no flaw is shown or pretended.

Several other questions were raised and discussed by the counsel to which I will now briefly advert.

It is said to be a grave error in the decree that it contains no provision that a deed shall be made or tendered to the appellant, and a precedent found in the excellent treatise of Mr. Sands (Sands' Suit in Equity, p. 471, 472), is cited as giving the usual and proper form of such a decree. That this may be a very correct and safe precedent, I am not disposed to question, but so far as I have observed it has not been generally adopted. On the contrary, the more usual practice has been in cases of this kind where a sale is directed to withhold by express provision a conveyance of the title till after the coming in of the report. And the court can as effectually transfer the title by a subsequent order as by a provision in the decree. At the most, I cannot think it so material as to render necessary the reversal of the decree.

The appointment of the counsel for Vaughn's heirs as the commissioner to make the sale, and the refusal of the court to associate with him as such one of the counsel of the appellant, is also complained of as error in the decree. It is the constant practice of the courts to name the counsel prosecuting a claim to a decree for the sale of property as the commissioner, and 128 I am *not aware that the legality of such an appointment has been heretofore questioned. If there be no objection personally, to the counsel so named (and any personal objection in this case is wholly disclaimed), I cannot see any impropriety in such an appointment and especially as the whole matter is under the control of the court whose duty it is to see that its commissioner has acted with perfect fairness and impartiality, and to correct and, if necessary, punish any deviation from the line of duty. Nor do I see any necessity or particular propriety in associating with him the counsel of the other party. If the former is liable to be biased in favor of his clients, the latter is not less so in favor of his, and from this diversity of interests divided counsels might ensue not at all favorable to the prompt and harmonious execution of the decree of the court. At any rate it is a matter within the sound discretion of the court and I cannot see or say that that discretion has been unduly exercised.

I can perceive no necessity in this case for a reference to a commissioner to examine and report upon the title. In England it is true, upon a bill for specific performance, either party may have a reference as to title. 1 Sugd. Vend. (ed. 1843) 357. The practice has not generally obtained to this extent with us. Where the title is doubtful and obscure or depending upon matters in pais, as in the case of Beverley v. Lawson's heirs, 3 Munf. 317, a reference may be very proper and necessary. Here the facts were all before the court, and the question was one of law most appropriate for the court to decide. Jackson v. Ligon, 3 Leigh 161, 180, Judge Carr's opinion. Even according to the English practice where the title is clear, no reference is necessary. Omerod v. Hardman, 5 Ves. R. 722; Rose v. Calland, Id. 186. And such in my view was the title in question here.

The omission to make the trustees
129 or the cestuis que *trust named in the deed to secure Wellington Goddin and J. L. Apperson, parties, is not an error of which the appellant can complain, if error at all. But I think it was no error, for those parties must be regarded as standing on the footing of pendente lite purchasers, and it was therefore not necessary to notice them in these proceedings. Nor do I think the appellant can be heard here to object to the trustee Taylor. If disqualified to act as trustee, he was rendered so by the act of the appellant. But it is difficult to see how he is disqualified. If he claims to be substituted, as the appellant alleges, to the rights of Mason for the amount he advanced to the appellant to enable him to make the cash payment, he can of course only expect to come in after the debt to Mason is fully satisfied, and thus he would have an interest to make the property sell for as much as possible, so as to create a surplus after satisfying Mason's debt out of which his supposed claim might be paid, but he can have no interest in so much of the proceeds of the sale as would be required to discharge the debt to Mason for which and for which alone he could make the sale. Thus his interest would be concurrent, rather than conflicting, with that of the appellant. But in addition to this, the appellant made no objection to a sale upon this ground, nor did he ask the court to substitute some other person as trustee in place of Taylor in case the injunction should be dissolved, and it may be not unreasonable to infer that he was content Taylor should continue to act as such. The objection is made for the first time in this court, and comes too late even if it could have availed the party in the court below.

Another objection taken for the first time in the argument here, is that the motion to dissolve was premature, or at least that the answer should not have been read on the hearing because it had not been filed 130 *either in court or at the rules.

Generally it is true that an answer can only be filed during the session of the court or at the rules, but by our statute, as I think, an exception is made in cases of injunction. The object of giving the judge in vacation power to dissolve an injunction was to prevent delay, and this would be to some extent defeated if a party had to wait until the rule day or a session of the court before he could put in his answer and have the benefit of it on a motion to dissolve. I think the larger power to entertain and decide the motion to dissolve embraces that of receiving the answer and making it a part of the record. If there were any thing in the objection it should properly have been made when the motion to dissolve was heard or at least when the petition to reinstate the injunction was heard and considered by the court.

The last objection I shall notice was that the exceptions to the answer were not set down for argument as the statute requires. There would be some force in this objection if the exceptions could have been made available to the party on argument. I think they could not have been, for I consider the answer as substantially and sufficiently responsive to the bill in all its allegations. That the whole property was sold at the auctioneer's sale, is not contested, and is I think as sufficiently admitted in the answer as it could be by the most categorical answer in the affirmative: and the whole case proceeds on the assumption that the whole property was sold as an entirety, though the sale was subsequently in effect converted into a sale of moieties by the act of the appellant. The other exceptions are for matters rather lying in inference or proof than in the knowledge of the respondent, or are too technical and hypercritical in their character to require consideration here, in view of the 131 provision of *the Code (ch. 181, § 4, p. 680), which declares that a decree shall not be reversed at the instance of a party who has taken depositions for an informality in the proceedings when it appears that there was a full and fair hearing upon the merits and that substantial justice has been done.

Upon the whole I think there was no material error to the prejudice of the appellant in the decree in the case of Vaughn's heirs, and none in the order dissolving the injunction or in that refusing to reinstate it, in the case against Mason and Taylor, and am of opinion that the same should be affirmed.

DANIEL, MONCURE and SAMUELS, Js., concurred in the opinion of Lee, J.

ALLEN, P., dissented upon the merits in the first case. He concurred in affirming Goddin v. Mason.

132 *Bailey & als. v. Poindexter's Ex'or.

January Term, 1858, Richmond.

Wills—Emancipation—Dependent on Slave's Election—Effect.*—Testator provides in his will that the slaves loaned his wife for life, shall have their choice of being emancipated or sold publicly. Their emancipation is made by the will to depend upon their election to be free: And as slaves have no legal capacity to choose, the provision is void and of no effect.

Wills—Emancipation—Dependent on Slave's Election—Effect.—Slaves have no legal capacity to elect between freedom and slavery; and where it appears to have been the intention of the testator that the manumission is to depend on the election of the slaves, the bequest is void. This proposition laid down by the principal case was approved and followed in Williamson v. Coalter, 14 Gratt. 394; and both of these cases were cited in Shue v. Turk, 15 Gratt. 273, as authorizing the proposition.

But, in both the principal case and Williamson v. Coalter, 14 Gratt. 394, MONCURE, J., dissented in a strong opinion in which JUDGE SAMUEL concurred.

And in Jones v. Jones, 92 Va. 594, 24 S. E. Rep. 255, it was said: "It is claimed that the true construction of the language used was to give Bob his right to elect to be free or to remain in slavery. And not being able as a slave, under the decisions in the cases of Bailey v. Poindexter, 14 Gratt. 132, and Williamson v. Coalter, 14 Gratt. 394, to make such election, the provisions of the will were inoperative, and he continued to be a slave. We do not think that this case presents the same question that was decided in those cases, but, if it did, we would not consider those decisions as precluding us from a re-examination of that question, since they are in conflict with the prior decisions of this court during a period of more than fifty years; were decided by a

This was a bill filed in April 1854 in the Circuit court of New Kent, by Richmond T. Lacy, executor of John L. Poindexter, to obtain a construction of the will of Poindexter, and directions for the guidance of the executor. The heirs and devisees of Poindexter, and persons claiming under them, were the defendants in the suit. The difficulty in the construction of the will related to the provisions in relation to his slaves. The will was made in November 1835, and was admitted to probate in December of the same year. By the first clause of the will the testator gives to his nephew Jaqueline L. Poindexter the testator's interest in the tract of land on which said Jaqueline then lived; also a tract called Cedar Lane at the death of the testator's wife; and testator's negro woman Louisa and her children, Sarah, Martha and Barbary and their increase, also testator's Ratler filly, his new saddle and bridle, and his wearing apparel (except his watch), to him and his heirs forever. By the second clause he lent to his wife during her natural life or widowhood, his plantation Cedar Lane, and all the remainder of his property, after the payment of his just debts, and the legacies named in the will. He then directs his wife to pay, out of the property given to her, certain annuities during her life, amounting to ninety dollars, 133 *and some other small sums. He also charged her with hiring out his servant Aaron to whomsoever he might choose to live with, and to pay to him at the end of every year all the money arising from his hire. He then left legacies, to be paid at the death of his wife; one to Ann Lewis Howle of one thousand five hundred dollars, and one to G. Bryan of five hundred dollars. And then comes the three following clauses:

"The negroes loaned my wife, at her death I wish to have their choice of being emancipated or sold publicly. If they prefer being emancipated, it is my wish that they be hired out until a sufficient sum is raised to defray their expenses to a land where they can enjoy their freedom; and if there should not be enough of the perishable property loaned my wife to pay off the legacies to Ann Lewis Howle and Georgianna Bryan, they are to be hired until a sufficient sum is raised to pay the deficiency. If they prefer being sold and remaining here in slavery, it is my wish they be sold publicly, and the money arising be equally divided between my sister Eliza Marshall, the children or heirs of my brother Carter B. Poindexter, my nephews William C. Howle and Daniel P. Howle, and my niece Nancy Bailey."

"If my wife should marry again, it is my wish she should have only one-third of the property loaned her, and the other two-thirds to be disposed of in the same manner as directed in the event of her death."

"If any of the servants loaned my wife should be refractory or hard to manage, I wish my executor to dispose of such at public sale, and the money arising to be funded or loaned out at six per centum per annum, and my wife to have the interest of it during her life, and at her death to go to the heirs of the personal property loaned her above mentioned."

On the same day on which the will was written, the following codicil was added:

"I wish it understood that in the event
134 of my negroes loaned to my *wife being emancipated at her death, and not sold for the benefit of my sister," &c., &c., the persons mentioned in a previous clause, "that my nephew Jaquelin L. Poindexter shall pay the sum of one thousand dollars, to be equally divided between them; and that I give him my plantation Cedar Lane on that condition."

The bill stated that the executor had delivered to the widow personal and perishable property appraised at one thousand one hundred and forty-six dollars and five cents, and twenty slaves, of whom several had died, and, between the death of the testator and that of the widow, thirteen slaves had been born. That the widow was dead, and that no part of the property put into her possession, except the slaves, had been returned to the executor or accounted for, and that he only received the slaves.

The bill was taken for confessed as to all the defendants; and the cause came on to be heard in November 1855, when the court held that the negroes whereof the testator died possessed, were by the terms of the emancipating clause in his will contained, absolutely free at the death of the life tenant, and that it was not proper or necessary to put said slaves to their election. And also that the issue of the females born after his death and in the lifetime of his widow, were also free at the death of the life tenant, said issue being embraced by the general terms of the emancipating clause of said will. And certain accounts were ordered which need not be stated. From this decree, the defendants applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

The case was argued at great length, in writing, by Gregory, Pierce, John Howard and Robertson, for the appellants, and by Branch, Crump and Patton, for the appellees. The reporter has found it impossible to combine in one all the arguments on a side; and equally impossible to insert 135 all of them. He is indebted *to Mr. Howard for the note of his argument; and has selected that of Mr. Patton on the part of the appellees, because it is the last which will appear from him; and Judge Robertson's, because it was in reply to Mr. Patton.

Contracts—Slaves.—In Woodland v. Newhall, 31 Fed. Rep. 438, the principal case and Stevenson v. Singleton, 1 Leigh 72, were cited as holding that contracts to which a slave is a party are null and void.

struction of the will, and insisted that the bequest of freedom to the slaves was made dependent upon their election to become free, then proceeded as follows to consider what is the legal status of the negro slave, and whether he has the right and legal capacity to make such an election:

African slavery, as it exists in Virginia and the southern states, is an institution sui generis. It is often compared to the Feudal villenage and the Roman servitude. It most resembles the last; but it is different from both. Commonwealth v. Turner, 5 Rand. 678; Neal v. Farmer, 9 Georgia R. 579. And no illustrations or analogies drawn from those sources can elucidate its legal character or relations. Ibid. In discussing legal questions growing out of these relations, the remark of Tucker, J., in Elder v. Elder's ex'or, 4 Leigh 252, may be generalized; and it may be said with perfect truth that there is an absence of all authority or analogy upon the subject, so far as any system of jurisprudence is concerned, except our own. The legal character and nature of the slavery in this state must be decided, therefore, from positive law. What law? The constitutional and statute law. For, whatever doubts may be entertained of the correctness of the decision, since the judgment of Lord Mansfield in Somersett's Case, 20 Howell's State Trials, p. 1, it has been regarded as settled, that African slavery is unknown to the common law of England, and therefore unknown to that law as introduced into the colony, now the state of Virginia. And it 136 was upon *this ground that the general court decided in Turner's Case, 5 Rand. 678, that an indictment could not be sustained against a master for malicious, cruel and excessive beating of his own slave, there being no statute upon the subject. In regard, therefore, to his civil rights and relations, the slave is that which the constitutional and statute law makes him. He is that, in legal contemplation, and nothing more. He is unknown to the law, in that respect, except in the ita lex scripta est. What then is the civil status of the slave, as shown by the constitutional and statute law? I contend that by that law, and from the necessary nature of slavery as it exists thereunder—de natura legis et ex necessitate rei—the slave has no civil rights and no legal capacity whatever. Recognized rights on the part of the governed imply civil duties on the part of the government, for rights and duties are correlative terms. Jus obligatio sunt correlata. If the slave has recognized civil rights, the state protects, and is bound to protect, those rights, and the obligation is to the slave. Recognized civil rights also imply civil remedies to enforce them, for without these, rights are nothing; and hence the universal maxim of the law, that there is no legal right without a legal remedy. Civil remedies are the legal sanction and muniment of civil rights, their best criterion and only safeguard. If the slave has civil rights, he must have civil remedies which attach to him as a slave.

Now, all civil rights may be reduced to three principal or primary articles—the right of personal liberty, the right of personal security, and the right of private property. 1 Black. Com. 129, 130. But which of these civil rights has the slave, that the state recognizes on her part any obligation to the slave, to enforce, or does enforce? And what legal remedy has the slave, as such, to enforce it? Save the privilege given him by statute, in 137 the single and exceptional *case of a suit for freedom, in what manner can a slave assert any legal right, plead, or be impleaded? Has he magna charta or habeas corpus? Where are his constitutional guarantees? To ask these questions, is to answer them.

"In a state of slavery (says St. George Tucker, a strong friend of the slave, speaking of the institution as it exists among us), the right of personal liberty and the right of private property are wholly abolished; the person of the slave being at the absolute disposal of his master; and property, what he is incapable, in that state, either of acquiring or holding to his own use." 2 Tuck. Com. on Black., App. p. 54. And as to personal security, the protection of life and limb, given him by the law (for he cannot claim or command it as a right), that but perpetuates his existence and market value in a state of slavery, a state of absolute negation of all legal right and capacity.

A learned juridical writer of much philosophic accuracy of thought has well said, "Chattel slavery may exist under restrictions by municipal law on the power of the master, in view of the interests of society, without vesting the rights of a legal person in the slave. Savigny. Heub. R. R., B. 11, C. 2, § 65. The person held in slavery may continue to have the character of property in the eye of the law, in states wherein, under the influence of public opinion or other moral causes, protection is in practice insured to the slave as a natural person, unknown to other communities wherein the law upon which the relation rests is the same in judicial apprehension." Hurd's Topics of Jurisprudence connected with conditions of Freedom and Bondage, p. 42. Law, indeed, as to the slave, is only a compact between his rulers, with which he has nothing to do, and to which he is utterly unknown. So far from having civil rights, he is but the object of the civil rights of others.

138 *By the constitution of the United States, slaves are recognized as property; and though in the apportionment of representation and of direct taxation, they are included under the designation of "three-fifths of all other persons," yet their rights as persons are utterly ignored. Dred Scott v. Sanford, 19 How. U. S. R. 414; 3 Madison Papers, tit. Slaves. And that congress has passed no law, and has no authority to pass any law, touching the rights and relations of Virginia masters in and to their slaves as property, except to recognize, protect and enforce those rights and relations as they exist under the state constitution and laws, need scarcely be stated to this court, whose decisions have illustrated its jealous fealty to the supremacy of state sovereignty, in all matters within the circle of its peculiar and exclusive jurisdiction.

By the constitution of Virginia slaves are expressly recognized as property, and not at all as persons having civil rights in any respect whatever. Art. iv, § 22, 23.

And now, looking to the statute law of the state, we find that from the earliest period, so far as their civil status is concerned, slaves are always spoken of and treated, in the numerous acts of the house of burgesses and the general assembly, as mere property. It is a curious fact, that there is no statute directly reducing negroes into slavery. "In 1620 (says Captain Smith) a Dutch ship of warre brought us 20 negars" for sale; they were bought by the colonists; and that was the origin of African slavery in Virginia. They were first regarded as personal chattels, were bought and sold, and held like any other personal estate; were subject to the payment of debts, and went to the executor or administrator like any other personalty. Then, for a long time, in particular cases, such as descents, &c., they were made real estate, and passed to the heir at law. 3 Hen. Stat. 333, 139 Oct. 1705; 4 *Hen. Stat. 222, Feb. 1727; 2 Wash. 1–7, Ibid. 68–70; 2 H. & M. 69; 6 Munf. 200. They continued to be such real estate during the whole period of the revolution, and down to 1792, when, by Rev. Code, ch. 103, it was enacted, that "all negro and mulatto slaves, in all courts of judicature in this commonwealth, shall be held, taken and adjudged to be personal estate." This was re-enacted by 1 Rev. Code, p. 431, 1819; and by Code of Va. p. 458, 1849, it is summarily said, "Slaves shall be deemed personal estate."

Looking at these acts, it is safe to say that the law regards a negro slave, so far as his civil status is concerned, as purely and absolutely mere property, to be bought and sold, and pass and descend as a tract of land, a horse or an ox. From this it necessarily follows, that the condition of the negro in slavery is that of absolute civil incapacity, or rather that of an absolute negation of civil existence. Being but mere property himself, he is incapable of owning property of any kind, or of making any legal contract by which property of any kind can be acquired or held. Nor can he do any civil legal act by which the property of others can be lawfully divested or alienated, or the relations of property be in any wise legally changed or affected. In regard to property, and the legal relations of property, he is emphatically and absolutely unknown to the law, except as the subject of property owned by another. And so the courts have uniformly held. The Supreme court of North Carolina, in a recent case, has well expressed the law, in the southern states, upon this point: "Under our system of law, a slave can make no contract. In the nature of things he cannot. He is, in contemplation of law, not a person for that purpose. He has no legal capacity to make a contract; he has no legal mind. He is the property of his master, and all the proceeds of his 140 labor *belong to his owner. If property is devised or given to him, the devise or bequest is void, and the personalty given either belongs to the giver or becomes the property of the owner. A slave has no legal status in our courts, except as a criminal or as a witness in certain cases. In the southern states the policy of our laws in keeping slaves within their proper sphere, has run through all the legislation of which their acts are the subject matter." And the court then decided, that "Contracts made by slaves are void; and if a slave executes his note or bond, and a free man is the security upon it, the note or bond is void, and the security is not liable." Batten v. Faulk, 4 Jones' Law R. 233.

In Virginia the statutes are numerous in which the legal incapacity of slaves to make contracts is clearly declared or implied, and the policy of keeping them in their "proper sphere" of absolute civil non-entity, distinctly enforced by various penalties inflicted upon all persons trading or dealing with them. Oct. 1705, ch. 39, § 15, 3 Hen. Stat. 450; Nov. 1753, ch. 7, 6 Hen. Stat. 359; 1785, 12 Hen. Stat. 183; 1792, Rev. Code, ch. 103; 1819, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 111; 1849, Code of Va. p. 460. And this court has expressly decided, in the case of an executory contract of emancipation, that even upon the full payment by the slave to the master of the contract price for his freedom, the slave cannot enforce a specific execution of the contract. Sawney v. Carter, 6 Rand. 173.

In Stevenson v. Singleton, 1 Leigh 72, another case of a contract by a master with his slave for his emancipation, Cabell, J., delivering the opinion of a full court, says, "In the case of Sawney v. Carter, 6 Rand. 173, this court refused, on great consideration, to enforce a promise by a master to emancipate his slave. It is impossible to distinguish that case from this. This court proceeded upon the principle that it 141 is not competent *to a court of chancery to enforce a contract between master and slave, even though the contract should be fully complied with on the part of the slave."

It is easy to see that these decisions are founded not less upon grounds of paramount public policy than upon sound legal principles. If legal rights be conceded the slave, the courts would become a constant forum for settling disputes between master and slave; from which would arise a state of things utterly incompatible with the proper subordination of the slave; nay, with the existence of slavery in the community. Nor, indeed, from the relation between master and slave, can any contract, by or with a slave, acting for himself, have any possible legal validity whatever. For the parties to every valid contract must be free agents; they must have an "agreeing mind;" but as the will of the slave is under subjection to that of the master, the requisite independence and freedom to make the contract or not, does not exist. A still further and stronger reason is, that since the slave himself, and all the acquisitions of the slave, belong to the master, a contract by the master with his slave, is but a contract by the master with his own property concerning his own property. Nor is it any answer to say that, with the consent of the owner, the slave is competent to contract with third persons; for the slave in such case is but the agent of the master, whose will and control appear in every such permitted act of the slave. The acts of the slave, indeed, are but the acts of the master, if authorized or ratified by him: otherwise, they are of no legal validity or effect. And so emphatically is this true, that the slave cannot act as the agent of any other person than his master. State v. Hart, 4 Ired. R. 246.

There have been similar decisions to the above effect, in all the southern states, in which the legal relations between master and slave have been brought 142 *under adjudication. That a promise or declaration made to a slave, or for his benefit, cannot be enforced in a court of law or equity; that a slave cannot sue or be sued (the exceptional case of a suit for freedom being provided for by statute, or proceeding upon the legal fiction that he is free, and is therefore entitled to relief from bondage); that he cannot own or acquire property of any kind in any way; that he can make no valid contract of any sort—not even that of marriage; that, in fine, he has no civil rights whatever; that his civil rights of every character are transferred to his master; that law as to him is only a compact between his rulers, and the questions which concern him are matters between them. See Beall v. Joseph, Harden's R. 51; The State v. Samuel, 2 Dev. & Batt. 177; Hall v. Dolly Mullen, 5 Har. & John. 190; Susan v. David Wells, 3 Brevard's R. 11; Bland and another v. Dowling, 9 Gill & John. 500; Gist v. Tookey, 2 Rich. R. 424; State, use of Clements, v. Van Lear & als., 5 Maryland R. 92; Sarah and Melinda v. Gardner et als., 24 Alab. R. 719; Smith v. State, 9 Alab. R. 990; Bynum v. Bostick, 4 Dess. R. 266; Cunningham v. Cunningham, Cam. & Nr. 353; Girod v. Lewis, 6 Mart. La. R. 559; Brandon v. Planters and Merchants Bank of Huntsville, 1 Stew. R. 320; Lucy and Mark, 4 Monr. R. 167; Emerson v. Howland, 1 Mason's R. 45; Graves v. Allen, 13 B. Monr. R. 190; Lenoir v. Sylvester, 1 Bailey's R. 632; Ex parte Boylston, 2 Strobh. R. 43; State v. Boom, Taylor's R. 105; State v. Mann, 2 Dev. & Batt. Law R. 579; Fable v. Brown's ex'or, 2 Hill's R. 378; Neal v. Farmer, 9 Georgia R. 507; Dred Scott v. Sanford, 19 How. U. S. R. 407, 475.

These decisions are legal conclusions flowing naturally and necessarily from the one clear, simple, fundamental idea of chattel slavery. That fundamental idea is, that, in the eye of the law, so far certainly as civil rights and relations are con-143 cerned, the slave is *not a person, but a thing. The investiture of a chattel with civil rights or legal capacity is indeed a legal solecism and absurdity. The attribution of legal personality to a chattel slave,—legal conscience, legal intellect, legal freedom, or liberty and power of free choice and action, and corresponding legal obligations growing out of such qualities, faculties and action—implies a palpable contradiction in terms.

In delivering the judgment of the Supreme court in Dred Scott v. Sanford, Chief Justice Taney states, in the clearest manner, the true light and condition in which the African race was esteemed and held at the time of the foundation of our state and federal governments, and historically and philosophically accounts for the existing legal and political relations between the white man and the negro. See 19 How. U. S. R. 407-14.

An application of the foregoing principles and decisions ought, as it seems to me, to settle this case. In a bequest to slaves of a mere election between freedom and slavery, we have seen that there is no absolute, but only a conditional emancipation; that the election of the slaves to become free, is a necessary condition precedent to the accruing of their freedom; and therefore, that on their will and pleasure, on their choice or volition, is made to depend their future legal status. Recurring then to the direct question to be decided—Are slaves endowed with the civil right or legal capacity to choose between freedom and slavery? Can they emancipate themselves by their own volition? Can they divest the property of others in themselves, by any legal act of their own? But if it has been shown that the slave has no civil rights whatever; that he has no civil status; that he can do no legal, civil act; that he has no legal mind, will or discretion; that he has absolutely no existence in the eye of the civil jurisprudence, except as a chattel, the subject of property, 144 and *the object of the civil rights of others; with what reason can it be contended that he has the civil right and legal capacity to divest the property of others in himself; or to do that great, transcendent act of supreme civil dignity and sovereign power, the transformation of himself from a thing into a person, from a chattel to a man, clothed with all the high attributes of a citizen, which attach to his race? And if his master, the maker of the laws, endowed with all civil rights and plenary civil capacity, cannot emancipate him except by deed or will, executed in solemn form, can he emancipate himself by the simple expression of his pleasure to be free? Or, on the other hand, if the law requires (Sess. Acts 1855-6, p. 37) that in order to enslave himself, if free, a negro must go through regular prescribed forms in a high court of justice, with all the safeguards of judicial protection around him, shall it be said that he can enslave himself forever, perchance by the mere light volition of a moment, the utterance of a word, or the nodding of his head? Where is the legal consistency in such anomalies and contradictions as these? How can they be reconciled with the established legal incapacity of the slave, or with either the spirit or the letter, or the purposes and policy of the emancipation laws?

Nor is it possible to escape the force of these views, by saying that in electing to become free, there is no exercise on the part of the slave of any civil right or capacity, but the mere performance of a condition, which, however unwise or absurd, the testator had a right to impose as a condition precedent to the emancipation; for this is but to change the form, without affecting the substance of the difficulty; which then only resolves itself into the identical original enquiry, What civil right or legal capacity has the slave to perform, or claim to perform, a condition, the performance of which is to operate his 145 enfranchisement? *The answer is, that he has no civil rights or legal capacity at all, and therefore none to perform the required condition. Change or turn the question as you may, this fundamental and impregnable obstacle arises, which no ingenuity can evade, and no fertility of hypothesis alter or affect. The act of election involves the exercise of civil rights and legal capacity; and an emancipation made dependent upon the exercise of civil rights or legal capacity by the slave, is necessarily void ab ovo. The event can never happen upon which the freedom is to accrue; and the case comes clearly within the principle of the decisions cited and approved in Taylor v. Cullen, 12 Gratt. 398; which decisions themselves are but illustrations of the ancient, general and cardinal rule in respect to grants or bequests upon conditions precedent, that, until the condition is performed, the estate or right cannot vest, and if impossible to be performed at the time of its creation, the estate or right can never vest at all, but is originally void. Co. Litt. 206; 2 Bl. Comm. 157; 1 Lom. Dig. 273, § 16.

Nor has the master any just ground of complaint against this result, as tending to abridge his rights in respect to his slaves. The power to emancipate is not unlimited. Before the act of 1787, emancipation was absolutely prohibited, except by consent of the governor and council first had and obtained. That act authorized and permitted emancipation in the mode thereby prescribed, to wit: by deed or will. That act is the law of this case. It empowers the master to manumit his slave by deed or will; but it must be his own complete act; he cannot authorize and empower the slave to manumit himself or not, according to his will and pleasure. And so, in principle and substance, this court has decided; for it has held that "emancipation is the conjoint act of the master and the law, with which the slave has nothing to do."
146 *Wood v. Humphreys, 12 Gratt. 340.

And as on the one hand, "he cannot refuse freedom when conferred upon him" —(ibid.)—e converso, he cannot elect to take or decline it, when it is left to his option.

But it is said, that though slaves are chattels, and are incapable of forming any legal contract, or doing other legal civil act, yet that they are not mere chattels, that they are human, sentient, moral and intellectual beings; that as such, they are dealt with by the law; and therefore, that they ought to be held capable of an election between freedom and slavery. And a class of cases has been cited, at first blush giving countenance to this view. Thus, in Bean v. Summers, 13 Gratt. 412, cited by Mr. Crump, occurs this remark of Moncure, J., delivering the opinion of the court: "Slaves are not only property, but rational beings; and are generally acquired with reference to their moral and intellectual qualities." Now it is to be observed in this discussion, that the true enquiry is, not what is the moral and intellectual character or capacity of the negro race, or for what qualities or habits slaves are generally acquired or esteemed, but what is the relation they sustain to the law of the land? And by reference to the case cited, it will be seen that the remark of the judge, above quoted, had no allusion whatever to the civil relations or status of the slave, but on the contrary referred to his moral and intellectual qualities as affecting his peculiar value as an article of property. The question was, whether a court of equity will decree the specific execution of a contract for the sale or delivery of slaves at the suit of the purchaser, without any allegation or proof of peculiar value; and in dealing with this question, the court looked to the character of the slave as an article of property, and to his moral and intellectual qualities as calculated to engender sentiments of friendship, affection and esteem on 147 the part of the master towards *the slave, which might invest the slave with such special and peculiar value, in the eye of the master, as that adequate compensation for the loss of the slave could not be had at law in an action for damages. All the South Carolina decisions cited in the opinion of the court, proceed upon the same ground. See particularly Young v. Burton, 1 McMul. Eq. R. 25. And they decide, as the Court of appeals decided in this case, that a master may very well attach such a special and peculiar value to his slave on account of his personal qualities, as that no jury could give adequate compensation for his loss. The court say: "Slaves are not only property, but rational beings; and are generally acquired with reference to their moral and intellectual qualities. Therefore damages at law, which are measured by the ordinary market value of the subject, will not generally afford adequate compensation for the breach of a contract for the sale of slaves. There is at least as much reason for enforcing the specific execution of such a contract as a contract for the sale of real estate. The only difference between the two cases seems to be this, that while in the latter specific execution will always be enforced if the contract be unobjectionable, and the suit be brought in due time, it will not in the former, if the slaves were purchased as merchandise, without reference to their peculiar value to the purchaser, or that the plaintiff is a mere mortgagee or other incumbrancer; in which case, as the slaves are to be sold at all events, damage at law assessed according to their market value, would be adequate compensation." The reasoning of the court plainly shows that it regarded the slave merely as an article of property, to which his qualities or habits, or to which peculiar circumstances might attach a special value, just as special value is attached to real estate from natural causes; and to argue thence that a negro slave was adjudged or recognized by that case to 148 *be endowed with the social and civil attributes of a white man, would be about as logical as to argue that real estate was adjudged or recognized to be endowed with the same attributes, because such is its character as property, and such the peculiar associations and feelings with which it is invested and regarded by mankind, that the law will enforce the specific execution of a contract for its purchase or sale.

In Boyce v. Anderson, 2 Peter's R. 150, cited by the same counsel, Judge Marshall said, "A slave has volition, and has feelings which cannot be entirely disregarded." But look at the case. It was an action of damages to recover the value of slaves lost by the negligence of the captain and commandants of a steam boat, as common carriers. The Supreme court held that the law regulating the responsibility of common carriers, did not apply to the case, because the carrier has not, and could not have, the same control over slaves that he has over inanimate matter; that in the nature of things a slave resembled a passenger, and not a package of goods. The same might have been said of an apprentice, or other person bound to service. And the chief justice, in delivering the opinion of the court, referred to the fact, that though there are no slaves in England, there are persons in whose service another has a temporary interest; but that the responsibility of a carrier, for injury which such person might sustain, has never been placed on the same principle with his responsibility for a bale of goods. But surely, in deciding that point, the English courts had no reference to the civil status of the persons so held to service; nor did the Supreme court in this case have any reference to the civil status of the slave. It considered the qualities, habits and character of the slave, as affecting his character as an article of transportation. "A slave (says the judge) has volition, and has feelings which cannot be 149 entirely disregarded. These *properties cannot be overlooked in conveying him from place to place. He cannot be stowed away as a common package. Not only does humanity forbid this proceeding, but it might endanger his life or health. Consequently, this rigorous mode of treatment cannot be adopted, unless stipulated for by contract. But left at liberty, he may escape. The carrier has not and cannot have the same absolute control over him that he has over a common package," &c. And therefore the carrier was not held to as high a degree of responsibility in the transportation of slaves, as in the transportation of a common package. The same principle, it is presumed, would apply, sub modo, to dogs, cattle, wild animals, &c. over which "the carrier has not and cannot have the same absolute control as over a common package." It might be good logic, but it would be bad law, to say that therefore dogs, horses, cattle and animals, feræ naturæ, were recognized, as something more, in legal contemplation, than mere property. It is alike bad logic and bad law to say that, by this case, slaves are recognized as any thing more. In the discussion of legal propositions, nothing is more dangerous than to adduce the incidental remarks, dicta or allusions of judges, applicable enough, or excusable, in the cases in which they occur, to elucidate points of an utterly different character arising in an utterly different connection, and embracing relations and consequences to which the judges in the cases cited had no reference, and which they could not possibly, by any logical association of ideas, have had in mind.

But the learned counsel need not have cited these authorities to prove that negro slaves have intelligence, feelings and volition. As late indeed as 1782, a doubt was publicly expressed in the British parliament, as to whether an African negro has a soul. And many philosophic specu-150 lations have been indulged in *regard to his claim to be considered of the same origin and genus as ourselves. But common observation teaches that our slaves, in some cases, have a very high degree of intellect and moral sense, and all of them have, in these latter times, a strong enough will of their own, which needs no invigoration or activity from a bestowal upon them of civil rights and legal capacity incompatible with their condition as slaves. The moral and intellectual qualities of our slaves, in fact, as in the case of Roman and all other slaves, enter largely into the elements of their value; it is because they have intelligence, a sense of right and wrong, and volition, that they are such useful instruments, as Aristotle calls them in domestic and social life. And it is the pride and pleasure of many families in Virginia to cultivate the intellectual, moral and religious faculties and feelings of their slaves to as high a degree as circumstances will admit.

But all this has nothing to do with the question under consideration. The court is not sitting as an ethnological society, to ascertain and determine the peculiar natural or acquired characteristics of the negro race; nor as a committee to investigate the elements and extent of the value of slaves. The enquiry is, What is the legal status of the slave under our laws? Has he any legal volition, the exercise of which can change his legal condition, or affect the legal rights of the white race? If so, where is the statute which gives it? Where is the decision which defines its character and extent, or sanctions the legality, and prescribes the limits of its exercise? No statute can be found; and the absence of all authority is sufficiently illustrated by the citation of such cases as Summers v. Bean, and Boyce v. Anderson.

A much more plausible argument or illustration might have been drawn from a more direct and practical source. It might be said that the criminal code
151 of *Virginia recognizes slaves as responsible beings, and affixes penalties to the commission of crime by them; and that therefore the law of the land thus admits them to be endowed with intelligence, free will, and a moral sense—the same qualities or capacities which are requisite for rational choice between freedom and slavery. But even this will not bear examination. For, by recurring to the true issue, we see that the enquiry is, not as to whether a negro slave can commit a crime and will be punished for it, but what is his civil status. A married woman may commit a crime and will be punished for it, though she has no power to make a contract, and her civil being is absolutely merged in that of her husband. Her civil relations are very different things from the relation she sustains to the criminal law. The commission of a crime implies intelligence, free will, and a moral sense; but these do not fix the civil status, or necessarily affect it in any manner. Idiots, lunatics and infants of tender years have all a fixed civil status, and fixed civil relations to property. They may inherit or be inherited from. They may be the objects of devises or bequests, though they cannot devise and bequeath. They may and do hold thousands of slaves, who, considered as natural persons, are endowed with some sort of intelligence, free will and moral sense; yet the slaves, though thus endowed, cannot inherit or be inherited from; they cannot be the objects of devises or bequests, nor can they devise or bequeath, nor can they hold or acquire property in any manner of any kind. The civil status, therefore, is one thing; the criminal status is another and very different thing. The civil status has reference to property and all its relations; the power of holding it, using it, controlling it, acquiring it, and parting with it. The criminal status has reference to the moral relations between man and man. An individual may 152 have a very high *position in the one scale, and none at all in the other. An idiot may hold property, but is incapable of committing crime. A slave may commit crime, but is incapable of holding property. The two things are distinct and different, and have no necessary legal or logical connection the one with the other. In ascertaining the criminal status or capacity of a party charged with crime, no reference need be had to his civil abilities or disabilities. In ascertaining the civil status or capacity of a party who attempts to do a legal civil act, no reference need be had to his responsibilities at the bar of the criminal courts. We must, therefore, look to the civil jurisprudence for the civil status of the slave, and to the criminal jurisprudence for his criminal status. And in looking to the civil jurisprudence for the civil status of the slave, we have seen that the slave, as such, has no civil capacity or existence whatever.

But it is contended that the capacity of a slave to elect between freedom and slavery, is res adjudicata, and citation is made to Pleasants v. Pleasants, 2 Call 270, and to Elder v. Elder's ex'or, 4 Leigh 252.

Now, in regard to Pleasants v. Pleasants, it is sufficient to observe that the direct question raised in this case does not appear either to have been mooted or suggested by the bar, nor to have been considered or at all alluded to by the court. Nor indeed was there any just reason why it should have been argued or considered. For the wills of both John and Jonathan Pleasants conferred an absolute emancipation, when the laws of the country would permit it, and the slaves arrived at thirty years of age. For though John Pleasants, in the first clause of his will, apparently bestows a mere election, yet he immediately adds, in explanation, "I say all my slaves to be free at the age of thirty years," &c. Such is Judge Green's view of this will, when citing it in a subsequent 153 case. *Maria v. Surbaugh, 2 Rand. 232. And the two wills were considered identical, and construed together by this court. The whole case shows that both court and counsel regarded the slaves as absolutely emancipated, upon the conditions above mentioned, and therefore no question arose or could arise as to the legal right or capacity to elect. Certainly nothing is said in the argument about the right of election; nothing in the opinions of any of the judges; and no provision is made in the decree, giving the slaves an opportunity for an election; which certainly would have been done, if it had been considered that any thing was to be done by them to complete their emancipation. The decree proceeds upon the supposition of an absolute emancipation of the slaves when thirty years of age, and the laws would permit it; and "decides, that though if the testator had devised them upon condition that the devisees should emancipate them immediately, the condition being unlawful, would have been void, and the property vested; yet, that the condition that they should become free when the law would permit it, was not." The truth is, the great question in that elaborately argued and considered case, turned upon the doctrine of perpetuities and executory limitations, and not upon what is the civil status of the slave, or what constitutes or amounts to emancipation in a will. And that case decides nothing at all in reference to the main point in this.

So likewise in regard to Elder v. Elder. The question as to the civil capacity of a slave to emancipate himself, by electing to become free, does not appear to have been suggested by counsel, nor considered by the court. There was a question raised as to the necessity of the choice being made within a given time (twelve months), but no allusion is any where made in the case as to the enquiry whether the slaves had any legal right or capacity to elect at 154 all. This *question was, in fact, passed over sub silentio, as it well might, nay, certainly ought to have been; for, so far from having been raised for adjudication by the pleadings, the plaintiff's bill proceeded upon the concessum of such legal right and capacity, and claimed the slaves upon the ground that the stipulated time for making the election had passed, and claimed Mingo, indeed, upon the ground that he had elected, within the given time, to remain a slave—(see abstract of the bill and answer, p. 253 of the reported case); and by "consent of parties" in the court below, it was referred by the chancellor to commissioners to ascertain the choice of the slaves. By all which it appears, that in no shape or form was the question mooted by counsel or passed upon by the court below, and that in fact it could not have been passed upon, as it was not suggested by the pleadings, and the decree was entered as a consent decree. And as the point was not passed upon by the court below, of course it could not be the subject of revision in the Court of appeals. Even if this court had elaborately considered and decided it, the one way or the other, the decision would have been clearly extrajudicial, and of no binding effect in subsequent cases. But this court did not consider or decide the point at all, nor did it consider or decide any thing in reference to the civil status or capacity of the slave. Much stress will be laid upon certain expressions which fell from the judges who sat in the case; but a careful analysis of the opinions delivered will show that they all proceed upon the concession of the capacity of the slaves to make the election, which was certainly right in that case, for the reasons above stated. And it will further be seen that the two main questions argued and decided were, first, Whether sending the slaves to Liberia was a legal mode of emancipation; to which question the expressions above alluded to wholly referred 155 —(see especially *the first clause of Judge Tucker's opinion, and of Judge Cabell's and Judge Carr's); and secondly, Whether time was of the essence of the condition on which they should be sent to Liberia, that condition, i. e. their choosing to go, being tacitly assumed as legal and valid, as above shown. Elder v. Elder, on this point, is the law of that case, and none other. The most, in any possible view, which can be contended for is, that the point was decided by implication, sub silentio, without argument or consideration; in which event, it would not be binding authority even if decided by a full court, which was not the case. Great questions like this, affecting state policy not less than large private interests, ought never to be determined without thorough discussion and careful consideration; and it is not too much to ask or expect of this court, a full court of five judges, untrammeled by loose phrases or obiter intimations in supposed decisions upon points not argued and not under adjudication, to take into serious deliberation the novel but highly important question now for the first time distinctly presented, upon full argument, for its authoritative judgment.

Still another view of this will leads to the conclusion that it is void. Supposing it legally possible for the slaves to make an election, until election is made they certainly are not free, but remain in a state of slavery, with the power at any time to leave it. In what sort of condition is that? It is not freedom, because the choice of freedom has not been made. It is not slavery, because that implies the right and power of coercion on the part of the master, while the moment that coercion is applied, the subject of it may defeat and defy the authority of its application by electing to be free. That is, the negroes may enjoy all the benefits and advantages of the condition of slavery without the necessity of compulsory labor, or the fear of salutary punishment for indolence or in-156 subordination. *And this state of things is to exist for an indefinite time, as no limit is prescribed in the will as the period of possible election. An intermediate and anomalous condition like this is fully covered by the rule, and the reason of the rule, established in Rucker's adm'r v. Gilbert, 3 Leigh 8, and Wynn & als. v. Carrell & als., 2 Gratt. 227.

Mr. Howard then entered into an elaborate review of the history and the policy of the emancipation laws and of the laws in pari materia. He contended, that since the earlier decisions of this court favoring freedom to the slave, there had been a radical revolution in the legislation and policy of the state in respect to the institution of slavery; that that institution was now consolidated and fortified by the organic and statute law, and that its protection and perpetuation was a chief part of the public policy of Virginia and of all the southern states; that the maxims of the civil and common law in favorem libertatis, arose from a state of things, and were applied to a class of persons, utterly different from those before us; that those maxims had no just application to our negro slaves; and that it was the duty of the courts of the commonwealth, in cases of doubtful emancipation, to favor and perpetuate slavery, instead of following the suggestions of a false philanthropy in aiding its destruction. But it is impossible to present here even an outline of this part of the argument, as the point is not considered in the opinion of the majority of the court.

Patton, for Poindexter's executors, after discussing some minor points, proceeded as follows:

Are the slaves loaned to the wife of the testator entitled to their freedom, subject to the charges on them imposed by the will? This is the principal and most material question.

There has been a good deal of 157 discussion by the *counsel, of the question, whether the slaves were absolutely free at the death of the tenant for life. I shall not engage in that discussion. I am willing to concede for the purposes of this argument; and indeed candor compels me to say, that in my opinion it is true, they were not free at the death of the widow. Certainly they are not to be discharged from the liability to be hired out to meet the charges on them prescribed by the will. And I do not think they were entitled to freedom unless they on being put to their election choose to be free. I am willing that the will shall be construed exactly as if the testator had said in terms, "I am indifferent, so far as my own wishes go (though I have no doubt he wished them to be free), whether my slaves are emancipated or not; but I wish them to have their choice of being free; and if they wish to be emancipated, I direct my executors to emancipate them, after raising from their hires enough to pay certain charges, and to raise a fund to defray their expenses to a land of freedom. If they do not choose to be emancipated, I direct them to be sold publicly." I maintain on authority, reason and analogy, such is the fair interpretation of the will; and that the negroes are entitled to their freedom on the terms (and only on the terms) thus prescribed by the will.

As to the first proposition, I might say, as was said in Elder v. Elder, 4 Leigh 256, by Judge Carr, "It is just as clear as any form of words could make it, that he intended his slaves should be emancipated if they chose to be, instead of to remain in slavery;" and by Judge Cabell, "The intention of the testator to emancipate his slaves is too evident to require argument." Judge Tucker says, "Of the intention (of the testator to emancipate) I think there can be no reasonable doubt."

Now in that case, as in this, there
158 was no express *emancipation. In that case it was inferred from the direction to send them to Liberia, a free state, if they chose to go; in this, if they choose to be free, they are to be hired to raise a fund to carry them "to a land of freedom." In this (making the case stronger than Elder v. Elder), it is not matter of inference, but it is expressly declared they shall have their choice of being emancipated or not. If any thing less than a clear, distinct, express emancipation by will, will be sufficient, this testator has shown the intention to emancipate if the slave desired it. It would be a useless waste of time to cite authorities to prove, that to show an intention to give an estate or emancipate a slave, express words are not necessary; but any words which show the intention, have the same legal effect as if that intention was expressed. It is not necessary to depend merely on the authority of Elder v. Elder; though certainly none higher, more venerable, or more entitled to respect, can be found, than the solemn, deliberate, well considered judgment of this court in the time of Carr, Cabell, Brooke and Tucker. If the judicial judgment of such a tribunal, formed with deliberation, and after argument by some of the most eminent lawyers in the state, upon a will in every essential particular like the one before us; a decision which was probably before the testator when he wrote this will; or before the person who wrote it for him, is not sufficient to settle the law of this case, I know nothing better calculated to destroy confidence in the administration of justice, or to unsettle and impair the rights of property or the security of liberty or life.

Presuming then that the court will have no difficulty in saying that the testator intended that his negroes should be emancipated by his executors if they made choice of freedom; and that such intention being ascertained from the will, it is the same thing as if he had said so in so many 159 words, I need say nothing more *in answer to the idea on the other side, that the will does no more than bequeath, that the slaves shall have the choice of saying whether they wish to be free or not. Of course if the testator intended nothing more, giving them their choice would be idle nonsense; their expression of it mere wind; the offering it to them, cruel and absurd mockery. When we find however that the true interpretation of the will is, that the testator has devised that if they express their choice to be free, then they shall be emancipated, we find that the whole argument on the other side has been built upon a false hypothesis, and every thing said in support of it becomes "idle wind," because wholly irrelevant to the question.

A great deal of labor and learning have been employed to prove that the legal status of a slave is that of a personal chattel; that he is mere property; that he can do no legal civil act, can make no contract, &c.: and all this for the purpose of showing that he cannot make himself free by his own choice; that he can have no effectual will on the subject, and cannot be invested with any power of emancipating himself. Whilst all this is true—at least to a great extent—for the purposes of the argument it is rendered wholly futile by the fact, that he is not in the case in question allowed to emancipate himself. The negroes in this case do not make themselves free, or continue slaves by their own choice. They are emancipated not by any choice of their own, or by any act of their own, but by the will of their master, who has a right by the law to emancipate them. They are free not because he has given them power to emancipate themselves (which it is conceded he cannot do), but because he has the right and has in effect declared that they shall be emancipated. They are property, and so far as concerns the right of emancipation, nothing but property. And it is because they 160 are property and *subject to the absolute power of the master to emancipate them or not, that when by his will he in terms or effect declares they shall be emancipated they are entitled to the freedom he confers on them by virtue of his power, not theirs; by his lawful act, not theirs. The executor emancipates them, not because they have any authority over him; not because their choice gives them the right to be free; but because their master and his testator has required them to be emancipated, on making their election.

It is true that the testator has chosen to make the power and duty of the executor in carrying into effect his will, that the slaves should be emancipated, to depend on the previous ascertainment of the wishes of the slaves themselves. But that does not prevent the emancipation being the act of the testator. If the will is to be construed as directing the emancipation, and the emancipation is by the will of the testator, how is it possible that the validity of the act of emancipation can be affected by the considerations or causes which induced the testator to emancipate his own slaves. It is, I presume, a matter of no importance how insufficient, or even how absurd or ridiculous may be the causes which influenced him, or the events on which he makes the emancipation to depend: His intention to emancipate would be none the less effectual, and the emancipation none the less his act.

If a testator by his will declared during the late presidental eleotion, If Fremont is not elected president of the United States, then I wish all my slaves to be free: Or, If I make a crop of one hundred bushels of potatoes, I wish all my slaves to be emancipated: Or, If my wife's cat kittens between this and Christmas, I will all my slaves to be free; otherwise not: In all these cases, I presume, if the wills were admitted to probate, the right to freedom, on the happening of the event, would 161 be clear; and would *be ineffectual if they did not happen. Yet it would hardly be contended, that Buchanan by defeating Fremont; the potatoes; or the cat by having her litter in the time prescribed, had emancipated the slaves; or that the bequest was void because one man cannot emancipate another man's slaves; because potatoes are merely property; or a cat has no legal status, and cannot do any legal civil act!!! And yet it might be with as much reason so argued. I mean to treat the learned and ingenious argument on the other side with all respect: but it seems to me they are fairly exposed to this reductio ad absurdum.

Nor does the exercise of this power in the mode pursued by this will, involve any inconsistency with the analogies of the law: but the contrary. Nothing is more common, nor more unquestionably valid, than for the owner of property to make his disposition of it by deed or will, depend on the choice or discretion of others: and even on the discretion and choice of others whose legal status is such as to disable them from disposing of their own property by deed or will, or from making a valid contract. A man may provide by deed or will, that his estate may be given as a particular person, though an infant or a married woman, may appoint by deed or will. He makes the choice of the infant or the married woman determine the destination of his own property. But this right of choice does not create a right of property in the donee of the power; nor is it inconsistent with the disability of the donee of the power, whether an infant or married woman, to dispose of their own property, or make contracts binding themselves. The appointees in such cases derive their estate not from the donee of the power, but from the grantor of the power. It is his estate that is given, not theirs. In like manner the giving the choice to slaves for the purpose of enabling the owner to determine whether he 162 will emancipate *them, confers on them no power to do any civil act, no capacity to make themselves free or slaves. Their expressed wish to be free is the reason which induces the master to emancipate them.

Still it is argued that there is something in the peculiar character of slavery, in the legal status of slaves, in their incapacity to do any civil act, or some thing else in the policy of the law, which forbids a man to give them the choice whether they wish to be free or not. I am at a loss to understand what public policy is opposed to his doing so. If a man desirous of giving freedom to his slaves, unwilling to exercise his unquestioned power of emancipating them whether they wish it or not, were to call them up and consult them about it, and decide according to their wishes expressed to himself, who could complain? Would not every body say that he was not only authorized to do so, but that it was a most humane and considerate course of proceeding? If he were to make a deed of emancipation in which he recited that he had offered to his slaves their choice of freedom; that some of them had declined it, but that others had expressed a choice of freedom; and that in compliance with their wishes he had proceeded to execute this deed of emancipation: Does any body suppose that the deed would be invalidated thereby? or whatever difference of opinion there might be as to the wisdom of permitting the wishes of his negroes to guide his action, that public policy would be opposed to his course? There can be but one answer to these questions.

An owner of a slave has just as absolute a power of emancipation by will as he has by deed. His power and control over his property continues after his death, as fully as it did before; so far as he exercises that power by last will and testament. And surely he may invest his executor with the power of emancipation; and declare the same terms and conditions on which 163 *they shall be emancipated by the executor as he might have imposed on himself. If he may lawfully suffer his own act of emancipation to be determined by ascertaining the choice of his negroes in his lifetime, why may he not emancipate them subject to their choice, to be ascertained after his death?

I trust I have already shown that the legal validity of the act is not questionable on the ground that he thereby invests a slave with a power in or control over his emancipation inconsistent with his civil incapacity. Is there any thing inconsistent with the status of slavery in a moral point of view, in his wishes being consulted as a guide to his owner in deciding whether he will emancipate him. It is a great mistake to suppose that a slave is a mere chattel: that in regarding the master's legal or moral powers, rights and duties in respect to him, he is property and nothing but property. The whole civil as well as criminal law is full of rules and statutes recognizing a slave as a rational, moral and accountable human being, endowed with the feelings, passions and affections of human nature; capable of having both wishes and opinions respecting his own welfare; though restrained both by civil and criminal law, from expressing them in forms prohibited or condemned by the law. But subject to the rules growing out of a condition of slavery, or specific restrictions, there is nothing to prevent a slave from expressing a wish to have his freedom. He may unquestionably do so in response to the enquiry of his master; and has not, nor assumes, nor is invested thereby with any civil right, or exercises any civil act by doing so.

Slaves may be and frequently are enabled by their masters to do civil acts binding on their masters. They are not unfrequently, indeed constantly, authorized to act as agents of their owners in making contracts for their masters, and even for them-164 selves by *his authority. They are daily invested with the custody and safe-keeping of their master's property, and even with the sale of produce, the collection of money, &c. &c. In short, the value of slaves would be very much impaired to their owners if they were incapable of doing any civil act even by the authority, or as agents of their masters.

An illustration or two will serve to show that slaves may be invested with the right of choice in respect to themselves; and that their masters may be bound by the exercise of their choice when authorized to choose for themselves. Nothing is more common than for masters, in deference to the feelings of their slaves, to send them out for hire, with written authority to choose to whom they will be hired for a year; and for the price he is willing to take. Can the master be compelled to hire him to whoever will give the price, or is the contract with the person chosen by the slave void because he cannot be invested with the right to choose his hirer, or because authorized by the master to make the selection?

I send my servant to a merchant tailor, with authority in writing to buy for himself a suit of clothes of any fashion or quality he chooses: Cannot I invest him with such a choice, and would I not be bound to pay for the clothes he bought?

There is nothing then in the status of a slave which prevents a master from giving him a right to make a choice even in respect to matters affecting his own comfort, or feelings or even caprice. And of all things there is the least objection to his being consulted about and allowed to choose whether he wishes to be free or not. The law gives the master the absolute and unqualified discretion to emancipate. He alone is to judge of the sufficiency of the reasons for emancipation. And in the eye of reason, and looking to the humane and patriarchal nature of the institu-165 tion, *and the affectionate relations it creates between masters and their slaves, nothing can be more natural, and in accordance with its civilizing and humanizing tendencies, than that a master should not voluntarily, and still less that he should be required by law, when he breaks up their relations by emancipation, to do so without regard to the wishes of the slaves; and thus force them into freedom against their will or without consulting them. To talk about this being required by the policy of law, now when the statute has provided that a negro after being emancipated may come into court, and be made a slave on his own choice, is it seems to me both bold and desperate.

I feel that I owe an apology to the court for so protracted a discussion of this question, especially after the able arguments of Messrs. Branch and Crump, both representing the slaves. Some of these views, however, have not been anticipated by them, or at least have been presented now in a new aspect, and may possibly be acceptable to the court. The very elaborate arguments on the other side called for an extended reply, and the argument of Mr. Howard, which has been filed since those of Messrs. Branch and Crump, presented the argument on the other side in a somewhat new form, to which it was proper therefore that I should reply.

There is another reason for an apology for treating the question so gravely on principle; and that is, that the question is res adjudicata; and ought to be considered as not open for argument in this court; if it were doubtful as an original proposition. The cases of Pleasants v. Pleasants, 2 Call

319, and the case of Elder v. Elder's ex'or, 4 Leigh 252, especially the latter, is a direct adjudication on the very question, and in every aspect of the argument. I will not occupy the time of the court in showing that the distinctions between the two 166 cases relied on by the other *side, do not exist, or that if they are distinctions they make no difference in principle.

In Pleasants v. Pleasants, it may be said the question, as to making emancipation depend on the choice of the slave, was not directly made and argued. But it is scarcely less authoritative for that reason. The right of the slaves to freedom was earnestly and zealously controverted both by Wickham and Randolph. If they who were seeking every possible and plausible ground of argument, did not resist the right on the ground that a choice was given to the slaves, it must have been because those eminent lawyers, one of them perhaps the ablest and the most astute lawyer the state ever had, were satisfied there was no force in such an objection.

In Elder v. Elder's ex'or, it is evident that the identical arguments relied on here, were urged by the counsel in that case; and certainly were considered by the court, and decided. Numerous cases have occurred since probably of the same sort, which have been executed in conformity to the case of Elder v. Elder, in submission to its authority. Numerous cases have since been adjudged by this court, in which Elder v. Elder has been cited; and no intimation has been given by the court, of its being regarded as not authority, or as open to review. It ought to be regarded no longer as an open question.

Robertson, for the appellant, in reply:

My associates have furnished elaborate arguments fully answering those presented by the opening counsel for the appellees. I shall endeavor to confine myself to the closing argument of Mr. Patton on the same side. My purpose is to avoid as far as practicable general and abstract discussions touching the civil condition or status of slaves, or the evils or benefits of negro slavery, and to argue the points 167 which arise *in this particular case, in reference to the rights of the parties concerned, under the law and policy of Virginia.

Mr. Patton discusses four questions:

The two first relate to errors conceded or rather affirmed by him to exist in the decree appealed from; one in emancipating, inadvertently no doubt, the slaves bequeathed to J. L. Poindexter; the other in refusing an account of certain property willed by the testator to his widow for life. It is enough to say, that I concur with Mr. Patton on both points, and ask that the decree may be so far reversed.

I may add here a further ground for reversal, namely, that the decree confers on the slaves absolute and unconditional freedom. In doing this it violates the express provision of the will which makes the freedom or continued slavery of the negroes to depend on their own wishes or preference. It is unsustained by precedent; and if the case of Elder v. Elder, relied on by the appellees, be law, it is in direct conflict with that case. Indeed this error also seems admitted by Mr. Patton.

The third question argued by Mr. Patton is, Are the slaves loaned to the wife entitled to freedom subject to the charges of the will? This, as he says, is the main question before the court.

I do not understand Messrs. Gregory and Pierce to contend (as Mr. Patton supposes) that the testator intended to give nothing more than a mere right of choice. Doubtless he intended that they should enjoy the full benefit of their choice. All that my associates or myself contend for is, that they cannot lawfully make the choice or election which the testator intended.

To allow a slave to be free at his election, my associates contend, is to allow him to free himself. Mr. Patton denies this, and insists that in the case before 168 *us, the slaves do not make themselves free, nor continue slaves by their own choice: they are emancipated, he says, not by their own act, but by the will of their master: they are free, not because he has given them power to emancipate themselves (which it is conceded he cannot do), but because he has the right, and has in effect declared, that they shall be emancipated. I give the argument of Mr. Patton entire. It is merely a verbal criticism. It is impossible to deny upon his own concessions, that the election of the slaves—the act of the slaves—is (upon his supposition that such an act is lawful) if not the sole condition, at least an indispensable condition to their freedom. Mr. Patton had told us previously that the slaves are entitled to freedom on the terms, and only upon the terms, prescribed by the will. They are not freed then, or emancipated by the will, standing alone; not freed or emancipated (again to quote his language), "unless they, on being put to their election, choose to be free." They could not certainly be free, we admit, but for the will of the testator; but it is equally true, upon the arguments and concessions of Mr. Patton, and I may add upon every sound principle of construction, they cannot be freed, unless they choose to accept the boon. It may therefore be well said, that it does depend upon their own act whether they shall be free or continue slaves. Their choice, their will, the will and choice of slaves, durante servitute, is in that view an indispensable element to make them free, in concurrence with the will of the testator himself.

In the same strain Mr. Patton repeats that the executor emancipates them (the slaves) not because they have any authority, not because their choice gives them the right to be free, but because the testator has required them to be emancipated, on making their election. This is in-169 deed labor in vain. The slaves *cannot be free unless they make choice of freedom: they cannot be continued in slavery unless they make choice of slavery. Their choice is the indispensable condition which is to make them free, or continue them in slavery; and yet they are not made free or continued as slaves by reason of their choice. Would they be free, if they do not choose freedom? No. Mr. Patton admits it. Could they be continued as slaves but for their choice to be slaves? No. Mr. Patton does not pretend it. Yet it is the will alone, he would have it, that makes them free or slaves. Not so. It is the will undoubtedly in part; but it is also, in part, the performance of the condition precedent, by the objects of the testator's bounty, which in this, as in all other cases of precedent conditions, is essential and indispensable to confer and complete the title. The title is incomplete—ineffectual—unless and until this condition shall be performed—performed by the slaves. There must be, as already said, the concurrence of the will of the slaves (the will of slaves to make themselves free) with the will of their master. We do not deny that the will of the testator was necessary to entitle them to freedom; but we do insist that the will in this case is not sufficient alone to make them free, without their own consent—their own act.

Still further to justify this very subtle criticism, Mr. Patton goes on to say, that it is a matter of no importance how insufficient or ridiculous may be the causes assigned for emancipating slaves; and he tells us, by way of illustration, if a testator should make the freedom of his slaves to depend on the election of Fremont as president; on his (the testator's) making one hundred bushels of potatoes; or on his wife's cat kittening before Christmas—that in all these cases, the condition would be good and effectual.

Be it so. There is nothing unlaw-
170 ful, so far as I *perceive, ridiculous as they may be, in any one of these conditions. Even a cat, I presume, may lawfully have kittens. The law of God and nature allows it; and there is no clause in the constitution, or special statute, known to me, which forbids it.

But mark how dexterously Mr. Patton has shifted his ground. It is not the absurdity of the condition in this case, to which my associates or myself alone chiefly object, absurd as it is, but its illegality: the imposition of a condition to be performed by slaves, whereby they are to acquire or surrender, according to their own discretion and choice, a right or privilege—a condition at variance with the law and policy of the state, and utterly incompatible with the status of slavery; because it supposes in slaves, while slaves, the attributes and capacities of freemen. The illustrations given by Mr. Patton, are all instances of conditions lawful in themselves, and he asks that the same rule shall be applied to an unlawful condition as to a lawful one.

To make this more clear: The condition he puts that slaves should be free if Fremont should be elected, would have been perfectly lawful, and the emancipation effectual. But suppose the condition had been that the slaves should vote, and have their votes recorded, in Virginia, in favor of Fremont. Then the condition would have been against law and public policy; and it being a precedent condition, no title could ever arise. And this distinction is clearly illustrated by the case of Pleasants v. Pleasants. The slaves there were to be free on condition the legislature should by law permit them to live in the state as free persons: for they might have been freed by being sent out of the state at once. Moses v. Denegree, 6 Rand. 561. It seems to have been conceded on all hands, that had the will given them freedom on condition that they should remain in the 171 state (the law then forbidding *such emancipation), the condition would have been void. So in the case put—a condition that the slaves should be free if they would vote for Fremont, would, as the law then was, and now is, have been incapable of being performed, being contrary to the law of the state. But a condition that they should be free in future on voting, &c., whenever the law might authorize slaves to vote, might, provided such law should be passed, be entirely lawful and effectual. And the illustrations of Mr. Patton, so far from showing the absurdity of the argument of my associates, only serve to render more visible the error of his own.

Leaving his illustrations, the learned counsel falls back on the "analogies of the law," forgetting that in his only authority, it is expressly said, and very truly, by Judge Tucker, that no analogy whatever can be found. The instances of analogy to which the counsel refers, most forcibly illustrate the truth of Judge Tucker's remark, and demonstrate the fallacy of Mr. Patton's argument.

Infants, it is said, may execute powers requiring choice of objects, and discretion. But if so, not all infants can do this; not infants of very tender years; not infants at the breast; certainly not those in ventre sa mere.

Married women too may do the same. Ita lex. But married women may have sound legal discretion in the eye of the law, not only to do this, but many other acts requiring such discretion. They may take estates by deed or will. So may infants even in ventre sa mere, or idiots, or lunatics. They are all free persons, though under partial or temporary disabilities. To reason in favor of similar powers, rights or capacities in slaves, on the ground of analogy, is to plunge at once into a labyrinth of error.

If the illustration is of any avail to Mr.
Patton, it must be by showing that 172 these powers, &c., may exist *in slaves. Does he believe this? Does he seriously think a slave can execute a power of appointment, whereby an estate is to vest under the will of a donor, because such a power may be executed by a feme covert or an infant? Surely not; no more than he can make a contract, or, as even an idiot or lunatic may do, take a devise or legacy. And why? The want of legal capacity—of legal discretion—is an insuperable bar to the performance by a slave of any act whatever, requiring discretion, consent or choice, whereby he is to secure to others or acquire for himself any estate, right or privilege whatever. So perfect is this barrier, that he cannot even for a moment take by gift or devise so much interest in property as will give to his owner the right to claim it. It would really be a novel doctrine, but will be assuredly the next step, if Mr. Patton's arguments prevail, to hold that powers of appointment may be executed by slaves, or other acts lawfully done by them to vest property or rights in themselves and others.

But at last Mr. Patton more directly approaches the question on which this case essentially depends, namely, whether an election can be lawfully made by slaves to determine finally their own future status or destiny as slaves or freemen. Giving them their choice, to enable the owner to determine whether he will emancipate them, confers on them (says Mr. P.) no power to do any civil act; no capacity to make themselves free or slaves. Their expressed wish to be free is the reason which induces the master to emancipate them.

This is the position, and then comes another illustration: "If a man were to call them up and consult them about it (their emancipation), and decide according to their wishes expressed to himself, who could complain?" No one, I admit without hesitation. The thing being decided, the 173 act of emancipation carried *into effect, which is the case supposed, the slaves would be free, notwithstanding he may have made their freedom depend upon their own wishes. I go further: It matters not, as already said, how absurd the reason, nor how unlawful the act on which the freedom may have been granted; if it were carnal connection with a white woman, or for assaulting a white man, the grant being consummated, would be effectual, and the title to freedom a vested right. We do not deny that if this testator had actually emancipated his slaves, because they had expressed a wish to him to be free, or because they had said or done any other thing whatever, reasonable or absurd, lawful or unlawful, they would have been free. But he has not said this. His language cannot be tortured into any such meaning. The act which, if they can be free, can alone make them so, remains yet to be done. The emancipation is not consummated, and cannot be, unless they choose it. It is in vain to say that this choice, this consent or election, is not a civil act. What else is it? If a grant of an estate or privilege of any kind were made to a free person on condition that he would elect a trade or profession, or serve in the navy or army for two years; or a power to appoint by deed, &c., among legatees, &c., would not the election and the designation be civil acts? A slave owner might say to his slave, Put your cross mark to this deed or contract and you shall be free, and free him accordingly. But if he were to say in a deed, contract or will, my slave shall be free doing or performing any civil act in futuro, executing a deed or contract, or power of appointment, &c., the gift would be nugatory: It could never be enforced or perfected, because the acts themselves are, as already said, precedent conditions, incompatible with the condition or status of the slave, and such as presuppose him already endowed with the legal capacity of a freeman.

174 *Having argued that a deed actually made, whereby a slave owner emancipates his slave in compliance with the slave's wish—which we concede, being done, could not be undone—Mr. Patton advances a step further: An owner of a slave, he says, has just as absolute power to emancipate by will as by deed; and surely he may invest his executor with the power of emancipation on the same terms, &c., as he might have imposed upon himself. "If he may lawfully suffer his own act of emancipation to be determined by ascertaining the choice of his negroes in his lifetime, why may he not emancipate them subject to their choice to be ascertained after his death?" This is quite ingenious, but utterly fallacious: It has already been answered. An owner may consummate an emancipation in his lifetime upon any consideration he pleases, or without any reason or consideration whatever but his mere will or whim; and the act being consummated, will be effectual; but an emancipation to take effect upon any consideration or condition to arise or be performed by a slave in futuro, will not be valid if the condition be unlawful or cannot be performed. Thus, a man by will or deed may liberate his slave because he has children by a white woman; but he cannot by his will authorize his executor to liberate him on condition that he shall at a future day have such children.

He may give his slave freedom by a deed in his lifetime or by will; or may give the slave over to a third person, on condition that his wife's cat may have kittens or the slave herself may have a male child before that time. This parturition of the cat or of the slave is, in the course of nature, unprohibited by law, and in no way counter to public policy. But he can confer no such right on the slave, or on the third person, dependent upon the future choice, volition or election of the slave, because such 175 acts are civil acts, inconsistent *with the state of slavery and the law and policy of the state.

A man may call up his sons, and say to them, you shall have between you, Tom, Dick and Harry, as "Old Tom" shall desire, choose, or appoint: and on learning that desire, may consummate the gift by a deed on that express ground. But he cannot by his contract make a valid disposition of this kind to take effect in futuro. He cannot impose (as Mr. P. has it) any such terms binding on himself in futuro, or make a title to slaves or property of any kind dependent on the will or desire of a slave. In other words, he cannot confer on slaves the power of election or appointment, by word, deed or will, unless that new doctrine shall be now established, as it must be, if Mr. Patton's views shall be sustained by this court.

To say that giving slaves their choice between freedom and slavery confers on them no power to do any civil act, is a contradiction in terms—simply a denial of a matter of fact. To give them their choice (if legal) is to give them the power and right to choose—to exercise their will and discretion—the will and discretion of slaves—and to make that will a rule for the court, and the lawful foundation of divesting the property of others, and vesting new rights and privileges in themselves. What is a civil act, if an election—an election whereby the persons electing renounce a benefit or secure to themselves new rights and privileges, be not so regarded? a right and power, in the case before us, of fixing their future destiny, and that of their offspring: of elevating themselves from the condition of chattels to that of freemen: a right which imposes upon an executor, and upon the courts of the country, the duty of consulting with slaves and of being governed by their will. It is a legal solecism to speak of such election or renunciation as any thing short of civil acts—civil acts of the highest character.

176 *Mr. Patton misleads himself, in speaking of terms and conditions imposed by a master on himself in his lifetime, in relation to the emancipation of his slaves. A master might say to "Old Tom," that shall be your cabin during life. Your sons Tom, Dick and Harry shall live with you and work for you as long as you choose; and Old Tom might be permitted to enjoy these privileges as long as his master lived. But they would impose upon the master no obligation. He might recall or revoke them at pleasure. And if he should by his will give Old Tom permission to occupy the cabin, or to enjoy the society or services of the sons so long as he might choose, or to send them to Liberia, or go there himself, if he or they should choose, the bequests would all, in a legal sense, be nullities; provisions addressing themselves to the humane discretion of the executor, heir or devisee, but incapable of enforcement by or for the objects of the testator's bounty. Clearly the slave children could not be free by reason of the election or choice of a slave father: and yet the election must be as effectual to free them as to free himself; to free one slave as to free any other.

As bearing directly on these propositions, I refer to the case of Sawney v. Carter, 6 Rand. 173; and as still more apposite, that of Skrine v. Walker, 3 South Car. Equ. R. 262; and Stevenson v. Singleton, 1 Leigh 72.

It is true, that slaves are not mere chattels; but they are mere chattels in a legal sense, except, so far as the law may have given them legal rights, or subjected them, or others on their account, to legal responsibilities for their acts. Beyond that, slavery is an insurmountable barrier. The law makes them responsible for crimes; the law gives them the civil right of instituting suits for freedom; but none can believe for a moment that a slave could sue his owner or any free person whatever, 177 but for the express permission *of the statute. It is a right juris positivi only.

Mr. Patton says, they may be enabled by their masters to do civil acts binding on their masters. They may be his agents in making contracts; in having the custody of property, selling produce, collecting money, &c. Doubtless they may do all this: that is to say, they may do all that slaves are authorized by law or recognized usage to do in and about the business of their masters. These acts confer or constitute rights and obligations in the masters, but give no rights or privileges to the slaves. Indeed, slaves would be but of little value if most of these duties and services might not be performed by them. The ploughman must have charge of his plough and team: the herdsman of the cattle, &c.: the marketman or woman must sell the vegetables, &c., and receive the money if directed by the owner. It may be that the owner may be made liable for their acts when by his authority or usage he has induced others to trust to them on the ground of fraud. Upon the same principle that he might be liable if he were habitually to send a well-trained and sagacious dog with a basket to bring him meat from the butcher. Would that be in a legal sense a civil act of the dog? Or do any of the mechanical or menial duties enumerated by Mr. P. rise to the dignity of a civil act, or bear the remotest resemblance to a deliberate election, by which a slave is to acquire or renounce a right for himself, or secure or destroy one in third persons?

To show the utter inconclusiveness of all these, and all similar "illustrations" of Mr. Patton, suppose the testator to will that his slaves after his death should be allowed to have the custody of property, make contracts, buy and sell, &c., for themselves or for their future owners. Could the will in these respects be executed or enforced? Surely not: and why?

178 Simply *because such acts, however authorized or tolerated by the actual though revocable permission or acquiescence of the owner in his lifetime, are so contrary to the status of slavery, the rights of ownership in slave property, the public policy and laws of the state, that no court could give effect to any executory contract or disposition of the kind. It would be to create that prohibited intermediary state; that rejected anomaly of slaves possessing rights and exercising privileges exclusively pertaining to free persons. See Wynn v. Carrell, 2 Gratt. 227; Smith v. Betty, 11 Gratt. 752; Wood v. Humphreys, 12 Gratt. 333; Adams & als. v. Gilliam & als., 1 Pat. & Heath 161; Rucker v. Gilbert, 3 Leigh 8; Escheator v. Dangerfield, 8 Rich. S. C. Equ. R. 96.

After an elaborate argument on this question of election, Mr. Patton apologizes for discussing it at all, inasmuch as it is, he says, res adjudicata. He refers to Pleasants v. Pleasants, 2 Call 319, and especially to Elder v. Elder, 4 Leigh 256.

The sole reference to the question of election in Pleasants v. Pleasants, is an expression in the will of John Pleasants, that all his slaves shall be free if they choose it when they arrive at thirty, &c. But this is followed by an immediate declaration by way of explanation, "I say, &c., to be free at the age of thirty years," leaving out the qualifying expression, "if they choose it;" which doubtless was thrown in currente calamo, rather than as a condition or requirement of any distinct and formal election by the slaves. It was evidently regarded in this light, and as wholly unimportant, by the heir and executor who filed the bill; by all the counsel on both sides; by the defendants who opposed the emancipation; and by the whole court; for it is not once adverted to, either in the bill, or answer, or arguments, or opinions. If it had been regarded as a formal pre-179 liminary condition, it must *have been noticed; and the court must either have dispensed with its performance, or pointed out the manner in which the election should be made. And yet notwithstanding their failure to do so, and the utter silence of the parties, their counsel and the court, to notice the question in any way, this case is referred to, as adjudicating it so authoritatively as to preclude all discussion.

I will suggest, as a sufficient reason why this question was not raised or noticed, the expressions in the will of Jonathan Pleasants, declaring that the slaves should be free at thirty, and adding, "or at least such as will accept thereof, or as his trustees, &c., might think fitted for freedom," &c., the condition was in the disjunctive, and was fully performed by the trustees in suing on behalf of the slaves. But be this as it may, it is enough to say that the point in question was neither decided nor so much as noticed by the court.

As to the case of Elder v. Elder, I remark:

First. That it is the only case in Virginia in which the question before us has been directly in the view of the court.

Secondly. That the opinions of the court, as before said, were uncalled for—mere obiter dicta. The executor and residuary legatee were both parties to the suit—the latter indeed the plaintiff. They consented that the slaves should have their election; and the order was made at their instance.

Mr. Patton speaks of the case as one argued by eminent counsel. The arguments of the counsel are not reported. It is evident they mainly relied on other grounds, namely, the intention inferrible from sending them to Liberia; the fact of an election to remain slaves—that this election was not made in twelve months—the condition of the issue—the ability of the Colonization society to pay the expense of transpor-180 tation—*the hires—refunding bonds, &c. It does not appear that the question as to the lawfulness of the election was touched, or at least seriously argued by counsel.

Thirdly. The opinions and decree are not those of a full court, and being pronounced ex re nata, and unsupported by law or precedent, cannot be so far regarded obligatory as to preclude this court from a full consideration of the questions before it.

There is one circumstance in which the will before us is very peculiar, and differs from that in Elder v. Elder.

It does not merely present the alternative of liberty or slavery. The slaves are to have their choice whether they will be emancipated or sold publicly. The testator adds, "If they prefer being sold, and remaining here in slavery, it is my wish they be sold publicly, and the money equally divided," &c.

Now, their right is as perfect to choose the one alternative as the other. Suppose they reject the first and accept the last: They choose to be sold publicly. But suppose there are no debts, and the legatees all concur, with the assent of the executor, in a wish to divide the slaves in kind. In an ordinary case, this would be their clear right. Could that right be intercepted or controlled by the choice or election of the slaves, who declare they prefer being sold publicly? They might urge that the legatees were hard masters and mistresses; or meant to sell them privately to hard masters; and that this was the very reason which induced the testator to require, if they preferred being sold, that they should be sold publicly. Surely their will, their choice, could not stand in the way of any disposition or alienation, consistent with the lawful rights of the legatees, had no such choice been given to or made by the slaves. Yet there is no more reason why their choice should not decide the 181 mode of *disposition under the last alternative than under the first.

But this is not the only difficulty to be encountered by attempting to confer on slaves this civil privilege of election. Let us enquire into the manner in which the privilege is to be exercised.

A number of slaves of both sexes, and of all ages and conditions, are to elect whether they prefer being emancipated, or sold publicly as slaves.

At what age is the right to attach? Is there to be a distinction between adults and minors? There is no such thing as lawful age to be predicated of slaves. The condition of a slave of twenty-two is precisely the same as that of one of nineteen.

If those under the age of twenty-one are to elect, is there to be a fixed and certain age prescribed by the court? or is it to depend upon the mental capacity of the slave? If a certain age, what is it to be? If to depend on adequate capacity, how and by whom is that capacity to be ascertained? If by commissioners, shall their judgment be conclusive, or will it be open to objection?

Who is to elect for infants of very tender years—at the breast perhaps? Is the court to stand in a parental relation to infant negroes; make them wards of court; appoint for them guardians, or prochein amies? Or will the court say, as was done in Elder v. Elder (by consent), that the mothers shall choose, not for the infants at nurse merely, but for all under twenty-one? And the fate of the slaves, and it may be of intelligent young slaves not quite one and twenty, and if females, that of all their future progeny, decided perhaps by a drunken, superannuated, or ignorant and reckless mother, who might be swayed either way for a bottle of whisky? If we are to be governed by analogy, why not leave the election for young slaves to their fathers instead of their mothers?

182 Why shall *not the husband choose both for his children and his wife—their mother?

It may be said the relation of husband and wife does not exist. Very true, in a legal sense; but there is that relation nominally, and analogy may as properly be resorted to as to this relation as analogies from age, there being no legal age, or analogies from the equitable jurisdiction of the chancery courts over infants, lunatics, guardians, &c.

If these analogies are to govern the case, suppose slavery be elected by the minors, or some one or more persons appointed to elect for them; and when they come of age, they raise the question that it was manifestly to their injury; or that the election was made or procured by fraud and imposition: May the truth and justice of the case be enquired into? or must they and their posterity forever be held in bondage under an election so procured? In cases of free infants, they are allowed until of age to elect. Ward v. Baugh, 4 Ves. R. 623. As to the adult slaves themselves, is it not every way probable, that many among them may be utterly incapable of making a sound and discreet decision?

And if any one be appointed, or the court itself shall undertake to decide this question, and exercise for the slaves what was intended to be a personal privilege in each and every one of them, where is the authority under the law of the land, under any adjudicated case, or under the will of this testator, to assume that power? The power on the one hand to condemn to perpetual slavery, or on the other to perpetual exile—the necessary consequence of emancipation. If the courts should undertake to do this, or authorize any one to do it for any one of the slaves of whatever age, they do not, of a certainty, execute the will of the testator, but make one for him.

It is absolutely certain that the testator meant his *slaves should choose for themselves. Their freedom or public sale was to be as they might prefer—not as might be forced upon them by any one else. Each was to have his or her own wish. Who can wish for them? No such power is vested in courts, nor commissioners, nor guardians, nor prochein amies, nor mothers, nor fathers, either by statute, or by the common law. Suppose there be infants of tender age without mothers or known fathers: who then is to wish for them? their grand mothers or grand fathers? perhaps in their dotage. Who are to choose or wish for idiots, if any, or lunatics, or doting old men and women? Say they are held incapable one or all, to judge for themselves, and that commissioners shall be appointed to choose for them: Does not the court know, and must they not act with discretion upon that state of facts—that our community hold different opinions as to the condition of slavery—some holding the slavery of the African race as the greatest of blessings, and freedom the direst curse that could be inflicted on them; and others the reverse. Which class should a court select or recommend? It is not unfrequent, where commissioners are to be appointed in a case, to select the counsel on both sides. Perhaps there could be no fairer mode. Take the counsel then in this case. Now turn to their arguments, and perhaps well known opinions. They must of course be guided by their own judgment and discretion as to what is for the benefit of the slaves, and not the wishes of the slaves; for if their wishes were to govern, it would be idle and absurd to appoint commissioners to act for them. Say at least they must decide for the very young, or very old; idiots, lunatics, &c.

What might be the anticipated result? Why, that two would choose for them the blessing or curse of slavery, and the other two the blessing or curse of *liberty. I will not trace the question further, in calculating what might be the views of the court, or any umpire authorized to decide. Is it not most indisputable that this testator never would have entrusted to the court itself, or any others, to impose upon his slaves either the condition of slavery here, or freedom in exile, against their wishes, when he declined or refused to make choice for them himself? And must not the court recognize, in the difficulty and delicacy of allowing this privilege to slaves, so incompatible with their legal, moral and intellectual condition, or transferring it, against or without their consent, and against the intention of the testator, to others, who might designedly or unintentionally consign them and their posterity forever to misery—an unanswerable argument against the privilege or power itself?

To what stress was the court not driven in Elder v. Elder, when it entrusted this delicate power of deciding for infants, at random, to their slave mothers; and attempted to throw some guard around ignorant slaves, by an unprecedented order of privy examination; an order to examine slaves, and consult them—men and women—privily and apart from those having the ownership or custody of them: to exclude the owners and possessors from access to their own slaves. To what further extent is the law-making authority of the court to be carried to put in practice these new doctrines? And of what avail is this privy examination? The influence has perhaps been previously exerted. Their minds have been impressed by abolitionists perhaps on the one side, or interested claimants on the other. They have been menaced, frightened out of their propriety, by the terrors of the lash, at home; the dread of misery and starvation abroad; or poisoned by indulgence in whisky, and promise of more, till their wits, if any they had, are unsettled.

185 *Or the moment after the privy examination, they beg permission, from the same causes, to retract their consent.

It is a wise and just rule, that before parties entitled to an election, especially infants and persons of infirm minds, or liable to undue influences, shall be required to make it, that they should be well apprised of their rights, and the consequences of that election. Who is to instruct these ignorant slaves, to make them understand the benefits or evils of different plans for their future condition and residence? They are to be sent to a land where they can enjoy freedom. What land is that? Will the counsel name it? or commissioners? or the court? or shall the slaves go it blind? These are not fanciful obstacles. They are real difficulties which may or must arise in this or other cases, and which the court must therefore consider.

Finally. There being a devise over in this case, the condition precedent must be strictly performed; and if this cannot be, the devisees over cannot be deprived of their interest. It is an ineffectual, inoperative condition; and such conditions are regarded in law precisely as if no condition whatever was prescribed. Moses v. Denigree, 6 Rand. 561.

On the fourth question—that relative to the condition of the slaves born during the life estate—Robertson referred to a review of the authorities presented by him on the first argument of this cause. He contended that the question was conclusively settled by the case of Maria v. Surbaugh, as far back as 1824 (2 Rand. 282), which had been repeatedly recognized, and even as late as the recent case of Cullins v. Taylor, May 1855 (12 Gratt. 398): That the case of Lucy v. Cheminant, and other cases seemingly opposed to that of Maria v. Surbaugh, were founded on a shadowy distinction between wills, wherein the mothers were mentioned by name, and those 186 in which the names *were omitted: That in the case at bar the phrase was, "the negroes loaned my wife, at her death I wish to have their choice," &c.: And they being "all the remainder" of his slaves, after taking out such as were otherwise disposed of by the will, the effect and intention must be held to be the same, as if he had added their names—on the principle, id certum est quod certum reddi potest: That the only purpose of adding the names would be to designate the slaves intended; and any other sufficient designation would answer the same purpose: That the case, therefore, in effect fell directly within the very deliberate and emphatic opinion pronounced by Judge Green in the case of Maria v. Surbaugh.

He further suggested, that in Lucy v. Cheminant, the court were probably misled by the petition to suppose that the mothers were not designated by name, though their names, he thought, were to be found in the will exhibited in the record.

Upon the whole I submit that the decree, exclusive of errors on minor points, is erroneous:

First, in decreeing freedom to the issue born during the life tenancy.

And secondly, in declaring any of the slaves free, unless they could lawfully make, and should actually have made their election so to be.

DANIEL, J. There does not seem to me to be any serious doubt as to the intention of the testator in respect to the emancipation of his slaves.

The language of the main clause in the will bearing on the subject is as follows: "The negroes loaned my wife, at her death I wish to have their choice of being emancipated or sold publicly. If they prefer being emancipated, it is my wish they be hired out until a sufficient sum is raised to defray their expenses to a land where they can enjoy freedom; and if there should 187 *not be enough of the perishable property loaned my wife to pay off the legacies to Ann Lewis Howle and Georgianna Bryan, they are to be hired until a sufficient sum is raised to pay the deficiency. If they prefer being sold and remaining here in slavery, it is my wish they be sold publicly, and the money arising be equally divided between my sister Eliza Marshall, the children or heirs of my brother Carter B. Poindexter, my nephews William C. Howle and Daniel P. Howle, and my niece Nancy Bailey."

Here it seems to me is a plain and unambiguous tender by the testator to his slaves, of an election, at the death of his wife, to be emancipated or to be sold publicly as slaves. If they prefer to be emancipated, it is his will that after being hired out till the sums mentioned are raised, they shall enjoy their freedom. If, on the other hand, they prefer to remain in slavery, then it is his will that they remain slaves.

This view of the character of the bequest is not as I conceive affected by the subsequent clause of the will relating to the slaves. The office of that clause is, to empower the executors to sell such of them as should be refractory, and, by consequence, to exclude them from the benefits of the previous provisions in favor of all the slaves loaned to the testator's wife. This exception to the bequest does not serve in any manner to declare or explain the nature of the bequest.

The codicil to the will does, however, I think, aid in showing that the idea of an election, by his slaves, with its consequences, was distinctly and prominently presented to the mind of the testator whilst engaged in planning and setting out the scheme of his will. For reading the codicil and the clause in the will respecting the emancipation of the slaves, together, we see that the testator, after tendering to the slaves, in plain terms, the option of being emancipated or sold publicly, proceeds not only to point out distinctly 188 *what is to be the effect of their election, in each of its aspects, on their own condition, but makes the measure and shape of bequests, to other objects of his bounty, dependent upon it. In case the slaves prefer to remain in slavery, they are to be sold, and the proceeds divided between the sister and certain of the nieces and nephews of the testator. On the other hand, if they prefer to be emancipated, the consequent disappointment of the legatees just mentioned, is to be compensated by a pecuniary legacy of a thousand dollars to be paid them by Jaqueline L. Poindexter, another of the testator's nephews, and obviously one of the most favored objects of his testamentary regard.

With these views of the will before me, I cannot undertake to say that there would not be as plain a violation of the testator's intentions in forcing emancipation and its consequences on his slaves, against their election to remain here in slavery, as there would be in withholding freedom from them, on their expressing a preference to be emancipated.

Looking to the subject matter of the bequest, it is true we may conjecture that it was probably the expectation of the testator that many, perhaps most of the slaves, would elect to be emancipated; yet when we see that no provision is made in the will for the support of any of them in the strange land to which, in case of their emancipation, they were to be transported, we may as fairly suppose that it was in the contemplation of the testator that there would be some of them, especially of the aged and infirm, who would prefer to remain in their present condition.

In this aspect of the case, what warrant have we for declaring that an election by the slaves to be emancipated is not at all essential to their receiving their freedom under the will of the testator? It is conceded that the effect of such a decision would be to work an absolute emanci-189 pation of all the slaves, *in spite of a choice to the contrary by any or all of them; it being admitted by the counsel, who recommends this course to us, that in such a state of things the clause in respect to the election of the slaves to remain in slavery would be wholly void and inoperative. The will would, then (according to his view of it), of itself confer the franchise, and no act of the negroes would be allowed to defeat their manumission, or to operate their disfranchisement.

We cannot adopt the course recommended, without running counter to the plain and express directions of the testator. The whole tenor of his will shows that he intended the manumission of the slaves to depend on the performance by them of the precedent condition of electing to be emancipated. We have no authority for regarding this condition as mere surplusage, and declaring the slaves absolutely emancipated. If the condition is legal and possible, we are bound, in carrying out the testator's intentions, to allow to the slaves an opportunity to perform it. If, on the other hand, we find it to be illegal or impossible, we are equally bound to declare the bequest, dependent on its performance, void.

It is not competent for us, supposing the condition to be illegal or impossible, to pronounce, as the will of the testator, what we may conjecture he would have directed in respect to his slaves, had he foreseen the difficulties which now present themselves. Nor did we pursue any such course in the case of Osborne v. Taylor, 12 Gratt. 117. The slaves there were declared to be absolutely and unconditionally free, not because of any belief or conjecture on the part of the court that such would have been the testator's will had he known of the illegality of the condition which he sought to annex to the bequest of their freedom; but because, having by a distinct clause declared them to be free, he could not 190 then confer on them the capacity *of electing to disfranchise themselves, and assume a condition of qualified slavery.

On the supposition that an election in this case by the slaves to be emancipated, is illegal or impossible, the two cases, instead of calling for the same judicial result, furnish marked illustrations of the directly opposite legal effects of conditions precedent and conditions subsequent. There the election by the slaves to assume a state of qualified slavery, was essential to the defeat or destruction of the bequest of freedom; whilst here the election by the slaves to be emancipated is essential to give any force or validity whatever to the bequest. We are thus led necessarily to the enquiry, whether the condition precedent in this case be legal and possible, or otherwise.

Is the condition one which the slaves have the legal capacity to perform?

To answer the question, it is essential to institute a brief enquiry as to the true condition here of the class of persons to which they belong.

Chancellor Kent, in the second volume of his Commentaries, at page 253, in speaking of the laws of the southern states on the subject of domestic slavery, says, "They are doubtless as just and as mild as i deemed by those governments to be compatible with the public safety, or with the existence of that species of property; and yet in contemplation of their laws, slaves are considered, in some respects, as things or property, rather than persons, and are vendible as personal estate. They cannot take property by descent or purchase, and all they find and all they hold belongs to the master. They cannot make lawful contracts, and they are deprived of civil rights. They are assets in the hands of executors for the payment of debts, and cannot be emancipated by will or otherwise, to the prejudice of creditors. Their condition is more analogous to that of the slaves of 191 the ancients than to *that of the villeins of feudal times, both in respect to the degradation of the slaves, and the full dominion and power of the master."

In the case of Emerson v. Howland, 1 Mason's R. 45, which was a suit brought by a master to recover wages for a mariner slave who by his own consent had been discharged from service, Judge Story, in delivering an opinion sustaining the action, uses the following language: "The slave could not consent to be discharged. The contract was entered into by the owner, in Virginia, and must be construed with reference to the lex loci contractus. In Virginia slavery is expressly recognized, and the rights founded upon it are incorporated into the whole system of the laws of that state. The owner of the slave has the most complete and perfect property in him. The slave may be sold or devised or pass by descent, in the same manner as other inheritable estate. He has no civil rights or privileges. He is incapable of making or discharging a contract, and the perpetual right to his services belongs exclusively to the master."

Judge Tucker, in his notes to his edition of Blackstone, vol. 2, p. 145, after defining social rights to be such as appertain to every individual in a state of society, without regard to the form or nature of the government in which he resides, proceeds to say that they include all those privileges which are supposed to be tacitly stipulated for, by the very act of association, such as the right of protection from injury, or of redress for the same, by such an action, and the right of acquiring, holding and transmitting property; that in all civilized nations all free persons, whether citizens or aliens; males or females; infants or adults; white or black, of sound mind, or idiots and lunatics, have their respective social rights according to the customs, laws and usages of the country. "Slaves only (he continues), where slavery is tolerated by 192 the laws, are *excluded from social rights. Society deprives them of personal liberty, and abolishes their right to property; and in some countries even annihilates all their other natural rights."

And in his Appendix to the same volume, p. 55, after remarking that the Roman lawyers look upon those only as persons who are free, putting slaves into the rank of goods and chattels, he says, that the policy of our legislature seems conformable to that idea. And he proceeds, "Slavery (says Hargrave) always imports an obligation of perpetual service, which only the consent of the master can dissolve." And "the property of the slave is absolutely the property of his master, the slave himself being the subject of property, and as such saleable and transmissible at the will of the master."

To the like effect are the remarks of Chancellor Dessausseure in the case of Bynum v. Bostick, 4 Dess. R. 266. He there expresses the opinion that the condition of the slaves in this country is analogous to that of the slaves of the ancient Greeks and Romans, and not that of the villeins of feudal times. That by the civil law which, in that regard, is the law of this country, they are incapable of taking property by descent or purchase. And that they are generally considered not as persons, but things.

In the case of Girod v. Lewis, 6 Martin's R. 559, it is asserted that slaves have no legal capacity to assent to any contract: that whilst with the consent of the master they had the moral power to enter into such a connection as that of marriage, the marriage, whilst they remain in a state of slavery, could be productive of no civil effect, because slaves are deprived of all civil rights. And in Graves v. Allen, 13 B. Monr. R. 190, it is declared that whilst they may, with the assent of their masters, have the physical use and enjoyment of property, they are incapable of be-193 coming the *legal owners thereof; and that any devise to them except that of freedom, is void. See also Roberson v. Roberson's ex'ors, 21 Alab. R. 273; Neal v. Farmer, 9 Geo. R. 555; Skrine v. Walker, 3 Rich. Eq. R. (S. C.) 269; Thomas v. Palmer, 1 Jones' Eq. R. (N. C.) 249; Dred Scott v. Sanford, 19 How. R. 407, 475.

The general principles declared and illustrated by these authorities, have been fully recognized by this court, whenever it has had occasion to make any express declaration of opinion respecting them. The law empowering masters to manumit their slaves by deed or will, it is true, has on various occasions been most liberally interpreted in favor of the latter. Yet the court has uniformly refused to recognize any capacity in the slave to contract with his master for his manumission. Sawney v. Carter, 6 Rand. 173; Stevenson v. Singleton, 1 Leigh 172. And has also repeatedly denied the validity of bequests in which it has been sought by masters to clothe their slaves, whilst remaining in a state of slavery, with certain privileges and immunities, such as being allowed to remain in the service of particular persons, and receive wages for their labor, or to live on certain lands, working them, and enjoying the profits, freed from all obligation to render service to persons under whose care and protection they were left. As in Rucker's adm'r v. Gilbert, 3 Leigh 8; Wynn

v. Carrell, 2 Gratt. 227: and Smith's adm'r v. Betty, 11 Gratt. 752.

It is argued, however, that the precise question under consideration has been decided by this court in the case of Pleasants v. Pleasants, 2 Call 319, and Elder v. Elder's ex'or, 4 Leigh 252.

It is true, that in each of the wills of John and Jonathan Pleasants, out of which the controversy in the first mentioned of these cases arose, expressions are used, which, if taken alone, would indicate a desire on the part of the testators that 194 the wishes of *the slaves should be consulted in respect to their manumission. But when we look to the general tenor and leading purposes of the two instruments, it is left extremely doubtful whether either of the testators designed that the operation of the bequests should depend in any measure on the choice of the slaves. No such question seems to have been presented by the pleadings; nor does there appear to be, either in the extended arguments of counsel, or in the opinions of the judges (delivered at much length), or in the decree of the court, any reference whatever to the option of the slaves. Any authority to be deduced from the case, as bearing on the question in hand, would, therefore, necessarily be the result of presumption or conjecture, and entitled, I think, to little if any weight.

In the case of Elder v. Elder's ex'or (it must be admitted), the will, to be construed and executed, does, in all its features disclosing a purpose on the part of the testator to leave the manumission of his slaves to their election, bear a very close resemblance to the will in the present case. The case, however, as an authority, is, I think, obviously open to some of the same criticisms that apply to Pleasants v. Pleasants. For it does not appear from the abstract of the bill, that the complainant raised any question as to the capacity of the slaves to make an election; the gravamen of his allegations being, that the slaves, conditionally emancipated by the will, had never elected to go to Liberia; but that on the contrary, the executor having fully explained the will to them, and their rights under it, they had declared they would not go to Liberia, and preferred to remain in Virginia in slavery; and that they had remained here for nearly two years since the testator's death: nearly a year beyond the expiration of the period within which they were, by the terms of the will, to make their election. It will be seen, too, that, during the progress 195 of the cause in *the court below, the complainant consented to an order of the chancellor appointing commissioners to examine the slaves, and to ascertain from each individual, and report to the court, whether they were, severally, willing to go to Liberia.

Of the arguments of the counsel, in this court, we have no report, and we are therefore without the means of ascertaining, except from intimations thrown out by the members of the court in the course of their several opinions, on what grounds it was sought to reverse the action of the chancellor. I think, however, that it may be fairly deduced from the opinions of the judges, that the stress of the case was on the questions, whether the testator could emancipate his slaves by directing them to be sent to Liberia, and whether, according to a fair interpretation of the will, the slaves were bound to make their election within twelve months after the decease of the testator. It was to these questions that the court mainly addressed their attention and remarks. I have failed to discover any observation in any one of the opinions of the judges, from which to raise the inference that the distinct question of a want of legal capacity in the slaves to make an election at all, was a matter of discussion before this court. In the state and shape in which the controversy apparently stood before this court, it might perhaps be going too far to say that the question could not have arisen. But in view of the circumstances which I have adverted to, it seems obvious to remark that for this court to have decided the case adversely to the negroes, on the ground that they had no legal capacity to make an election, would have been, to place itself seemingly in the ungracious attitude of being astute to set up an objection to the claim of freedom, which the appellant was not insisting on, and which, from his bill,

From these considerations, whilst there are remarks in the opinions of some of the judges showing that there did not appear to them to be any thing illegal or impossible in the condition of an election by the slaves, the decision as an authority would yet seem to me to come far short of occupying the position on which it would have stood had it appeared that the question had been distinctly presented to, and adjudged by, the court.

Therefore, whilst entertaining the highest regard and veneration for the great learning, ability and general worth of the judges who decided that case, I cannot recognize the decision as imposing, on the exercise of our own judgments, those restraints which could result properly alone from a decision in which the question appeared to have been fully considered and unequivocally adjudged.

Nor do I think we should be deterred from a free examination of the question by apprehensions, lest, in the event of our coming to a conclusion at variance with the supposed authority of that case, we might inflict possible injury on fiduciaries and their securities, in instances where (it is suggested), relying on such authority, executors and administrators may have assented to like bequests. For I do not think that the case has ever been regarded by the profession as an authority, on the force of which the definitive settlement of the question could be safely predicated. Indeed, in the present case the Circuit court has so far disregarded the authority of Elder v. Elder as to declare the negroes free, without first instituting the proceedings that were had, in that case, to ascertain their choice; and their own counsel, in the argument here, have widely differed among themselves in respect to *the necessity or propriety of any such proceedings. 197

And I should suppose that the instances (if any) are extremely rare in which executors, acting under wills with such peculiar features, have failed to protect themselves, by seeking the advice of the courts, before committing themselves to the hazardous and irremediable step of assenting to the bequests of freedom.

Under these circumstances, I have conceived it to be my duty to regard the question as one to be tested by the general and well acknowledged principles pertaining to the subject, and not as one controlled by the influence of a special adjudication.

And when we so treat the question, it seems to me that there can be no longer any serious difficulty as to its proper solution.

When we assent to the general proposition, as I think we must do, that our slaves have no civil or social rights; that they have no legal capacity to make, discharge or assent to contracts; that though a master enter into the form of an agreement with his slave to manumit him, and the slave proceed fully to perform all required of him in the agreement, he is without remedy in case the master refuse to comply with his part of the agreement; and that a slave cannot take any thing under a decree or will except his freedom; we are led necessarily to the conclusion that nothing short of the exhibition of a positive enactment, or of legal decisions having equal force, can demonstrate the capacity of a slave to exercise an election in respect to his manumission.

Any testamentary effort of a master to clothe his slave with such a power, is an effort to accomplish a legal impossibility.

No man can create a new species of property unknown to the law. No man is allowed to introduce anomalies into the ranks under which the population of the state is ranged and classified by its constitution *and laws. It is for the master to determine whether to continue to treat his slaves as property, as chattels, or, in the mode prescribed by law, to manumit them, and thus place them in that class of persons to which the freed negroes of the state are assigned. But he cannot impart to his slaves, as such, for any period, the rights of freedmen. He cannot endow, with powers of such import as are claimed for the slaves here, persons whose status or condition, in legal definition and intendment, exists in the denial to them of the attributes of any social or civil capacity whatever. 198

No conflict with these views is exhibited, by showing that the master may make his slave his agent, and bind himself to others by his acts. The only analogy between the position of a slave and that of a freeman employed in a like capacity is to be found in the fact that the slave and the freeman are both, for the occasion, the mere creatures of the master, and in the further fact that the power given is, in either case, revocable at his pleasure.

The resemblance between the condition of the slave and freeman, for the time, grows not out of the fact that the master has invested the slave, or recognized him as invested, with the characteristic powers of a free person, but out of the fact that the freeman has chosen to subject his own conduct and actions, for the occasion, to the will and control of another.

The agency of the slave, in truth, instead of affording any argument in behalf of the existence of his social or civil rights, is but an instance or illustration of the complete dominion of the master; of his entire control over all the powers and faculties of his slave; and of his right, consequently, to use him as an instrument or medium through which to make or execute contracts with third persons.

A master contemplating the manumission of his slaves might, no doubt, first ascertain their wishes on *the subject, and if he pleased, then proceed to shape his course accordingly; and it could form no objection to a deed or will emancipating them, should it appear on the face of the instrument that the act of manumission was in conformity with their choice. 199
But by establishing this proposition, the counsel for the appellees do not, it seems to me, reach any ground on which to found an argument in favor of the validity of the bequest in this case. In the case supposed, the act of emancipation is executed, complete and ended. It neither adds to, nor detracts from, its force that the master, in the execution of the instrument, consulted the wishes of the slaves. The operation of the instrument, there, is in no wise dependent on any thing that the slaves have done or are to do in the matter. But in the case before us, the operation of the will, as an instrument of emancipation, is made to depend on the choice of the slaves. In the case supposed, the master has fully manumitted his slaves. In the case before us, the master has endeavored to clothe his slaves with the uncontrollable and irrevocable power of determining for themselves whether they shall be manumitted. And in so doing, he has, I think, essayed the vain attempt to reconcile obvious and inherent contradictions.

In considering whether the legislature, in authorizing a master to manumit his slaves by will, could have contemplated, as valid instruments of emancipation, wills such as the one before us, a view of the many serious difficulties which, from obvious considerations, would most probably grow out of and attend the whole subject of an election by slaves, especially by such of them as might be laboring under the disabilities of infancy, idiocy or lunacy, furnishes to my mind a strong argument in favor of the negative of the proposition. It is difficult to suppose, in the opposite view, that the legislature would not have anticipated such difficulties, and made provisions for the regulation of the subject, instead of 200 embarking the chancery *courts, without guide, upon a new and extensive jurisdiction, which would needs be fruitful in litigation of the most perplexing, if not mischievous character.

On the whole, it seems to me that the provisions of the will respecting the manumission of the slaves, are not such as are authorized by law and are void, and consequently that the Circuit court erred in declaring the slaves and their increase to be free at the death of the life tenant.

In the absence of any proof or statement showing specifically the several kinds and descriptions of personal and perishable property which it is alleged were received by Mrs. Poindexter, and not returned or accounted for at her death, it would, I think, be premature to attempt to prescribe the rules by which to measure the extent of the accountability of her representative for such property, inasmuch as the rules which would apply to certain articles of such property, might not be properly applicable to others.

The views which I have expressed in regard to the bequest respecting the manumission of the slaves, leads to questions which thence arise between the next of kin and some of the legatees of the testator. But as none of these questions are distinctly and specifically raised in the bill, as it does not clearly appear that all the parties who may have an interest in these questions are now before the court, and as the case must necessarily go back, it seems to me it would be most proper to refer these questions also to the Circuit court, where all who have an interest in the subject, if not already before the court, can be made parties, and allowed an opportunity of presenting to the court more distinctly the several questions bearing on their respective interests.

MONCURE, J. I think the bequest contained in the will of John L. Poin-201 dexter, that the negroes loaned to *his wife for life should at her death "have their choice of being emancipated or sold publicly," is a valid bequest, and emancipated them in futuro, upon a condition precedent.

Whether a master should have power to emancipate his slave or not, is a question which addresses itself to the legislative, and not the judicial department of the government. It was answered by the legislature by the act of 1782, giving the right to emancipate by will or by deed. That act, substantially, has ever since remained, and yet remains, in full force; modified only by the act of 1806, requiring slaves thereafter emancipated to leave the state.

That a master may emancipate his slaves, to take effect in futuro; as for instance, after the death of his wife; has been repeatedly adjudged by this court, and may now be considered as the settled law of the land.

That a master may emancipate his slaves upon a condition precedent, if there be nothing unlawful in the condition, is a proposition which will not be denied: as for instance, if his wife die without issue living at her death. This would not only be a lawful, but a reasonable condition, having for its object a provision for the issue, but for which the emancipation would be absolute. But no condition however unreasonable or even capricious would, on that account merely, be unlawful.

A master may emancipate his slaves against their consent. Why may he not make such consent the condition of emancipation? There seems to be nothing in the policy of the law which forbids his doing so. He may certainly, in his lifetime, consult the wishes of his slaves, and emancipate them or not accordingly. Why may he not direct his executor to consult their wishes, and emancipate them or not accordingly? Is not the one as much opposed to the policy of the law as the other? the 202 consultation by *the master, as much as the consultation by the executor?

It may be said that one is an executed, and the other an executory act of emancipation. But both are, in fact, executed acts. Both of them, so to speak, convey an estate or interest—a right to freedom; the one an absolute, the other a conditional right. The latter is as much an executed act as if the condition were wholly independent of the wishes of the slaves.

If the slaves were wholly incapable of making a discreet choice, and could merely guess what was best for them, there would be nothing in that incapacity which would make the condition unlawful. As before stated, a condition is not unlawful, merely because unreasonable or even capricious.

But slaves have some capacity to choose, though it may, generally, be very weak and imperfect. They are responsible for their criminal acts; and may incur, and have to suffer the heaviest penalty of the law. The moment they become free they are legally capable, without any increase of intelligence, of making contracts, buying and selling property, and doing other acts which require the exercise of mental faculties. And as the law now is, they may, by their own choice, return again to slavery. Slaves have certainly feelings and wishes which the master may be willing to consult in regard to their emancipation. To do so, is not to create that middle state between slavery and freedom, which is unlawful. It is merely to propound a question to a slave requiring a categorical answer. If he wishes to be free, he is made a freeman in an instant; but is made so by the act of his master, whether that act be executed before or after the expression of his wish; provided it be executed according to law. There is not a particle of time intervening between his slavery and his freedom; and so no particle of time in which he occupies a state between the two.

203 *The dominion of a master over his slaves (as over his other property) may be exercised not only by an act which is to operate during his life, but by an act which is not to operate till after his death; and that dominion embraces the power of emancipation. He may emancipate them by deed or by will—in presenti or in futuro—absolutely or conditionally. If he attempt to violate the policy of the law, by creating a mixed state of slavery and freedom, his act will be void: or if he violate a rule of law, by annexing to a gift of the slaves a condition which is repugnant to the gift, the condition will be void. And his act of emancipation, whether absolute or conditional, in presenti or in futuro, by deed or by will, is in subordination to the claims of creditors, and to the obligation of the master to indemnify the community against the expense of slaves likely to become chargeable.

His legatees, certainly, cannot complain of his act or the manner in which he has seen fit to exercise it. They can claim only what he has chosen to give them; and cannot complain that he has given them his slaves only on condition that they prefer to remain in slavery. It was his to give them absolutely or conditionally; and it is theirs to refuse or accept them as given. There is nothing in the policy of the law which requires them to claim the slaves against his will. They certainly may, if they choose, give effect to it. Why should they not be compelled, if need be, to do so? Why should they be permitted, contrary to the general rule, to claim under and against the will? The intention of the testator, if lawful, must prevail. It is a law to all who claim under his will. They must do all they can to give effect to it.

It is argued, that slaves have no civil rights or legal capacity, and cannot therefore elect between freedom and slavery, though authorized to do so by their master.

204 The premises of this argument are certainly true, *at least as a general rule, but the conclusion is, I think, unsound. The fallacy of the argument (if I may be allowed to say so) consists in supposing that to make such an election would be to exercise a civil right or capacity. It is admitted that slaves are capable of receiving freedom, if conferred in the mode prescribed by law. It must also be admitted that it may be conferred conditionally. It was so conferred in the cases of Pleasants v. Pleasants, 2 Call 319; Elder v. Elder's ex'or, 4 Leigh 252; Dawson v. Dawson's ex'or, 10 Id. 602, and Hepburn, &c., v. Dundas, &c., 13 Gratt. 219. The right to confer it absolutely, which the law expressly gives, includes the right to confer it conditionally. The only question is, Whether such condition may be the willingness of the slave to receive his freedom. Why may it not? Slaves emancipated absolutely, still have an election between freedom and slavery. They may become slaves again under the provisions in the Code, p. 466, § 1, and p. 746, § 26; or under the act of February 18, 1856, Sess. Acts, p. 37. Why may not the master give them such an election directly, instead of giving it to them indirectly, by first making them free? Why should he be compelled to lose his property in such of his slaves as prefer to remain so, in order that he may give freedom to such as prefer it? It is said that a slave emancipated by an election given him by his master, would become free by his own act, and not by the act of his master. But this is not so. A slave can become free only by the act of his master; and the act must be done in a certain prescribed mode. When the act has been done in that mode, it may be made to depend on the willingness of the slave as well as upon any other condition. And whether made to depend on that or any other condition, it is the act of the master, and not the happening or performance of the condition which confers the right

205 to freedom. *The agency by which the condition is performed, is constituted by the master; and such performance is thus, in effect, his own act. There is nothing in the relation of master and slave, nor in the condition of slavery, which can prevent a master from adopting the agency of his slave for such a purpose. He can do so on the same principle on which it is admitted he may make his slave his agent for other purposes. Certainly nothing is better settled than that a slave cannot make a valid contract, even for his own freedom; and cannot enforce the execution of a promise of his master, even though it be to confer freedom upon him, and though the consideration on which it was made has been fully performed on the part of the slave. But it is equally well settled that a slave may avail himself of an act of emancipation duly executed by his master, whether such emancipation be absolute or conditional.

But if it can properly be said, that to make such an election would be to exercise a civil right or capacity, it would be as a mere incident to a capacity which is expressly given by law. A slave, as before stated, is certainly capable of receiving his freedom. And, if it be conferred in the mode prescribed by law; that is, by deed or will duly executed and recorded, he may propound such deed or will for probate, and may appeal from a sentence against him. He may sue in forma pauperis for his freedom, and may resort to a court of equity for relief when he has no adequate remedy at law. It is as competent for a slave emancipated on condition that he elects to be free, to make such election, as it is for a slave absolutely emancipated to propound the deed or will for probate, appeal from the sentence, or sue for his freedom. Such right of election is incident, as such remedies are incident, to the legal capacity of the slave to receive his freedom.

206 *If this were a new question, therefore, and especially if it be conceded, as it now must be, that emancipations in futuro are lawful, I would think the condition lawful and the emancipation valid in this case.

But I regard the question as res adjudicata. Elder v. Elder, I think, has decided it. I would feel myself bound by that decision, even if I doubted its soundness. It is a case of the highest authority, having been argued by very able counsel, and having been decided by a unanimous court of four of our ablest judges, Tucker, Brooke, Cabell and Carr, Judge Green being absent from sickness. It was decided in 1833, a quarter of a century ago, and has ever since been regarded as a binding authority. On the faith of it counsel have advised, testators have made their wills, courts have construed them, and executors have carried them into effect. To disregard it now, and decide otherwise, may be attended with the greatest evils. The same reasons which are said to require us to disregard that case, seem equally to require us to disregard all the cases which decide that emancipations in futuro are lawful; and thus the whole law would be unsettled in regard to the emancipation of slaves.

But it is said that the question was not raised nor decided in Elder v. Elder; that the order in that case appointing "commissioners to examine privily and impartially all the slaves of the testator's estate, and to ascertain from each and report to the court, whether he or she was willing to go to Liberia," was made by consent of parties; and therefore that the question is not res adjudicata. The bill which was filed by the residuary legatee, alleged that the slaves conditionally emancipated by the will had never elected to go to Liberia; but that, on the contrary, the executor having fully explained the will to them, and their rights under it, they had declared they would not go to Liberia, and preferred to remain in Virginia in slavery;
207 *and that they had remained here for near two years since the testator's death. The executor, in his answer, stated that the other personal estate of the testator being inadequate to the payment of his debts, he had hired out the slaves for that purpose, and had not yet given them their election, though he had explained their rights to them, and did not doubt that when they should be allowed to make their election, they would prefer to go to Liberia. In this state of the pleadings the consent order was made. The commissioners reported that all of the slaves except one preferred to accept their freedom and go to Liberia; and the court decreed accordingly. The argument of the case in this court is not reported; and we can only infer what it was from the opinions of the judges. It is reasonable to infer that among the points argued, were those which were decided. It was decided, among other things, that such of the slaves as preferred to go to Liberia were effectually emancipated; and that it was unnecessary, to perfect their title to freedom, that they should elect to go within twelve months after the testator's death, provided they made such election when it was offered to them; or that the Colonization society should agree to defray the expenses of sending them; provided any person should agree to do so. It appears from the opinion of President Tucker, that these points were argued by counsel. It cannot be said with propriety that they did not arise in the case; or that it was improper for the court to decide them; or that the fact that the order before mentioned was by consent, affected the decision. If the slaves really had been unwilling to go to Liberia, as the bill alleged, a report of that fact by the commissioners would have put an end to the case; and therefore the plaintiff consented to an order appointing commissioners to ascertain the fact; but he did not intend thereby to waive any 208 right he might *have to the slaves, even though they might be willing to go to Liberia. Nor did the order have that effect. Carr, J., said, "In the construction of wills, we are to find out the meaning, the intention, the will of the testator; and unless that violates some principle of law, it must be carried into execution. He thought the intention plain in the case, and that it did not violate any principle of law. Cabell, J., said, "The intention of the testator to emancipate his slaves, is too evident to require argument; and it is equally clear that there is nothing illegal in the mode which he has adopted for the execution of that intention. Slaves may be emancipated by deed or will, at the pleasure of their owners; but they forfeit their freedom, unless they remove, within twelve months, beyond the limits of the commonwealth. It can therefore be no objection to the emancipation in this case, that the testator has directed it on the condition of their willingness to go to Liberia." Brooke, J., concurred. Tucker, P., said, "The first questions in this case turn upon the intention of the testator, and the legality of that intention. Of the intention, I think there can be no reasonable doubt." "As little doubt exists of the legality of this intention. The slaves were not to be free until they should be sent to Liberia; and they were not to be sent there against their consent. It is not perceived that there is any thing in the policy of the law, as there certainly is not in its statutory provisions, which forbids an emancipation by transportation to a free colony." None of the judges seem to have had any doubt upon the question, whether the conditional emancipation of the slaves was valid. Their decision of that question seems to be in accordance with the construction which has uniformly been put upon the act of 1782, and acquiesced in ever since its passage.

In Pleasants v. Pleasants, 2 Call 319, the wills of John and Jonathan Pleasants, 209 which were the subjects *of controversy, were made before the passage of that act, when it was not lawful to emancipate slaves in this state; and the case was decided shortly thereafter. The will of John was, that his slaves should be free if they chose it, when they arrived at the age of thirty years, and the laws of the land would admit them to be set free without their being transported out of the country, &c. The will of Jonathan was, that whenever the laws of the country would admit absolute freedom to them, his slaves should, on their coming to the age of thirty years, become free, or at least such as would accept their freedom. The court, consisting of Judges Pendleton, Carrington and Roane, unanimously held that the slaves were entitled to their freedom. Nothing was said in the case about the right of election given to the slaves. The great question was, Whether the doctrine of perpetuities and executory limitations applied to the case; and whether, according to that doctrine, the bequest of freedom was limited on a contingency too remote? It did not occur to the counsel or the court that an election between freedom and slavery could be given to slaves under the act of 1782. If it had, it is incredible that the objection would not have been taken or suggested by some of them. It is said, that the objection was not taken because the emancipation was considered to be absolute. It can hardly be supposed that the counsel for the claimants of the slaves would have admitted, without a question, that the emancipation was absolute, if it had been considered that its validity depended upon that. An order to take the election of the slaves was doubtless not applied for, because it was known that all would elect their freedom; especially as, by the act of 1782, they were not required to leave the state. I regard Pleasants v. Pleasants as a case of great importance on the question under consideration. It involved a large amount of property, 210 *and the freedom of a great many negroes. It was argued by very able lawyers, and decided by very eminent judges, who had the best opportunity of knowing the meaning and policy of the act; and it may almost be considered as a contemporaneous exposition thereof. No subsequent decision of this court has impaired the authority of the case; nor has the doctrine settled by it been changed by subsequent legislation; though there have since been several general revisions of our laws, and two conventions to amend our constitution.

That case was followed by Elder v. Elder, in which the question of the right of election was more distinctly presented by the will, and raised by the pleadings and proceedings, and in which, as we have seen, the most confident opinions were expressed by the judges in affirmance of the right.

Elder v. Elder, in its turn, was followed by Dawson v. Dawson's ex'or, &c., 10 Leigh 602, in which the testator directed all his slaves to be emancipated and sent to a country where slavery is not tolerated, if, within twelve months, they should elect to be emancipated on these terms; otherwise to be sold. It was tacitly conceded by all parties in the case, and by the court below and this court, that the right of election existed. The matter directly in controversy was the right to the Bell-Air tract of land, which by the codicil was given to "Benjamin Dawson, for the equitable support and maintenance of the slave population thereon." Benjamin Dawson claimed under the codicil an absolute estate in the land and slaves thereon. The court below decided that the codicil gave him only the use thereof, in trust for the support and maintenance of the slaves during the interval of twelve months or longer, which might elapse between the death of the testator and the election of the slaves; but that nevertheless, as the slaves were 211 not yet freedmen, *and would not be until they so elected, they therefore had no capacity to enforce against Dawson the trustee any accountability over and above their maintenance; and he was entitled to all the profits beyond, discharged of the trust, namely, the use of the Bell-Air estate until the slaves thereon should make their election. This court, consisting of Tucker, Brooke and Cabell, unanimously affirmed the decree. In doing so, they must have affirmed the validity of the conditional emancipation of the slaves; for otherwise the trust created for their support would have been void, and Benjamin Dawson could have had no interest in the Bell-Air estate. The most that can be said against the authority of the case is, that the question as to the validity of such an emancipation was not directly raised. The plain reason why it was not is, that neither the parties nor the counsel nor the court seem to have entertained any doubt upon the question. And this shows how uniform and universal has been the opinion which has prevailed upon the subject.

The principle thus recognized, affirmed and acted on in Elder v. Elder's ex'or, and Dawson v. Dawson's ex'or, has never since been questioned in this court, nor changed by legislation; though there have since been, besides many annual sessions of the legislature, one general revision of our laws, and one session of a convention to amend the constitution.

If public opinion has undergone any change as to the policy or propriety of authorizing masters to emancipate their slaves, or to emancipate them in futuro or upon condition, such change must develop itself in the action of the legislature, and not of the courts, whose business it is jus dicere, non jus dare, to expound the law as it is written and settled, and not as it ought to be, or as it may be supposed that public opinion would have it to be.
212 *There are certainly difficulties surrounding the subject of emancipations depending upon the choice of slaves. Who are to choose for such as are of too tender years to choose for themselves? is a question which it is difficult to answer; at least, to give an answer which will apply to all cases, or even as a general rule. But these difficulties are not of themselves sufficient to prevent the court from administering the law, if it can possibly do so. They were overcome in Elder v. Elder, and may be, perhaps, in most cases. There is nothing to indicate that they cannot be overcome in this case, as they were in that. If in any case they cannot be overcome, the intention, of course, must fail of effect. But whenever they can, they ought to be overcome; ut res magis valeat quam pereat. Whenever the law authorizes an act to be done, and a party bona fide endeavor to do the act according to law, the court should endeavor to effectuate his intentions.

The will in this case was written in November 1835, two or three years after the decision of Elder v. Elder, and probably with that case before the draftsman, or in his mind. But for that case, the testator might have emancipated the slaves absolutely. He was willing to do so, but did not wish to force freedom upon them against their will, and therefore gave them their choice, as that case decided he might lawfully do. Ought we now to frustrate his will, and award the slaves unconditionally to those to whom he gave them only on condition that the slaves reject the boon of freedom which he offers them? I think not.

I am also of opinion that the increase of the slaves born during the life of the testator's wife, are entitled to the benefit of the bequest. All the residue of his property, including negroes, is loaned to the wife for life. The issue of these negroes born during her life, are part of his property 213 and part of the negroes loaned *to her for life. The choice of being emancipated or sold is given to "the negroes loaned his wife, at her death," embracing of course, I think, the said issue. This construction seems to be sustained by many decisions of this court, which I need not cite.

I do not think that the clause directing his executor to sell any of the slaves loaned his wife, if they should prove refractory or hard to manage, affects the case in regard to such of the slaves as remained unsold at her death. This clause was inserted for the benefit of the wife, and to insure the good conduct of the slaves. Any of them might have been sold for misconduct during her life, and such would of course have been excluded from the number of those to whom the choice was to be offered at her death. But as to those who then remained unsold, the clause had performed its function, and they stood as if it had not been inserted in the will.

In regard to the other questions involved in this case, I concur with the majority of the court.

214 *Tyler & als. v. Nelson's Adm'x.

January Term, 1858, Richmond.

1. Chancery Jurisdiction—Settlement of Accounts—Case at Bar.—A court of equity has jurisdiction in a suit by a high sheriff against his deputy and the sureties of the deputy to have a settlement of the accounts of several administrations upon estates committed to the high sheriff, and which went into the hands of the deputy. And the suit may be maintained though the deputy had settled the administration accounts before the probate court; and though the bill does not allege and it is not proved that the high sheriff had paid the balances reported to be due on the settled accounts, or any part of them.
2. Revival of Suits—Case at Bar.—Upon the death of the high sheriff the suit should be revived in the name of his personal representative, and not in the name of the personal representatives of the different estates, it being his suit against his agent.
3. Deputy Sheriff—Liability of Sureties to High Sheriff.†—The bond of the sureties for the deputy which was given during the first year of the sheriffalty, bound them to indemnify the high sheriff for the acts of his deputy during the continuance in office of the high sheriff. Their liability does not extend to indemnify the high sheriff for the acts of the deputy in relation to an estate committed to the sheriff during his second year of office.
4. Same—Same.‡—The sureties of the deputy are liable for the amount of bonds taken by the first administrator on the estate, and after his death

*Chancery Jurisdiction—Settlement of Accounts.—In Lafever v. Billmyer, 5 W. Va. 39, 40, after quoting at some length from the principal case as to the jurisdiction of equity courts in the case of accounts, the court said: "It seems to me that the views, thus given at length, of such eminent jurists, cannot be ignored, and that they conclusively settle the doctrine that courts of equity have jurisdiction of matters of account (1) where there are mutual demands, and a fortiori when complicated, (2) where the accounts are on one side and a discovery is sought that is material to the relief, and (3) equity having taken jurisdiction for discovery, will, to avoid multiplicity of suits, administer suitable relief. The reason for the doctrine is, not that the law affords no remedy, but that it is more complete and adequate in equity."

In Petty v. Fogle, 16 W. Va. 514, 518, the court, in its discussion of the jurisdiction of equity courts in matters of accounts, after citing among others the principal case and Lafever v. Billmyer, 5 W. Va. 39, said that the propositions above quoted from Lafever v. Billmyer, are in the main correct but that they do not embrace all matters of account of which equity should take jurisdiction. See also, the principal case cited along this line in Penn v. Ingles, 82 Va. 71; Yates v. Stuart, 39 W. Va. 130, 19 S. E. Rep. 425; foot-note to Coffman v. Sangston, 21 Gratt. 263. In this note there are many cases collected.

delivered by his administrator to the sheriff in the first year of his sheriffalty, as a part of the unadministered assets, after the estate had been committed to the sheriff.

5. Same--Same.§—Where an estate has been committed to the sheriff in the first year of his sheriffalty, the sureties of the deputy will be responsible for assets received by him after the end of the year.

6. Evidence—Collection of Bonds by Deputy Sheriff.—What sufficient evidence that deputy had collected the bonds which had been delivered to him.

This was a bill filed in the Circuit court of Charles City county by Nathaniel Nelson, late high sheriff of the county, against John C. Tyler, his deputy, and three others, his sureties. The plaintiff qualified as high sheriff of the county of Charles City in March 1837, and also in March 1838;
215 and John C. Tyler *qualified as his deputy in both years. In 1837 said Tyler executed his bond in the penalty of fifteen thousand dollars, with John Tyler, Henry Curtis and Henry L. Jones as his sureties, with the condition that John C. Tyler should faithfully perform and discharge the duties of the office of deputy sheriff in the said county of Charles City during the continuance in office of the said Nathaniel Nelson as sheriff, and should indemnify and save harmless the said Nelson from all loss or damage he might sustain in consequence of the actings and doings or omissions to act of the said John C. Tyler in the office of deputy sheriff. In the year commencing March 1837 the estates of John Bell and William E. Barrow were committed to the sheriff of Charles City for administration, and went into the hands of the deputy sheriff Tyler; and in May 1838 the estate of Samuel B. Parker was in like manner committed to the sheriff, and went into the hands of Tyler. Subsequently Tyler settled the accounts of administration on these estates before the court of probate, and there was found due to the estate of Bell seven hundred and sixty-two dollars and ninety-two cents, with interest on seven hundred and seventeen dollars and ninety-seven cents, part thereof, from the 15th of June 1839 until paid; to the estate of Parker, the sum of five hundred and ninety-two dollars and forty-two cents, with interest on five hundred and four dollars and twenty-one cents from the 17th of May 1842; and to the estate of Barrow, the sum of ninety-seven dollars and ninety-eight cents, with interest on sixty dollars and forty-one cents from the 1st of July 1840.

The bill contained the foregoing facts, and charged that Tyler had not paid over the said several sums of money either to the parties entitled as representing said estates, or to the plaintiff. And in an amended bill it was charged that they 216 had been demanded of *the plaintiff. The prayer was for the payment over of the moneys due on account of said estates to the plaintiff; that all proper accounts should be ordered; and for general relief.

In November 1844 the bill was taken for confessed as to all the parties, and there was an order for an account of Tyler's transactions as deputy sheriff of Nelson on the estates of Bell, Parker and Barrow, and the accounts theretofore settled by Tyler were to be taken as prima facie correct. This report was made in 1846, based upon the settlements before the court of probate: and the commissioner reported that Tyler had declined to attend him, saying that he had no other settlement to make but the one on record; and was willing that should stand as it was. The report was excepted to by the securities of Tyler, on the ground, 1st. That Tyler was charged in the account of Bell's and Parker's estate, with the amount of bonds taken by a former administrator, and after his death delivered by his personal representative to Tyler as unadministered assets. 2d. That Tyler was charged with some of these bonds which had not been collected; and among these was a bond of Mary Bell, a distributee of the estate of John Bell, for three hundred and fifty-six dollars and fifty-five cents. 3d. That he was charged with moneys which were received by him more than twelve months after his qualification in March 1837. These defendants afterwards filed their answer, putting the same questions in issue.

The plaintiff having died, the suit was revived in the name of his administratrix; and the cause came on to be heard in November 1854, when the court having had a statement made excluding the bond of Mary Bell from the charges against the administrator, overruled all the exceptions, and made a decree against John C. Tyler and his three sureties, for nine hundred and thirty-five dollars and thirty-six him and remaining uncollected at the time of the death of such executor may be claimed in equity by the administrator de bonis non. This proposition, laid down by GREEN, J., in Wernick v. McMurdo, 5 Rand. 90, is approved in the principal case (p. 224); Heffernan v. Grymes, 2 Leigh 523; Clarke v. Wells, 6 Gratt. 475; Hinton v. Bland, 81 Va. 596; the last case citing the principal case as authority. The reason is that, though the act of the executor may amount to a conversion at law, equity, looking at the quo animo, will follow the property and consider it still unadministered. Heffernan v. Grymes, 2 Leigh 523.

§Sheriff—End of Term—Continued Liability.—Where the statute makes no provision for transferring an estate committed to a sheriff for administration to his successor in office, he must proceed with the administration till completed, whether his official term has ended or not, and for an abuse of the trust, his securities, as well as himself, will be liable. This is well settled. Tunstall v. Withers, 89 Va. 895, 11 S. E. Rep. 565, citing the principal case and Dabney v. Smith, 5 Leigh 13. See also, Douglass v. Stumps, 5 Leigh 396; Mosby v. Mosby, 9 Gratt. 601; Cocke v. Harrison, 3 Rand. 494.

217 cents, with interest *on eight hundred and thirty-seven dollars and nineteen cents, a part thereof, from the 17th of May 1842 till paid, on account of Parker's estate; for the sum of four hundred dollars and seventy-five cents, with interest on three hundred and seventy-eight dollars and seven cents, from the 15th of June 1839, on account of Bell's estate, with liberty to ask further relief as to Mary Bell's bond; and for the sum of ninety-seven dollars and ninety-eight cents, with interest, on account of Barrow's estate; and also for the costs of the plaintiff. And it was ordered that no execution should issue upon the decree against the sureties, until one had been first issued against Tyler, and had been returned "no effects," either in whole or in part. From this decree the three sureties applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

Lyons, for the appellant, insisted:

1st. That the sureties of the deputy sheriff were only responsible for his acts for the first year of the sheriff's term; the bond limiting it to that term. That this was the case as to the bond of the high sheriff, because his term of office is for a year only; Commonwealth v. Fairfax, 4 Hen. & Munf. 208; and so the bond of the deputy, when by its terms limited, as in this case, to the continuance of the sheriff in office, binds his sureties only for one year. Munford v. Rice, 6 Munf. 81.

2d. That the deputy sheriff had no authority to collect bonds payable to the first administrator, and therefore his sureties were not bound for the payment of the amount to the proper parties. Wernick's adm'r v. McMurdo, 5 Rand. 51; Cheatham v. Friend, 9 Leigh 580.

3d. That it was no where alleged in the bill that the plaintiff had been compelled to pay any thing on account of the moneys in the hands of Tyler; and 218 *therefore he could not aver any damage, so as to subject the sureties. Ray v. Clemens, 6 Leigh 600. And if he had any redress against them, his remedy was at law, and therefore the court of equity had no jurisdiction.

4th. That the suit should have been revived in the name of the representative of the intestate's estate, and not in the name of Nelson.

Nance and Johnson, for the appellee, insisted:

1st. That the bond of the sureties covered the transactions of both years in which Nelson was sheriff and Tyler was his deputy. Royster v. Leake, 2 Munf. 280. And that where an administration has been commenced by a sheriff, he is bound to complete it, even after his term of office expires. Mosby's adm'r v. Mosby's adm'r, 9 Gratt. 584. And if his deputy has formed the office, he is bound to complete it, and his sureties are bound for him. Id. 584; Dabney's adm'r v. Smith, 5 Leigh 13; Douglas' ex'or v. Stump, Id. 392.

2d. That though it is true that an administrator de bonis non cannot sue the prior administrator to recover assets which have been converted by the latter, he may sue where the assets are not so converted, for the recovery of them. But however this may be, the bonds having been transferred to Tyler, and he having received them, his sureties are liable. Mosby's adm'r v. Mosby's adm'r, 9 Gratt. 584.

3d. That it was not necessary that the plaintiff should have been compelled to pay the money before filing his bill. Mosby's adm'r v. Mosby's adm'r, 9 Gratt. 584; Cox v. Thomas' adm'x, Id. 323.

4th. That the suit was properly revived in the name of Nelson's administratrix. This suit was not brought as administratrix of any or all of the estates committed to him, but in his own right, to recover from his agent moneys for which he 219 was responsible, and for which *he was the proper person to account to the persons interested in these estates.

LEE, J. Of the questions raised in this case the first to be considered is that of the jurisdiction of the Court of chancery.

The case is one essentially for an account. It involves the transactions of the deputy as the acting administrator of three several estates. The settlement of the accounts was of course to be made upon the same principles which would govern if the settlement were made in a suit by creditors or distributees against the sheriff himself as administrator, because the deputy and his sureties would be liable to the sheriff in the same amount for which he was liable to those entitled to call him to account. And that the sheriff might have had a remedy by an action on the bond should not in this case exclude the equity jurisdiction. The remedy at law could not be as ample and complete as in equity. The accounts could not be as well settled by a jury as by a commissioner in chancery; and although there had been an ex parte settlement made in each case, yet it might still be shown upon a settlement under the order of the court, that the amounts really due and for which the high sheriff would be liable, were greater or less than those ascertained upon those ex parte settlements. In point of fact the court did forbear at the time of its decree to charge the parties with a large portion of the amount appearing to be due to the estate of John Bell upon a suggestion by the deputy that he had never collected the bond of Mary Bell which constituted a part of the assets supposed to have come to his hands. Moreover it might turn out (as indeed, it will appear in the sequel, it did turn out), that whilst the deputy might be liable upon all three accounts as claimed, the sureties might be liable for part only. But the law court could of course 220 *only give one judgment in the case and that for the amount due from those jointly bound; whilst the court of equity could adjust the several liabilities and decree against the deputy separately as well as against him and his sureties jointly, according to the ascertained liabilities; and thus to a certain extent multiplicity of suits by the sheriff for the short comings of his deputy would be avoided.

In these views I think the jurisdiction of the court is sufficiently vindicated.

But it is said that if the court could entertain the bill, yet that upon Nelson's death the suit was improperly revived in the name of his administratrix, and could only have been properly revived in the names of the administrators de bonis non of the several decedents Barrow, Bell and Parker. This suit however was not brought by Nelson as administrator of those parties, but in his own right, individually. It was not to recover specific chattels belonging to those estates nor assets still in the hands of the acting administrator and unconverted, but it was to obtain indemnity from the deputy and his sureties against the default of the former by holding him to an account of his transactions as acting administrator for which the sheriff was responsible to those interested in the several estates. I think it clear therefore that the suit was well revived in the name of Nelson's administratrix.

Another ground of error assigned is that a large portion of the moneys for which the sureties were held responsible was received by the deputy after the expiration of the year during which they became bound for his acts, and it is urged that they should not be charged with moneys received by him during the second year of Nelson's shrievalty.

It appears that the assets of the estate of the decedent Bell that came to the hands of the deputy sheriff, were received by him in the year 1837 which was the 221 *first year of Nelson's shrievalty; but that those of the estates of Barrow and Parker did not come to his hands until after the commencement of Nelson's second term. But the estate of Barrow was committed to the sheriff during the first year of Nelson's shrievalty and whilst Tyler was his deputy for whom as such the sureties had become bound to the sheriff. It was of course the duty of the sheriff to complete the administration whether before or after the termination of his office; and the deputy who had undertaken the duty of the acting administrator within the year was authorized and it was his duty to do what the sheriff himself could do after the expiration of the term, to bring the affairs of the estate to a close. The sheriff and his sureties are answerable for the deputy's administration as well before as after the expiration of his office, just as they would be for the acts of a deputy in relation to an execution levied by him during his term of office. Dabney's adm'r v. Smith, 5 Leigh 13; Douglas' ex'or v. Stump, Id. 392. And as the sheriff and his sureties would thus be answerable for the deputy's acts after the year, it would seem very clear that the sureties of the latter would be responsible for the same to the sheriff upon their bond. Miller v. Jones, 9 Gratt. 584, 610.

But although in this view the sureties of Tyler must be held responsible for the assets of the estates of Bell and Barrow that came to his hands whether before or after the expiration of the term commencing in 1837, I can see no ground on which they can be held liable for the assets of the estate of Parker which was not committed to Nelson as sheriff to be administered until after the expiration of the term for which they had become bound. The appointment of the sheriff was for one year and the term of the deputy under his appointment would not extend beyond that of his 222 *principal. The words therefore of the bond descriptive of the term for which the sureties of the deputy had become responsible for his acts to the sheriff, to wit "during the continuance in office of the said Nathaniel Nelson" must have reference to the actual duration of the office under which the bond was given and which was for the year beginning in March 1837. If this could be otherwise at all doubtful, it must now be regarded as settled by the decisions of this court. Commonwealth v. Fairfax, 4 H. & M. 208; Munford v. Rice, 6 Munf. 81. In the former case it was held that upon the construction of the act, the sheriff was to be annually appointed and commissioned, and should annually give bond conditioned for the faithful discharge of the duties of the office; and accordingly that where a sheriff had been commissioned for one year only, and had acted the second year without a new nomination and commission and without having renewed his bond, the sureties in his bond were not liable for taxes collected by him during the second year, notwithstanding the condition of the bond was for the faithful performance of his duties during his continuance in office. In Munford v. Rice it was held that the sureties of a deputy sheriff who had given bond (as in the case before us) to indemnify the sheriff were only liable for the transactions of one year and not for those of a second year during which the deputy had acted as such although the bond was conditioned for the faithful performance of his duties "during his continuance in office;" the court distinguishing this case from that of Royster v. Leake, 2 Munf. 280, in which a bond dated 15th November 1802 and conditioned for the faithful performance of the duties of the deputy during his continuance in office until November court 1804, was upon its particular phraseology held binding upon the sureties for the year
223 ending at *November court 1804 as well as the previous year, and until the winding up of the business lawfully committed to him as deputy.

This case falls clearly within the principles established by these cases and in its material facts is not to be distinguished from the case of Munford v. Rice.

As another ground of error the appellant insists that Tyler the deputy, had no authority to receive and collect bonds payable to the former administrators of Bell and Parker and therefore that his sureties were not liable for the amounts thus received.

This question is of no importance so far as it affects the estate of Parker, because as we have seen, the sureties are not to be charged with any thing received by Tyler on account of that estate, but it is important as it respects the estate of Bell because all the assets of that estate that came to Tyler's hands consisted of bonds turned over to him by the administratrix of Ladd the former administrator.

I think the position contended for by the counsel on this head cannot be maintained. It is true that an administrator de bonis non cannot sue the representative of a former executor or administrator either at law or in equity, for assets wasted or converted by him; such waste or conversion is an administration of the assets and the suit to recover them must be brought by creditor's legatees or distributees. Wernick's adm'r v. McMurdo, 5 Rand. 51. But all the assets not altered or converted by the former executor or administrator, are to be regarded as unadministered, and these pass to the administrator de bonis non and not to the representative of the first executor or administrator. 4 Bouvier's Bac. Ab. (ed. 1846) title "Executors and Administrators," B. 2, p. 24; Wankford v. Wankford, 1 Salk. R. 299, 306; Rutland v. Rutland, 2 P. Wms. 210; Attorney General v. Hooker, 2 P. Wms. 338. And choses in action may pass as unadministered assets to the 224 *administrator de bonis non. Thus if a bill of exchange be endorsed generally and delivered to an administrator for a debt due the estate of his decedent, and the administrator die after the maturity of the bill, the bill vests in the administrator de bonis non of the first decedent, and he may sue thereon. Catherwood v. Chabaud, 1 Barn. & Cress. 150, 8 Eng. C. L. R. 45. So a promise to an administrator will be a sufficient foundation for an action on behalf of the administrator de bonis non. Hirst's adm'r v. Smith, 7 T. R. 182. And upon a judgment recovered by an executor as such, the administrator de bonis non of the first decedent may maintain debt on a scire facias. Dykes & Co. v. Woodhouse's adm'r, 3 Rand. 287. Sometimes too where there might be said to have been a conversion at law it will not be so regarded in equity: as if the first administrator were to invest money of his intestate in the public funds or to transfer it from one fund to another. This as it showed no intention to make the money his own, would not be considered in equity a conversion. Per Carr, J., Wernick v. McMurdo, 5 Rand. 51, 57. And bonds taken by an executor or administrator for property belonging to the estate of his decedent and lawfully sold by him and remaining uncollected at the time of the death of such executor or administrator might be claimed in equity by the administrator de bonis non. Per Green, J., Ibid. 90. And this doctrine has been affirmed in a recent case in which it was held that where it is not necessary that the bonds should be retained by the representative of the first executor or administrator for the indemnity of the estate of his decedent, they might be confided as unadministered assets to the administrator de bonis non. Clarke v. Wells' adm'r, 6 Gratt. 475.

Now the bonds turned over to Tyler as the acting administrator de bonis non of Bell were taken payable to Ladd in his character of administrator of Bell; they 225 *were it is to be presumed for the proceeds of property of the estate properly sold; they were kept separate and treated as the assets of that estate; it was not necessary they should be retained by the administratrix of Ladd to indemnify her estate, and she accordingly turned them over to Tyler as administrator de bonis non to be administered by him. In such a case Judge Green would seem to be of opinion that such a delivery of the assets would discharge the estate of the deceased executor or administrator from any claim by creditors, legatees or distributees for the assets so turned over. Wernick v. McMurdo, 5 Rand. 51, 94. And where an administrator de bonis non has the right to recover unadministered assets of the first executor or administrator and actually receives them, certainly the payment of them would be good and would protect the estate of such first executor or administrator from any further liability for them.

The question discussed in the cases above referred to was as to the right of the administrator de bonis non to recover by suit assets in the hands of the previous executor or administrator. But if the assets have been voluntarily paid over to the administrator de bonis non and received by him colore officii as assets of the estate of his decedent, there can be no doubt of his liability to account for them. The intention to convert or not to convert is regarded as a criterion by which to determine the fact of conversion, and payment by the representative of the first executor or administrator to the administrator de bonis non, is to be taken as an admission that the assets had not been converted. Per Judge Green as above cited, p. 51, 94. And the question here is not whether the administrator de bonis non could recover of Ladd's administratrix, nor whether the latter was discharged by turning over the bonds to Tyler, but whether Tyler and his sureties are liable for the assets thus received. In 226 Mosby's *adm'r v. Mosby's adm'r, 9 Gratt. 584, administrator de bonis non of an estate was committed to a sheriff, and his deputy the acting administrator received the rents and profits of the real estate of the decedent; and it was held that whether the high sheriff was authorized to receive the rents and profits of the land or not, yet as the estate had been committed to him and his deputy had taken possession of the land and received the rents and profits, the high sheriff was bound to account for them; and that the deputy and his sureties were liable to the high sheriff for all rents and profits for which he was liable to those interested in the estate; the liability of the obligors in the deputy's bond as well sureties as principal, says Judge Moncure, "seems to follow as a necessary consequence." Ibid. 584, 610.

The case just cited I think covers in principle the whole ground of the present case, and more, for I think the reasons for holding the sureties responsible in this case are even stronger than those in the former.

Another ground of error assigned is that there is no proof that the bonds received from the former administrator had been paid to or collected by Tyler. The bonds were turned over to him by the administratrix of Ladd in July 1837 and were all due on the 1st of August in that year. They were delivered to him for the purpose of being collected as assets of the estate of Bell and it was his duty to proceed to collect them without unnecessary delay. He settled the account of the administration on the 27th July 1843, in which he charged the administrator with the whole amount of these bonds as of the day on which they fell due. He made no suggestion that any of them had not been or could not be collected. He never at any time surrendered or offered to surrender any of them to Nelson, nor did he produce them before the commissioner when he settled the account in 1843 or 227 afterwards under the *order of the court in this cause in 1846; and when called on by the commissioner when he was about to make the last settlement, he stated that he had no other settlement to make than the one of record and was willing it should stand as it was. And when the decree was about to be pronounced, he made no objection to being charged with any of these bonds except the one on Mary Bell which he then for the first time alleged he had not collected. That bond was accordingly reserved by the court by its decree. I think the proof that he had collected all the rest was most satisfactory if not conclusive.

The last objection to be noticed is that there is neither allegation nor proof that any recovery had been had of the sheriff, and therefore he had no right to recover of the sureties of the deputy. It is true it is not alleged that any judgment or decree had been rendered against the sheriff, nor that he had paid the amount due. Nor was it necessary it should be. It was sufficient if it was alleged and proved that by the transactions of the deputy as the acting administrator, the high sheriff had been rendered liable to those interested in the estates. That this is sufficiently done seems clear. It is alleged and proved that Tyler settled the accounts of the estates as required by law, in obedience to the orders of the County court of Charles City, and those settlements were returned to the court and ordered to be recorded as the law directs. They showed the balances due from Nelson the administrator and rendered him liable for the same to those entitled to the assets. That the true amounts might have been shown by proper proceedings, to be greater or less than those ascertained by the settlements did not impair their legal effect. Unless and until so shown, those amounts were to be taken as they stood, and the settlements constituted a sufficient basis of recovery by those entitled against the 228 high sheriff, and by *him against the deputy and his sureties. That it is not necessary the sheriff should have actually paid the amount for which he is liable in such a case sufficiently appears from the case of Miller v. Jones, 9 Gratt. 584, 609, in which the sheriff was permitted to maintain his action against the deputy and his sureties although he had not paid any part of the amount for which he had been rendered liable by the default of the deputy. The condition of the bond in that case as stated by Judge Moncure in his opinion, was perhaps somewhat different from that of the bond in the present case. Still I apprehend that as Tyler had by his acts, as deputy, rendered Nelson liable to a recovery of the amounts appearing due on the accounts stated, there was a sufficient breach of the bond to sustain his right to seek the indemnity which it was intended to provide.

I think therefore there was no error in the decree except in charging the sureties of Tyler with the amount ascertained to be due to the estate of Parker; and am of opinion to reverse so much as makes them liable for that amount, and in lieu thereof, to render a decree for the same against the deputy, John C. Tyler alone, and in all other particulars to affirm the decree.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Lee, J.

Affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

229 Andrews v. Avory & als.

January Term, 1858, Richmond.

[73 Am. Dec. 355.]

1. Administration Granted—Wrong Exercise of Jurisdiction—Effect.—Administration granted where the deceased lived and died out of the state, and left no estate within it, is not void.

Administration Granted—Wrong Exercise of Jurisdiction—Effect.—The principal case is directly in keeping with Fisher v. Bassett, 9 Leigh 119. In that case (Fisher v. Bassett) a corporation court granted an administration of the estate of a foreigner, who died abroad, and who had no residence in the corporation at the time of his death, and had no estate of any kind there, so that, in truth, the state of facts were not such as to give the court jurisdiction to grant administration in that particular case. But the court held, as it did in the principal case, that such a grant of administration was not a void but only a voidable act.

This decision and that of the principal case were approved in Holmes v. Oregon, etc., Ry. Co., 5 Fed. Rep. 530.

The ground upon which these decisions are based is that, where a court has general jurisdiction

2. Administrator—Liability of Sureties—Case at Bar.†—An administrator appointed in Virginia, whose intestate lived and died in North Carolina, and left no estate in Virginia, goes to North Carolina, and without qualifying there, takes possession of the assets, and brings them to Virginia. His sureties in Virginia are liable for his faithful administration of these assets.

3. Same—Acting as Commissioner—Liability of Sureties.‡—The intestate owing few debts, and the administrator having paid them, without selling the slaves, a suit is brought in the County court in the name of some of the next of kin against G, the administrator, not as such, but as one of the next of kin, and two others, infants, stating that the debts are paid, and that from the number of the slaves and of the next of kin, the slaves cannot be divided, and asking that they may be sold. The defendants answer, admitting the facts, and G is appointed a commissioner to sell the slaves, and divide the proceeds among the next of kin. He does sell at public auction, but he does not distribute the proceeds. His sureties are not responsible for the proceeds of the sale of the slaves; he having sold them as commissioner of the court, and not as administrator.

This was a suit instituted in the Circuit court of Mecklenburg in April 1847 by Rebecca Avory, the mother, and others, the brothers and sisters of William T. Avory deceased, against George W. Avory as administrator of William T. Avory, and in his own right, and Henry M. Spencer and Robert Andrews, his sureties in his official bond, for an account of George W. Avory's administration, and for payment of what might be found due to the plaintiffs.

William T. Avory died in the county of Granville, North Carolina, in the early part of the year 1840, intestate and unmarried. He appears to have moved to 230 *that county from the county of Mecklenburg, in the state of Virginia, about a year before his death, and all his next of kin (except perhaps one) lived in Mecklenburg: and in March 1840, George W. Avory qualified as his administrator in the County court of Mecklenburg, and executed a bond in the penalty of four thousand dollars, with Spencer and Andrews as his sureties.

At the death of William T. Avory, his whole property, so far as this record shows, was in the county of Granville, North Carolina, and consisted of two slaves, some personal property, and debts. The personal property was sold by George W. Avory in Granville county, and the proceeds and debts collected amounted to four hundred and fifty-five dollars and thirty-six cents of principal, after paying the debts due from the estate, which were few in number and small in amount. There was one debt alleged to be due to the intestate, but the only proof of its existence was by one of the distributees, who was excepted to as an incompetent witness.

At the May term 1840 of the county court of Mecklenburg, the same persons who were plaintiffs in the above mentioned suit, were plaintiffs in a friendly bill and answer, in which they state that William T. Avory in regard to probates and the granting of administrations, though it may err in taking jurisdiction of a particular case, yet, since it has jurisdiction of the whole subject-matter, its order in that case is generally not void, but only voidable on citations or appeal and can never be questioned collaterally. This principle of law is established by Fisher v. Bassett, 9 Leigh 119; Burnley v. Duke, 2 Rob. 129; Schultz v. Schultz, 10 Gratt. 378 et seq.; Cox v. Thomas, 9 Gratt. 328; Hutcheson v. Priddy, 12 Gratt. 90; and approved in the principal case.

This specific proposition recognizes, and naturally and legitimately grows out of, the broad general rule—which seems established beyond controversy, in this state at least—that where a court has jurisdiction of a given subject-matter, i. e. jurisdiction of cases ejusdem generis, and of the parties, though the facts do not give it jurisdiction of a particular case, yet its judgment in that case is not void, but is conclusive until set aside by some proceeding in the same or an appellate court; it cannot be impeached in any collateral proceeding. For a collection of the Virginia and West Virginia cases upholding this doctrine, see foot-note to Gibson v. Beckham, 16 Gratt. 321, and the foot-notes there referred to. See also, in accord, the cases cited in the last preceding paragraph; Smith v. Henning, 10 W. Va. 597; Hall v. Hall, 12 W. Va. 1; Patton v. Merchants' Bank, 12 W. Va. 607; Northwestern Bank v. Hays, 37 W. Va. 475, 16 S. E. Rep. 561; Withrow v. Smithson, 37 W. Va. 757, 17 S. E. Rep. 316; First Nat. Bank v. Hyer, 46 W. Va. 13, 32 S. E. Rep. 1000; Miller v. White, 46 W. Va. 67, 33 S. E. Rep. 332. See 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law 1047 et seq.; 12 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 114 et seq.

Same—On Estate of Living Person—Effect.—In laying down the proposition in the second paragraph of this foot-note, it was said that the order is "generally not void"; for there are—as laid down in the principal case—a few exceptions to this rule. In Scott v. McNeal, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1111, 154 U. S. 34, the principal case is cited as authority for one of these exceptions i. e. that administration granted on the estate of living person is void and not voidable.

Foreign Administrators—Suits by and against.—In Crumlish v. Shen. Val. R. Co., 40 W. Va. 650, 22 S. E. Rep. 99, it was said: "A foreign personal representative cannot sue or be sued outside the state granting him authority. Hull v. Hull, 26 W. Va. 15; Vaughan v. Northup, 15 Pet. 1; Bart. Ch. Prac. 152; Dickinson v. McCraw, 4 Rand. (Va.) 158; Story, Confl. Law, § 513; Dixon v. Ramsay, 3 Cranch 319; Fenwick v. Sears, 1 Cranch 259; 1 Lomax Ex'rs 121; 1 Rob. Prac. (new) 161; *Andrews v. had died leaving two slaves, and other personal property. That George W. Avory qualified as his administrator, and had paid all the debts and liabilities thereof, which was effected without the sale of his slaves. That the plaintiffs and George W. Avory and an infant brother and sister were the next of kin and entitled to the estate; that from the number of distributees and number of slaves, it was impossible to divide the latter, and they therefore pray for a sale, and a division of the proceeds. George W. Avory and the two infant children were made parties defendants.

There was an answer by George W.
231 Avory and the *infant children, by said Avory as their guardian ad litem, specially assigned them by the court, in which they admit the statements of the bill, and are willing that the court shall decree according to its prayer.

The cause was heard at the same term, when the court made a decree, by which George W. Avory was appointed a commissioner, and was directed to sell the slaves to the highest bidder, upon a credit of twelve months, collect the money when due, and after defraying the expenses attending the same, divide the balance into seven equal parts, and pay one to each of the distributees; and make report to the court in order to a final decree.

No other proceeding in the court seems to have been taken until May 1847, when there is an entry that, on the petition of Rebecca Avory, and three others, the plaintiffs in the suit, the plaintiff is required to amend his bill and make them party defendants; and the order of May 1840 was set aside, and the cause sent to the rules for further proceedings.

It was at the rules in May 1847 that the bill in the present case was filed. This bill, after stating the death of William T. Avory and the qualification of George W. Avory as his administrator, charged that William T. Avory was not at all indebted at the time of his death, yet the administrator had sold the whole estate, and had appropriated the proceeds to his own use. And it was charged that the slaves were sold by him under some pretended order obtained by him from the County court of Mecklenburg under some false pretext, without the knowledge or consent of the complainants; which order was afterwards set aside by the said court.

George W. Avory was proceeded against as an absent defendant; and it appears that he was insolvent. Spencer and Andrews answered the bill. They say that previous to the qualification of George 232 W. Avory *as administrator of William T. Avory, he had sold the perishable part of the estate of his intestate in North Carolina. They state the proceedings in the suit in the County court, the decree for the sale of the slaves, a copy of the record of which case they file as an exhibit; and insist that George W. Avory sold the slaves as commissioner of the court, in Clarkesville, with the knowledge of all the distributees, and in the presence of a part or all of the plaintiffs, one of whom purchased one of the slaves, gave his bond for the purchase money, and paid it to George W. Avory. And that the plaintiffs never made any objection to the proceeding until George W. Avory had become insolvent and had absconded.

The account was referred to a commissioner, who made a report charging the administrator with the personal property sold and debts collected in North Carolina, also with the price of the two slaves, and with the amount of a debt which one of the distributees who was examined as a witness, stated that he owed to the intestate and paid to the administrator.

The sureties excepted to the first charge, on the ground that these were North Carolina assets sold there, and that William T. Avory having died in North Carolina, and having no property in this state, the qualification as administrator here was void. To the second, on the same ground, and also on the ground that the slaves were not sold by George W. Avory as administrator, but as commissioner. And to the third charge, on the ground that the witness was a distributee, and therefore incompetent from interest to prove the charge: And although he had released his interest since his testimony was taken, that did not remove the objection to the evidence.

The evidence showed, that the personal property except the slaves was sold in North Carolina; and it did not appear whether or not there had been administration 233 *in that state on the estate of William T. Avory. The slaves were brought from North Carolina after the decree was made for their sale, and were sold at public auction in the town of Clarkesville in Mecklenburg county, and one of them was purchased by one of the distributees. It did not appear whether or not any other of the distributees were present.

The cause came on to be heard on the 15th day of September 1854, when the court held that George W. Avory was chargeable as administrator for the proceeds of the sale of the slaves; but that he was not chargeable with the debt testified to by one of the distributees; and therefore overruling the exceptions to the first and second charges, and sustaining the exception to the third charge; the court made a decree for the amount thus ascertained to be due from the administrator against George W. Avory, and his sureties in favor of the several distributees. From this decree Andrews, one of the sureties, applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

Thomas Howard and Grattan, for the appellant, insisted:

1. That the sureties were not liable for North Carolina assets. That the question was not whether a foreign administrator could be sued here, about which there was a diversity of opinion; Story's Conf. Laws, § 513; Vaughan v. Northup, 15 Peters' R. 1; Tunstall v. Pollard's adm'r, 11 Leigh 1;

3. That the slaves were never in the possession of George W. Avory in Virginia as administrator, but remained in North Carolina until after the decree of the court appointing him a commissioner to sell them. That a sale of the slaves not having been necessary to pay debts the administrator had no right to sell them. That the administrator is not made a party in 235 that suit. *That there is nothing in the record to authorize any charge of fraud or other impropriety in obtaining that decree. And therefore the sureties of the administrator are not responsible for the price of said slaves. They referred to Carrington v. Didier, 8 Gratt. 260; Boyce's ex'ors v. Grundy, 9 Peters' R. 275; McLaughlin v. Janney, 6 Gratt. 609.

Patton, for the appellees, insisted:

1st. That the decree for the sale of the slaves was procured by fraud; and that no report of the sale having been made or confirmed, the sale itself was not valid; and on either ground it was no protection to the sureties of the administrator, but they were responsible for them. He went into a critical examination of the record to show that no body had any thing to do with the suit but George W. Avory.

2d. That the sureties were liable for assets brought into this state from North Carolina; and especially where there has been no qualification in that state, as there was not in this case. And he asked how such assets were to be recovered if the administrator here was not liable, as it is almost the only settled principle that an administrator cannot sue in another state. Story's Conf. Laws, § 512, 513. And Story holds an administrator cannot be sued out of the jurisdiction within which he qualified; but this court has held that an executor may be sued who comes here with the assets. Tunstall v. Pollard, 11 Leigh 1. And his sureties are liable. Burnley v. Duke, 2 Rob. R. 102. And this case shows that whenever an administrator has received assets, his sureties will be liable for them; and the court will not enquire from whence they have been obtained.

3d. That the County court of Mecklenburg was a court of general jurisdiction over the subject of probates, and its acts 236 though voidable were not void. *That the General court granted administration even where there were no assets in the state, 1 Rev. Code of 1819, 377, 382; and this may be done by the court of the county where the party died, though there were no assets there, and they were abundant elsewhere: And further, that no body could say that there were no assets in the county of Mecklenburg where administration was granted in this case.

MONCURE, J. The first question which, in natural order, comes up for consideration in this case is, Whether the order of the County court of Mecklenburg, granting to George W. Avory administration on the estate of William T. Avory, was a void order, for want of jurisdiction in the court to make it?

It is now well settled, that the County court is a court of general jurisdiction in regard to probates and the grant of administrations; that it has jurisdiction in regard to the whole subject matter; and that though it may err in taking jurisdiction of a particular case, yet the order is generally not void, but only voidable on citation or appeal, and cannot be questioned in any collateral proceeding. Fisher v. Bassett, 9 Leigh 119; Burnley v. Duke, 2 Rob. R. 102; Schultz v. Schultz, 10 Gratt. 358; Cox, &c., v. Thomas' adm'x, 9 Id. 323; Hutcheson v. Priddy, 12 Id. 85. I say the order is generally not void; for there are one or two exceptions to the rule, if exceptions they can be called. As where the supposed testator or intestate is alive; or where, if dead, he has already a personal representative in being when the order is made, granting administration on his estate. If he be then alive, the order is of course void. And so also if he has already a personal representative, who stands in his place and is invested with all his rights of personal property in the state. Griffith v. Frazier, 8 Cranch's R. 9. There must be an office, and that office must be 237 vacant, in *order to a valid appointment of a personal representative. Until then there is in fact no "subject matter," to be within the jurisdiction of the court. That subject matter is, the appointment of a personal representative to a decedent who has none, and whose personal estate is therefore without an owner. The validity of an order making an appointment, must depend on the existence of that state of things. And though the court must enquire into these preliminary facts, and in some sense adjudge them, in every case in which it makes an appointment; yet the judgment, to that extent, is incidental and inconclusive. If in fact there be a decedent without a personal representative, an order of a court of general jurisdiction on that subject, appointing one, is as conclusive on the question of jurisdiction of the particular case, as on any other question arising in the case.

I do not understand the counsel of the appellant as denying the correctness of these principles in their application to a case in which some court in the state has jurisdiction, though not the court making the appointment. But I understand them as contending that they are not applicable to a case in which no court in the state has jurisdiction; and that this is such a case. They say the intestate resided and died in North Carolina, leaving no estate in Virginia, and therefore no court in Virginia had power to appoint an administrator. Suppose it to be true, that he did reside and die in North Carolina, leaving no estate in Virginia: would it follow that no court in Virginia had power to make the appointment? Had not the General court power to grant administration in such a case? As the law stood when the order in question was made, the General court had power to grant administration on the estate of any decedent who had not a personal representative in the state; no matter where he resided or died, or whether he left any estate in 238 the commonwealth *or not. 1 Rev. Code 1819, p. 377, § 12, 382, § 32. Therefore, as some court in the state had power to make the appointment, it would follow, if that were the test, that the order of the County court of Mecklenburg is not void.

But I consider these principles as applicable to every case of a decedent who is without a personal representative in the state; without regard to the question, whether any court in the state has jurisdiction of the particular case or not. The subject matter being within the jurisdiction of the court, to wit: the appointment of a personal representative to a decedent who is without one; the court making the appointment will be considered as having adjudged the question of jurisdiction in the particular case; and the order will not be void. Whether the court had jurisdiction in the particular case or not, may depend upon a variety of facts: as, whether the decedent resided in the county whose court made the order; or had land there; or died there; or had estate of any kind there. If, after passing upon these facts, and taking cognizance of the case, the order of the court could at any after period, in any collateral proceeding, be avoided by evidence that the decedent did not reside, or die, or leave estate in the commonwealth; all the inconvenience and other evils would be produced which are referred to in Fisher v. Bassett, and other cases before cited, and which are designed to be prevented by the principles laid down in those cases. In this case, the order was made in March 1840, the suit was brought in May 1847, no issue was raised by the pleadings in regard to the validity of the order, and the only evidence relied on to invalidate it is, that of a witness whose testimony was taken in 1849, and who states that the decedent lived and died in the county of Granville in the state of North Carolina, and that all his property was in that county. How 239 *could he know that all the decedent's property was there? that he had not a particle of property, nor a dollar due to him any where in Virginia? How could any body be expected to know, or be able to prove at that remote period, what were the facts on which the County court of Mecklenburg took jurisdiction of the case? Can the judgment of a court of general jurisdiction over the subject matter be overthrown by testimony like this, taken nine years after the judgment, and in a collateral proceeding?

While great evils would result from holding an order appointing an administrator of a decedent who lived and died out of the state and owned no property therein to be void; none whatever would result from holding the contrary. There can be no evil in appointing an administrator of a decedent who has no property. Indeed, nothing is more common; and it is often convenient if not necessary to do so, to carry on a suit to which he may be a proper party. That the decedent lived and died out of the state, makes no difference. If a non-resident owning no property happen to die here, the court of the county in which he dies is expressly authorized to appoint an administrator.

I therefore think the order in question was not a void order.

The next question to be considered is, Whether the sureties of the administrator are responsible for assets of the intestate which were situated at his death in the county of Granville in North Carolina, but after his death were brought to the county of Mecklenburg in Virginia, and there treated and held as assets by the administrator.

It is now well settled that a grant of administration has no legal operation out of the state from whose jurisdiction it was derived; and that an executor or administrator appointed in one state, is not, in virtue of such appointment, entitled 240 to sue, nor is he liable *to be sued, in his official capacity, in any other state or country. Story on Confl. Laws, § 514. There are some apparent exceptions to this rule, though they are not really so. In equity, an executor or administrator is sometimes liable to be sued in another state or country, under the peculiar circumstances of the case; as in Powell v. Stratton, 11 Gratt. 792; and sometimes to avoid a failure of justice; as in Tunstall v. Pollard's adm'r, 11 Leigh 1, and other cases cited in 1 Rob. Pr. (new) p. 178 and 192. In these cases it cannot be said that the suit is against him in his official capacity, but on the ground of a personal trust, which makes him liable, under certain circumstances, to account in a court of equity, where he may be found, to those entitled to the estate, wherever it may be situate. Governor v. Williams, 3 Ired. R. 152. So also, if an executor or administrator reduce property of his testator or intestate into possession, he may afterwards sue for it in another state, even at law; but the suit must be brought in his own name, and not in his official capacity. He is, to all intents and purposes, the legal owner of the property, though for the benefit of other persons. Story's Confl. Laws, § 516; 1 Lomax on Ex'ors, 341, marg.

In order, therefore, to reduce the assets into possession, and close the administration and distribution of a decedent's estate, it is generally necessary that there should be a personal representative in every state in which the assets may be situate. They are subject to the payment of debts according to the law of the situs, but to distribution according to the law of the domicil. It is therefore a matter of convenience that the surplus of the assets remaining in the hands of a local administrator after the payment of debts, should be sent home, that is, to the domiciliary administrator, for distribution. And this seems to be the course generally pursued; though 241 the distribution may be made *by the local administrator. Whether the one course or the other will be pursued in any particular case, depends upon the local law and the judicial discretion of the local court. If the surplus be paid over to the domiciliary administrator, it is matter of national comity and not of right. Every state is bound, to the extent of its power, to take care of the rights of its own citizens. And therefore it will see that the estate of a decedent within its jurisdiction is properly applied to the satisfaction of their rightful claims, whether as creditors, legatees or distributees of the decedent. But those claims being satisfied, it has no longer any motive to retain the fund, and will not, unless it be more convenient to dispose of the subject fully and finally, than to send it home for that purpose. If none of the citizens of the state have any claim upon the fund, either as creditors, legatees or distributees, and the aid of its courts be not invoked by a foreign claimant, it will have no motive to interfere with the fund, or prevent the domiciliary administrator from obtaining possession of it if he can. Of course he cannot sue for it, and if he cannot obtain possession otherwise, he or some person else must become local administrator. He will be preferred to any person else, as he will have the ultimate receipt and distribution of the fund.

But it very often happens, and especially in the United States, where there are so many states adjacent to each other, separated only by an imaginary line, and where there is so much commercial and social intercourse between the citizens of different states, and such frequent changes of residence from one state to another, that an administrator in one state receives property or money belonging to his intestate in another, without any administration being taken there, and holds it in his own state as assets of his intestate. And it sometimes, if not very often, happens that 242 property *of a decedent is carried, or one of his debtors removes, from a state in which there is no administrator, to another in which there is one, and the property or debt is received and held as assets by the administrator there. Can it be contended that the sureties of the administrator are not liable for property or money so received and held by him as assets? Does it lie in their mouths any more than in his, to deny that they are what he, by his act has affirmed them to be? Is it enough for them to say that their principal could not have recovered the property or money, if the person having possession had refused to deliver or pay to him? that such person may be liable to deliver or pay it over again to a local administrator, if one should be hereafter appointed? that the grant of administration, and the condition of the administration bond are confined to property which actually belonged to the decedent, and was situated at the time of his death within the limits of the jurisdiction which made the grant? I think not. The terms of the administration bond expressly apply to all the goods, chattels and credits of the decedent which shall come to the hands of the administrator. We have seen that a domiciliary administrator generally receives any surplus remaining in the hands of a local administrator on the settlement of the account of the latter. And if the same person be, as he often is, both domiciliary and ancillary administrator, while he is first accountable in either character according as he receives assets in one or the other, it is his duty to pass over the surplus remaining in his hands as ancillary, to his hands as domiciliary administrator. Are not his sureties as domiciliary administrator liable for the surplus so received or passed over? In Adams' heirs v. Adams' administrator, 11 B. Monr. 77, the sureties of a person as ancillary administrator were discharged from liability for assets received in that character, on the ground that

243 he should be regarded as *holding them as domiciliary administrator. If they were properly discharged, his sureties as domiciliary administrator were of course chargeable. See 1 Rob. Pr. (new) 189, § 4, and cases cited. There is no difference between the form of the grant and bond in the case of a domiciliary, and in the case of an ancillary administration. And if the former may operate upon assets received and held by the administrator as such within the state, though situated abroad at the decedent's death, why may not the latter? In the case before stated, of property of a decedent being carried, or one of his debtors removing, from a state in which there is no administrator, to another, in which there is one, I do not see how the estate of the decedent could ever get the benefit of the property or money, unless it could be recovered by the administrator in the state to which it is removed, because there is no other administrator; and if one should be appointed, he could not, as we have seen, sue as such in another state. I know of no exception to that rule. It is true that the title of an administrator relates back to the death of his intestate, so as to enable him to sue for causes of action arising between that period and the date of his appointment. But he must in such a case, I think, sue in his capacity of administrator, and not in his own right. When he has once acquired actual possession of the property, he has then a legal title to it, which he can thereafter assert in his own name. Story's Confl. Laws, § 516. He must of course sue in his capacity of administrator for cause of action accruing in the lifetime of his intestate.

It would hardly be contended that where, in an ordinary case, an administrator as such sues for, recovers and receives, or demands and receives without suit, property or money, and holds it as assets of his intestate, the sureties of the administrator could exonerate themselves from liability therefor, merely by showing

244 *that it did not in fact belong to the intestate. A fortiori, it would seem they could not, merely by showing that though such property or money did in fact belong to the intestate, yet it ought to have been received by some other administrator in some other state, who may never have been appointed; or, if appointed, may never have claimed it, or even been entitled to sue for and recover it. In Burnley v. Duke, 2 Rob. R. 102, it was held, that though an administrator de bonis non cannot recover of a former administrator assets converted by him (because they are not unadministered assets, and therefore not within the scope of the commission of the administrator de bonis non), yet if he actually receive them, he and his sureties are accountable therefor. In that case, if the sureties of the administrator de bonis non had not been responsible, the sureties of the original administrator would have been. The question was, which of two sets of sureties was responsible? One or the other certainly was; and in either aspect, those entitled to the estate had an ample and effective remedy. It would seem to be still more reasonable to hold the sureties of an administrator responsible for assets received by him as such, when those entitled to the estate would otherwise have no security whatever. The bond of an administrator de bonis non is expressly limited to the assets which are unadministered, while the bond of an original administrator is unlimited in its terms, and extends to all the assets which may come to the hands of the administrator. If the sureties of the former are liable for assets received by their principal, though derived from a subject not embraced by the limited terms of their bond, why are not the sureties of the latter liable for assets received by their principal, and therefore embraced by the general terms of their bond, though derived from a subject at one time situated out of the state? I think that wherever an ad-

245 ministrator *receives or holds within the state in which he was appointed, property or money as assets of his intestate, he and his sureties are accountable therefor as assets, unless it be clearly proved that such property or money belongs to some other person to whom the administrator, personally, has accounted, or will have to account for the same.

I have examined, I believe, all the cases referred to in the argument on this branch of the case, and I am not aware that there is one of them in conflict with the conclusion to which I have come; though there are dicta in some of them which may be so. Without undertaking to review them, I will notice only the case of Fletcher's adm'r v. Sanders, 7 Dana's R. 345, which is perhaps the strongest case cited by the counsel of the appellant in support of their view. In that case it was held, that the surety of an executor to whom letters testamentary were granted in Kentucky (which however was not the place of the testator's domicil at the time of his death), was not responsible for assets received in a foreign state and never brought to Kentucky. Upon the ground that they were never brought to Kentucky, the opinion of the court was expressly placed. And even in that opinion, one of the three judges who composed the court, did not concur. Most of the cases on this subject, and no doubt all that are material, are cited and commented upon in Story's Confl. Laws, § 507–529; and in 1 Rob. Pr. (new) p. 159–194.

I have stated my opinion as to the principles of law which seem to be applicable to this case; and it now only remains, so far as this branch of it is concerned, to apply them to the facts of the case; which can be easily done. In 1840 William T. Avory died in Granville county, North Carolina, intestate, unmarried and without issue, leaving a small personal estate in that county, and no estate, so far as the

of whom (except perhaps one sister, who may have resided with her husband in North Carolina), seem to have resided in Mecklenburg county, Virginia, which adjoins Granville county, North Carolina. His debts were very few in number and small in amount, and most of them were probably due in Virginia. He had lived in Granville county but a year before his death, and doubtless had removed to that county from Mecklenburg, Virginia, where the rest of the family resided. His brother, George W. Avory, who lived with his mother at the time of his death, and for several years thereafter, and was guardian of several of the distributees, who were infants, qualified as his administrator soon after his death, to wit, in March 1840, in the County court of Mecklenburg, giving the usual bond with surety in the penalty of four thousand dollars. He immediately took possession of the property in North Carolina, and held it, or its proceeds, in Virginia, as assets of his intestate. The perishable property was sold by him in May 1840, about two months after he qualified, on a credit of twelve months, the bonds being taken payable to himself as administrator. Whether the sale was in Virginia or North Carolina does not appear. The slaves were sold in Virginia in July 1840, under a decree of the County court of Mecklenburg, made in May 1840. He received a debt due to his intestate, but whether he received it in the one state or the other, does not appear. It does not appear that any person ever administered in North Carolina, or had any interest in having administration granted there. It is extremely probable, from all the circumstances, that the contrary is the fact, and that it was deemed to be best by the parties concerned, to have but one administration, and to have that in Virginia, where all, or nearly all, the distributees and 247 creditors *resided. Upon this state of facts I have no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the sureties of the administrator became responsible for the assets so received and held by him in Virginia, though situate, at the death of his intestate, in North Carolina.

The next question to be considered is, Whether the sureties of the administrator have been discharged from that liability as to the slaves belonging to the estate of the intestate, by reason of the decree of the County court of Mecklenburg, made in May 1840, appointing George W. Avory commissioner to sell the said slaves, divide the proceeds among the distributees, and by reason of the sale made under that decree and the other circumstances of the case?

I think this question must be answered in the affirmative. The slaves were not required for the payment of debts, and the administrator had therefore no right to sell them. He was willing at once to surrender them to the distributees for partition, and did in effect do so. He was himself a distributee, and was guardian of two others. The slaves could not be divided in kind, and a sale was therefore necessary for the purpose of division. But some of the distributees were infants, and a decree for a sale was therefore obtained. That decree was made in a suit to which George W. Avory and his two wards were defendants, and all the other distributees were plaintiffs. George W. Avory was not a party to the suit as administrator, thus showing that he had, in effect, surrendered the slaves to the distributees for partition. The bill alleges that he had paid all the debts of his intestate without a sale of any of the slaves, and prays for a decree for a sale of the slaves and division of the proceeds. The defendants answered the bill, admitting its allegations, and expressing their willingness that the court should decree according to the prayer thereof. And a decree was accordingly made. Shortly after 248 *the decree, to wit, on the 1st of July 1840, the sale was made by George W. Avory as commissioner, at public auction, on a credit of twelve months, as prescribed by the decree; at which sale he purchased one of the slaves, and another distributee the other. No report of the sale was made, and no other order appears to have been made in the suit until May 1847, about the time of the institution of this suit, when, on the petition of the plaintiffs, the order of sale made seven years before was set aside. The record does not contain a copy of the petition, if it was in writing, nor show the grounds of it. Nor does it appear that the administrator or his sureties had any notice of the petition or motion to set aside the order of sale. The bill in this suit, which was filed by the same persons who were plaintiffs in the suit for the sale of the slaves, alleges that "the slaves were sold by the administrator under a pretended order obtained by him from the County court of Mecklenburg, under some false pretext, without the knowledge or consent of the complainants, and which order was afterwards set aside by the said court." The administrator, being a non-resident of the state, and it seems insolvent also, never answered the bill. The sureties in their answer rely upon the suit and decree for the sale of the slaves, and the proceedings under the decree, for their exoneration from any liability on account of the slaves. There is no proof in the record to sustain the vague allegation contained in the bill of fraud on the part of the administrator in obtaining the order of sale. It devolved on the plaintiffs to prove it. The sureties do not admit it in their answer, though they do not in terms deny it, doubtless because they had no information on the subject. But the circumstances of the case strongly tend to disprove the allegation. The sale was made at public auction, in the neighborhood of the distributees, one of 249 whom (besides the commissioner *him self) was a purchaser at the sale, and none of whom complained of it until seven years after, when the commissioner had become insolvent and left the state. There is no such irregularity, if any, on the face of the proceedings as avoids the decree for the sale of the slaves. It must be regarded then as a valid decree at the time it was made; and the effect of it was, to take the slaves out of the hands of George W. Avory as administrator, and place them in his hands as commissioner of the court. The sureties of the administrator were thereby as completely discharged from liability as they would have been if the administrator and commissioner had been different persons, and the former had delivered the slaves to the latter under the decree. That liability being once discharged, was not revived by the order made seven years thereafter setting the decree aside; whether that order was regularly made, or was itself valid, or not; a question which it is therefore unnecessary to determine.

The only other question which it will be necessary to notice is as to the propriety of charging the administrator and his sureties with the amount of the bond of Henry W. Avory to the intestate for two hundred and fifty-four dollars and twenty-eight cents, due 1st March 1839. I concur in the opinion of the Circuit court upon that question, and for the reason expressed in the opinion, to wit, "the payment of the same having been proved by one of the persons interested therein as distributee, and his deposition never having been taken in the cause, since the release of said interest, to prove said payment."

The result of my opinion is, that the administrator is chargeable to the distributees in the sum of six hundred and sixty-seven dollars and eleven cents, with interest on four hundred and fifty-five dollars and thirty-six cents, part thereof, from 250 September 1, 1848, being *the balance due on his administration account, without charging him with the proceeds of the sale of the slaves. The decree should therefore be reversed with costs, and a decree entered in conformity with this opinion.

251 *Dunlop & als. v. Harrison's Ex'ors & als.

January Term, 1858. Richmond.

Wills—Bequest of Slaves in Trust for Free Negroes—Case at Bar.—Testator having given by his will a large real estate and also annuities to certain free negroes, then says, "It is my will and desire that my executors hold all the residue of my estate, as trustees for the support and maintenance of Frankey Miles, Laurena Anderson and Ann Maria Jackson, and the children of Ann Maria and Laurena," &c. "And should it be necessary in carrying out this clause of my will to sell my slaves, I desire my executors to sell them privately or publicly as may seem best, selecting them good homes and good masters." The three legatees are free negroes, and about eighty slaves are included in this residue of testator's estate. HELD:

1. Same—Same—Effect.—That the slaves included in the residue cannot be held in trust for the free negroes, as they cannot be held directly by them.
2. Same—Alternative Provision—One Illegal—Effect on the Other.†—That though the provision that the slaves shall be held in trust by the executors for the free negroes is illegal, the provision that if necessary the slaves shall be sold, is not invalidated by the illegal provision; but is legal and valid: and the free negroes shall take the proceeds of the slaves.
3. Same—Bequest of Residue—Words Denoting Object of Bequest—Effect.‡—The whole property in the residue being given to the executors in trust, the addition of the words, "for the support and maintenance of the beneficiaries," does not limit the bequest to that object, but the whole beneficial interest passes to the free negroes.

This was a bill filed in the Circuit court of Amelia county by the heirs and next of kin of Nathaniel Harrison deceased, against his executors, devisees and legatees, seeking to set aside certain provisions of his will, and to have him declared intestate as to the subjects embraced in these provisions.

Nathaniel Harrison died intestate and unmarried, in the summer of 1852, having made a will which bore date in July of that year, and which was duly admitted to probate in the County court of Amelia. The executors therein named, William H.
252 Harrison and *Samuel S. Weisiger, qualified as such, and took upon them the burden of the administration.

By the first clause of the will the testator directs his debts to be paid. By the second, third and fourth clauses he gives to Frankey Miles, to Ann Maria Jackson and Laurena Anderson, each, a tract of land by metes and bounds; and by the fifth clause he gives a tract of land to Edwin Harrison's four youngest children, then in being, and any others that might be born after the date of his will. By the sixth clause of his will he gives to his executors in trust for the support and maintenance of Edwin Harrison's four youngest children, or any other after-born child of his, the sum of one hundred dollars for each child; and if the legislature should pass a law requiring said children to leave the state, he directs his executors to pay each of said children one hundred dollars. By the seventh clause he directs his executors to pay Frankey Miles six hundred dollars a year as an annuity during her life; and by the eighth and ninth clauses he directs his executors to pay to Laurena Anderson and Ann Maria Jackson each the sum of two hundred and fifty dollars a year during their lives: and if they should be required to leave the state, the executors were to pay each of them two hundred and fifty dollars in lieu of said annuity. By the tenth clause he gives to these three women all his household and kitchen furniture, to be equally divided among them. The eleventh clause of the will, which was the great subject of controversy, is in these words:

"Item 11th. It is my will and desire that my executors hold all the residue of my estate, as trustees, for the support and maintenance of Frankey Miles, Laurena Anderson and Ann Maria Jackson, and the children of Ann Maria and Laurena, free from all debts and liabilities of the husbands of said Ann Maria and Laurena; and in the event of their being required to 253 *leave the state, I desire the said residue of my estate to be equally divided amongst Frankey Miles, Laurena Anderson and Ann Maria Jackson. And should it be necessary in carrying out this clause of my will, to sell my slaves, I desire my executors to sell them privately or publicly, as may seem to them best, selecting them good homes and good masters."

The estate of the testator consisted of about twenty-five hundred acres of land, eighty-four slaves, the usual amount of stock, crops and perishable property found on estates of that size, and about eighteen thousand dollars in money and bonds. He owed about from three to five thousand dollars; and as executor of his brother he was indebted to his testator's estate from eight to ten thousand dollars. Of the devisees and legatees Frankey Miles was a free woman of color, Laurena Anderson and Ann Maria Jackson were her daughters, and the others were her grandchildren by one of her sons. Laurena Anderson and Ann Maria Jackson were the reputed children of the testator; and the slaves disposed of in the eleventh clause of the will were neither husbands, wives or parents of the said legatees.

The cause came on to be heard on the 5th of April 1855, when the court dismissed the bill with costs. Whereupon the plaintiffs applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

Jones and C. Robinson, for the appellants, insisted:

1st. That by the statute the free negroes could not take the slaves. Code, ch. 103, § 4, p. 458.

2d. That the bequest to trustees was on the same footing as a bequest to the free negroes, and was equally void. Commonwealth v. Martin's ex'ors, 5 Munf. 117, 143; Bass v. Scott, 2 Leigh 356; Trotter v. Blacker, 6 Porter's R. 269; Craig

3d. That it being clear that the bequest of the slaves to the free negroes, whether directly or in trust, is void; the provision for a sale in the last clause in the 11th item of the will, does not render the bequest valid. Because, 1st. It does not authorize a sale for a general conversion, but only in the event that the legatees should be compelled to leave the state. And 2d. Because it could only be valid on the doctrine of conversion; and, on the principles of that doctrine, it is necessary that the sale should be required to take place certainly and under all circumstances, which was not the case here. They referred to Curtis v. Hutton, 14 Ves. R. 537; 2 Story's Eq. Jur. § 1214; Smith v. Claxton, 4 Madd. R. 484; Barker v. May, 9 Barn. & Cress. R. 489, 17 Eng. C. L. R. 426; Heth v. Rich. Trustees of Methodist Church, 1 Hoffman's Ch. R. 202; Arnold v. Gilbert, 3 Sandf. Ch. R. 531; Davenport v. Coltman, 35 Eng. Ch. R. 516.

4th. That the residuum having been given for the support and maintenance of the legatees, the extent of the bequest was limited by its object; and therefore an enquiry should have been directed to ascertain whether the whole property was necessary. They referred to Dinsmore v. Biggert, 9 Barr's P. R. 133; Liptrot v. Holmes, 1 Kelly's R. 381.

255 *Macfarland, Davis and Patton, for the appellees, insisted:

1st. That though it were true that the bequest of the slaves to the free negroes either directly or to trustees for their benefit is null and void; yet this testator contemplating that such might be the case, had provided in express terms, for a sale of the slaves, if that should turn out to be the case, for the purpose of carrying into effect his intention in favor of his legatees: And they examined the will to show that this was the real object of the last clause of the 11th item. They denied that the doctrine of election had any application to the case; and insisted that it was a case of alternative provisions in which the testator looking to the possibility that the provision which he preferred was not legal, had provided for that event by another provision, of the legality of which there could be no doubt. To show that such an alternative provision is valid, they referred to Foone v. Blount, 2 Copp. R. 464; Hubbard v. Goodwin, 3 Leigh 492; The Commonwealth v. Selden, 5 Munf. 160; 2 Wms. 2d. That though the property is given for the support and maintenance of the lega-tees, the whole property is given, and obviously the intention was to give the whole; and where that is the case, it is well settled that the whole passes. Paxton v. McLemore, 2 Dev. & Bat. Equ. R. 285; Webb v. Kelly, 16 Eng. Ch. R. 1st part, 470; 2 Roper Leg. 1438 to 1443, 1474, 1477; 3 Bacon's Abr. 796, title Papist; 2 Lomax Ex'ors 71, 73.

LEE, J. The doctrine of "constructive conversion" which has been somewhat discussed by the counsel has, I think, no application to the present case in the 256 *sense in which it is usually accepted and applied by courts of equity, and with the incidents which attend it in the view of those courts. The will in question here does not direct lands to be converted into money nor money into lands, but provides only for the conversion of a particular kind of personal property into money upon a supposed contingency which it specifies. Nor, as I shall endeavor to show hereafter, have the legatees for whom the benefit of that property is intended, any election in regard to the form in which they shall enjoy it. If they can only take it, supposing that they can take it at all in the form of money, no right of election to take it in any other can be cast upon them. The decision of the cause must depend upon the construction which is to be placed upon the provisions of the will, and from this their legal operation and effect is to be deduced. To determine the construction then which the will is to receive we are to enquire what was the meaning and intention of the testator, and whether that intention, if the same can be ascertained, was lawful in any form which it might be made to assume consistently with the terms of the will. If the intention of the testator is sufficiently indicated, and if it can in any way under the provisions of the will be reconciled with the law and its policy, it must be fully effectuated. And although a particular mode which the testator may have pointed out for carrying his wishes into effect be found impracticable or illegal, yet if he have also indicated another and alternative mode which is practicable and legal, his intention shall be carried into effect by means of the latter. And where the general intent of the testator can be seen, it must be carried into effect as far as it can be if it cannot take effect to the full extent; and this though it may be at the expense of the particular intent which cannot be effectuated because the testator has attempted to give it effect in a way not 257 *permitted by the law. Ram on Wills, ch. 13; 2 Lomax Ex'ors 6, 11; 2 Jarm. Wills 528; Pitt v. Jackson, 2 Bro. C. C. 51; Thelusson v. Woodford, 4 Ves. R. 227, 325; Humberston v. Humberston, 1 P. Wms. 332; Chapman v. Brown, 3 Burr. R. 1626; Finday v. Riddle, 3 Binn. R. 139, 162; Barlett v. King, 12 Mass. R. 537; Inglis v. The Trustees of Sailor's Snug Harbor, 3 Peters' R. 99; Literary Fund v. Dawson, 10 Leigh 147.

Now in this case the general intent of the testator is perfectly apparent and unmistakable. It was that the three free negro women, Frankey, Ann and Laurena should have the benefit of his whole estate real and personal including his slaves, excepting the piece of land given to the children of Edwin Harrison and so much more of his estate as would be necessary for their support and maintenance. He gives to each of these women a tract of land described in the will; to the woman Frankey an annuity of six hundred dollars during her life, and to Laurena and Ann, each, an annuity of two hundred and fifty dollars, during their lives respectively, unless they should be required by some law to leave the state; and in that event they were to receive, each, the sum of two hundred and fifty dollars in lieu of the annuities. He gives to them also all his household and kitchen furniture. He then directs that his executors shall hold all the residue of his estate as trustees for the support and maintenance of the same three women and the children of Ann and Laurena, free from liability for the debts of the husbands of the two last named; and in the event of their being required to leave the state, he directs the residue to be equally divided amongst the same three women. And the next clause of the same item (to which I shall advert more particularly hereafter) shows that he expressly designed his slaves to be embraced in the devise of the residue, and that the 258 women *named should have the benefit of that species of property belonging to him as well as of the real estate and annuities previously given.

It is very manifest then that the testator intended the three women named should have the enjoyment of his whole estate (excepting the portion set apart for the children of Edwin Harrison), including his slaves. This was the general intent. Coming to the particular intent and the mode in which it was to be enjoyed, it was his will and desire that it should be held by his executors as trustees for their support and that of the children of Ann and Laurena. Now by our statute it is expressly provided that no free negro shall be capable of acquiring (except by descent) any slave other than the husband, wife, parent or descendant of such free negro. Code, ch. 104, § 4, p. 458. And I cannot concur with the counsel who has argued that although a free negro may not take slaves by devise directly, yet that he may take the use of slaves the legal title to which is devised to a white person in trust for his benefit. What the free negro cannot take directly he cannot be permitted to take indirectly; and I consider that it would be as much in violation of the spirit and policy of the law to permit the free negro to have a property in the trust in such a case as it would be against its letter for him to hold the slaves in his own right under a direct bequest. Such a trust would be equivalent to the legal ownership governed by the same rules and subject to the same charges. Per Roane,

J., Commonwealth v. Martin's ex'ors, 5 Munf. 117, 143; Bass v. Scott, 2 Leigh 356. And per Tucker, P., Hubbard v. Goodwin, 3 Leigh 492, 515. The disability of the free negro in this respect may be likened to that of the slave to acquire property in any thing; and the latter can no more acquire a property by way of trust than he can take the legal estate in the subject. Trotter v. Blocher, 6 Port. R. 269. See also 259 *Smith's adm'r v. Betty, &c., 11 Gratt. 752. And it somewhat resembles that of an alien as to real estate who cannot take by devise whether made directly or by way of a trust. Hubbard v. Goodwin, 3 Leigh 492. And if the case rested here, I should feel little hesitation in saying that the gift of the trust in the slaves to the three free negroes was of no more validity than a direct gift of the slaves themselves, and that the bequest must therefore fail, and the testator be declared intestate as to the slaves. But this is not all. The testator proceeds in the same (the 11th) item of his will to declare that "should it be necessary in carrying out this clause of my will, to sell my slaves, I desire my executors to sell them privately or publicly as may seem to them best, selecting them good homes and good masters." Now although the legatees because of their status could not take the slaves either directly or by means of a trust, there is nothing in the law or its policy to forbid their taking their value in money. They are permitted to acquire and hold all other kinds of property, and may take even slaves by descent, or by purchase where the purchaser stands in one of the relations to the slave specified in the statute. To deny the general power to acquire slaves was as far as the legislature thought proper to go. It was never intended to forbid the free negro to take the value of slaves in money or other property. We have then the case of an alternative provision in a will by which the testator has taken care that his general intent shall be carried into effect in some form if that which he had already indicated, and which he no doubt preferred, should for any cause be found impracticable. To this surely there can be no just objection. Alternative provisions in wills to provide for the failure of the principal bequests are of very common occurrence. We have an instance in the case already cited of the Literary Fund v. Dawson, 10 Leigh 147. There
260 the *testator provided for the failure of the devise contained in the sixteenth clause of his will, by directing in the seventeenth another and different disposition of the same property devised in the sixteenth. And the sixteenth clause being declared void by reason of the uncertainty of the beneficiaries, the seventeenth was set up and the disposition of the subject made thereby directed to be carried into effect. So in the case of Inglis v. The Trustees of Sailor's Snug Harbor, 3 Peters' R. 99, already cited, it was held that although the intention of the testator could not be carried into effect in the mode first contemplated, yet that there was an alternative provision which with the aid of an act of the legislature, would remove the difficulty and give effect to the general intent. In this case the beneficiaries cannot take the subject intended for them in the form of slave property, either directly or by way of trust. But the testator has also provided that if a sale of the slaves shall be necessary in order to give effect to his intention, they shall be sold. Why then shall his intention not be effectuated by a sale of the slaves and a division of the proceeds, in a form in which they can take, among the objects of his bounty? It is said that it would be violative of the policy of the law to divide the proceeds of the sale of slaves amongst free negroes; and it might be contended I presume with equal force that the annuities given by the will would also be void because the estate would be insufficient to pay them without a resort to the slaves. I cannot concur in this reasoning. I do not see how the policy of the law is interfered with by suffering the free negroes to take the money arising from the sale of the slaves. The object of the law is probably to keep slaves as far as possible under the control of white men only, and prevent free negroes from holding persons of their own race and color in personal subjection to themselves. Perhaps also 261 it intended *to evince the distinctive superiority of the white race. To forbid free negroes from taking money by bequest because it may have come from a sale of the slaves of the testator could not, that I can see, promote the object had in view, nor can I see any such prohibition in the law or its policy. The case decided by Judge Robertson as stated by the counsel differed materially from the case before us. There was a devise of slaves directly to a free negro, but there was no alternative provision in case the former could not be carried into effect. The devise was simply and absolutely void, and the free negro could take nothing under it whatever; and therefore although the slaves were sold for payment of debts and there was a surplus, the free negro could not claim under a void devise. Here, the right to the proceeds does not depend upon a void provision, but upon one which is rendered fully effectual as to the slaves by the plain direction to the executors to convert them into a form in which the beneficiaries may lawfully take the benefit of the devise.

But it is said that the necessity to sell which the testator had in mind, was not to overcome the disability of the free negroes to take the slaves as such, but that which might be found to exist for the purpose of paying debts or to make an equal division of the property among the three women in the event of their being required to leave the state. It could hardly have been to provide for a deficiency to meet the debts. The testator could scarcely have been ignorant that it was unnecessary to give authority to his executors to sell his slaves or a part of them, if the debts rendered it necessary, and the direction is not for sale of such part of the slaves as might be necessary to meet a deficiency of the other assets; the language is "to sell my slaves," evidently meaning the whole. The sale he was 262 contemplating was a sale *that might be found necessary "in carrying out this clause" of the will, and in that clause no allusion whatever is made to his debts. Nor is there any sufficient reason for restricting the meaning of the testator to the necessity of a sale for the purpose of making partition if the free negroes should be required to leave the state. In point of fact there would be no absolute necessity for a sale if those persons did leave the state, because their respective shares might still be held by the trustees for their benefit and the profits accounted for to them, though in that event it certainly would have been much more convenient, and the testator may have designed that they should be sold. But he did not mean only in that event. If he had so intended why not say "And should said women be required to leave the state, then I desire my executors to sell my slaves &c." His language is "And should it be necessary in carrying out this clause of my will &c." He did not mean by the term "clause" only that sentence in which he spoke of the women being required to leave the state, but evidently meant the whole eleventh item or article of his will. That such was the sense in which he used that word is I think perfectly clear, and it is of little importance to enquire what may be its exact philological signification.

The act forbidding the acquisition of slaves by free negroes passed in 1832, and the testator may or may not have known there was such a law. That he bequeathed his slaves to trustees for the benefit of the three women instead of giving them directly is not conclusive that he knew of this law or meant to evade its provisions. For he gave all the residue of his estate as well as the slaves to the trustees for the same purpose, and the slaves are given as part of the residue. But if, as is most probable, he did know there was such a law, he might have supposed that although 263 *he could not give the slaves directly, yet that the law did not intend to prohibit a gift to white persons as trustees who should hold the legal title to the slaves and have the personal control of them but should give to the free negroes designed to be the objects of his bounty, the benefit and profits of their labor. Nor can it be a matter of surprise if he should have so thought, when as we have seen, counsel learned in the law have argued with earnestness and ingenuity that such is the true construction of the statute. He might very well have had doubts upon this point, and surely it may be permitted to a testator under such circumstances to guard against his possible mistake or ignorance of the law by providing some other mode in which those who were the objects of his bounty might enjoy what he desired to give if that which he preferred should prove to be impracticable or illegal. Indeed the most unbounded indulgence has been shown by the courts to the ignorance, unskillfulness and negligence of testators, and judges have even shown themselves astute in averting their effects. A testator is regarded as inops consilii, and every allowance will be made for his want of better knowledge of the rules of law as well as those of grammar and orthography. Where he may have obscured his meaning by conflicting expressions, his intention is to be sought rather in a rational and consistent than an irrational and inconsistent purpose. And if the will may admit of more than one construction that is to be preferred which will render it valid and effectual, ut res magis valeat quam pereat. 1 Jarm. Wills 318; Jenkins v. Herries, 4 Madd. R. 67; Ram. on Wills (8 Law Lib.), ch. 4, p. 422; 2 Jarm. Wills 522, 526.

But whether the testator knew of the existence of this law and attempted to evade its provisions, or not, or whether he had in mind the possibility of a sale being necessary to enable the free negroes to en-264 joy his *bounty or not, are matters of very little importance. That he might have attempted to dispose of his property in a mode not sanctioned by the law, is no reason why he should not be allowed to dispose of it in a manner that the law will sanction if he has taken care to insert a provision which may have that effect. Nor is it material what may have been the necessity for a sale that crossed his mind when he made the provision in question, or whether he may have thought such necessity might arise from different causes, or whether in fact it may exist for more reasons than one. He has used language broad enough and strong enough to embrace the necessity for such a sale arising from the total and absolute disability of the beneficiaries to take the bounty intended for them by any other means or in any other mode. And certainly there could be no more urgent and imperious necessity for a sale than that arising from such disability; and although the will does not say in totidem verbis that in case of such necessity the executors shall sell and divide the proceeds amongst these residuary legatees, yet such is the necessary and inevitable implication from the language employed, and no express provision to that effect could render the intention clearer.

But it is asked who is to judge of the necessity and when and how it is to arise? And it is said the executors might collude with the free negroes to evade the law by holding the slaves on the pretence that they were converted into money and that there will be no one interested to sue and carry out the policy of the law.

It is the duty of the executors to construe the will and carry out the intention of the testator by selling the negroes and applying the proceeds as he has directed, as they cannot lawfully do so in any other mode. They were authorized and it was their duty to sell the slaves at once as the will in

265 effect required *an immediate sale in order to carry the intention of the testator into effect. But to meet the exigencies of the will equity will if necessary regard the slaves as absolutely converted into money and will deny to the legatees any election in the matter. The doctrine is inapplicable to the case because the free negroes are incapable of taking the slaves and no election is to be forced on a party for the purpose of creating a forfeiture. Foone v. Blount, Cowp. R. 464; Walker v. Denne, 2 Ves. jr. R. 170; Commonwealth v. Martin's ex'ors, 5 Munf. 117, 127, per Coalter, J.; Hubbard v. Goodwin, 3 Leigh 492, 513, Judge Tucker's opinion; Craig v. Leslie, 3 Wheat. R. 563. The first of these cases involved the right of a creditor who was a papist to have payment of his debt against the testatrix out of the proceeds of real estate directed to be sold by the will for payment of debts, and the last three concerned the rights of aliens in respect of real estate, but they furnish an illustration by analogy bearing strongly upon the rights of the legatees under the will in this case. If the executors entertained doubts as to the true construction of the will it was their right and their duty to apply to the proper court to construe the will for them and direct them in the discharge of their duties. If they have failed in their duty in this respect it should not impair the rights of the legatees who could themselves demand that a sale be made if improperly delayed by the executors. That the executors might continue to hold the slaves in violation of the policy of the law would certainly be a breach of duty on their part but it will not help the argument here. The most it would prove is that the legislature had failed to provide adequate sanctions to enforce its prohibition to free negroes to acquire this species of property. It does not furnish any reason why the will of the testator should be defeated when he has plainly pointed out a mode by which it may 266 *lawfully be carried into effect, because the executors choose to violate their duty.

Following then the rational and well settled rules to which reference has been already made, and looking to the manifest general intent of the testator, I think that the sentence of the eleventh item in question should be interpreted as if it read, "and should it be necessary in carrying out this clause of my will, to sell my slaves because my said legatees cannot lawfully have the benefit of them except by means of a sale and conversion of the same into money, or for any other cause, I desire my executors to sell them publicly or privately, &c.;" and that the residuary devise in the will was good to pass to the legatees the proceeds of the sale of the slaves after providing (if necessary to apply the same or part thereof to that purpose) for the debts due and the annuities previously given.

The only remaining question relates to the interest or quantum of estate that the legatees take in this subject. It is said that after providing for debts and the annuities and for the support and maintenance of the legatees, there will be a surplus not disposed of and which will pass to the next of kin.

It is to be observed that the eleventh item or clause of the will is a residuary clause by which the whole residue of the estate is given to the executors as trustees for the benefit of the parties named; and it is a well settled rule that where a residue is given every presumption is to be made that the testator did not intend to die intestate as to any part of his estate. Philipps v. Chamberlaine, 4 Ves. R. 51; 2 Rop. Leg. 1461. And where the interest or profits of the subject are given to or in trust for a legatee or for the separate use of a legatee, without limitation as to continuance, the principal or corpus will be considered as bequeathed also unless from the na-

267 ture of the subject or *the context of the will, the interest or produce only was plainly intended. 2 Lomax Ex'ors 71; Elton v. Sheppard, 1 Bro. C. C. 532; Philipps v. Chamberlaine, ubi sup.; Rawlins v. Jennings, 13 Ves. R. 39; Adamson v. Armitage, 19 Ves. R. 411. In the case last cited Sir William Grant said, "In the case of personalty words of qualification are required to restrain the extent and duration of the interest. Prima facie a gift of the produce of a fund is a gift of that produce in perpetuity, and is consequently a gift of the fund itself." But the expression of a particular purpose for which the gift is made will not operate as a condition or limitation of the bequest. The fund being appropriated to the benefit of the legatee the particular mode in which it is to be applied is but a secondary object and does not enter into the substance of the gift. 2 Lomax Ex'ors 73; 1 Rop. Leg. 430; Barlow v. Grant, 1 Vern. R. 255; Newill v. Newill, 2 Vern. R. 431; Barton v. Cooke, 5 Ves. R. 461. Per Carr, J., Rowlett v. Rowlett's ex'ors, 5 Leigh 20, 28. So by Sir Lancelot Shadwell where there was a gift for the maintenance and education of the legatee, it was held to be an absolute gift. Webb v. Kelly, 9 Simons R. 470. And if the interest of a fund be directed to be applied to the education of legatees and there prove to be a surplus beyond the expenses of education, that surplus will belong to those for whose education it was intended to be applied. Rowlett v. Rowlett's ex'ors, ubi supra.

Now we have here the case of a residuary bequest for the support and maintenance of the legatees, and there is nothing either in the nature of the subject or in the context of the will to show that the gift was intended to be restricted to the interest or produce of the fund. On the contrary the plain implication is that the whole is intended to be given to the legatees. That the purpose was avowed to be for mainte-

268 nance *and support is as we have seen but a secondary consideration and does not enter into the substance of the gift. And I think it clear that it must be regarded as an absolute gift of the entire estate, subject of course to debts and the annuities previously given. Whether the children mentioned take along with their mother or in remainder after her death, whether children after born or only those living at the death of the testator were to take and whether the testator intended by the clause in which he looked to the event of the legatees being required to leave the state to create any new or different estate from that which he had intended in the previous clause, are all questions with which the appellants here have no concern, and which it is neither necessary nor proper should be decided in this case. Whatever may be their solution the estate is equally given away from the next of kin.

I think that the Circuit court did not err in dismissing the bill, and am of opinion to affirm the decree.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Lee, J.

Decree affirmed.

269 *Southall's Adm'r v. Taylor & als.

January Term, 1858, Richmond.

1. Executors—Failure to Collect Debts through Negligence—Liability.—Testator directs all his property, real and personal, except his slaves, to be sold, and the proceeds of the sales, together with what money might be due to him, to be put and kept at interest for the benefit of his wife and children, until the children should arrive at the age of twenty-one years or be married. He had in his lifetime taken the bond of two men who were partners, for a partnership debt, and it was unpaid at his death. They were reputed to be wealthy men, and the executor permitted the debt to remain uncollected until one of them died, and the firm as well as its members proved to be insolvent. The executor is bound to account for the debt.

2. Same—Same—Same.—In this case one of these partners purchased property at the public sale made by the executor, and executed his bond with his partner as his surety. The executor having failed to collect the money when he might have collected it, and the obligors having failed, the executor is bound to account for the amount of the debt.

3. Same—Right to Accept One Partner as Surety for Another.—One partner is not such security for the other, as an executor is authorized to take in selling the property of his testator.

This was a bill filed in June 1852 in the Circuit court of the city of Williamsburg and county of James City by the widow and children of Henley Taylor deceased against Robert Anderson as the administrator of George W. Southall deceased, who was the executor of Henley Taylor, for the settlement of his administration account. All the children but one, were infants, and sued by their next friend.

Taylor by his will which bore date on the 18th of September 1848, appointed George W. Southall his executor, and directed that all his property real and personal, except his slaves, should be sold, and the proceeds of the sales, together with what money might be due to him, should be put and kept at interest, for the benefit of his wife and children, until his children 270 *should each arrive at the age of twenty-one years or be married. And he directed that his wife should receive one-third of the profits of his estate, and that the other two-thirds should go to his children. And by a codicil dated December 4th, 1848, he directed that the funds of his estate should remain in the hands of his executor, as trustee, during the minority of his children or until they should marry; the income therefrom to be applied to their maintenance and education, and he to have the control and management of them. This will was admitted to probate on the 26th of March 1849.

It appears that the executor Southall, soon after his qualification, viz: in November 1849, sold a tract of land belonging to the estate of his testator, to James W. Curtis,

*Executors—Failure to Collect Debts through Negligence—Liability.—In Anderson v. Piercy, 20 W. Va. 324, it was said: "If when he (an executor) settles his account, he has not received a debt, and it appears, that it has been lost through his negligence or want of proper diligence, he should be charged with such debt as of the time, when he ought to have received it, had he used due diligence. The mere want of proper diligence on his part or his negligence does not make debts due his testator the property of the executor, and therefore, if when he settles his accounts, he can show, that a particular debt included in the inventory and not returned as worthless or doubtful was nevertheless a debt, which could not have been collected by the use of diligence either because of the actual insolvency of the debtor, or because he had a substantial defense, or because though when the inventory was made the debt was believed to be due, yet if it turns out, that it was not actually due, he ought not to be charged with such debt. For it remained the debt of his testator, though the administrator was negligent in not attempting its collection or in not bringing suit upon it with the promptness, which he ought to have exercised. See Cavendish v. Fleming, 3 Munf. 198; Reitz & Co. v. Bennett, 6 W. Va. 417."

and that he sold the personal property, except the slaves; but he returned no inventory, appraisement or sale bill.

In the progress of the cause Anderson was directed to settle his intestate's account as executor of Henley Taylor before one of the commissioners of the court. And on the report of the commissioner, three questions were raised by exceptions to it, which were passed upon by this court. As to the first of these the commissioner reported, that on the 12th of January 1848, Jacob C. Sheldon and John M. Maupin executed their bond to Henley Taylor for the sum of two thousand two hundred and sixty-two dollars and eighty-two cents, which was wholly unpaid at the time of Taylor's death. That Taylor died the 13th of March 1849, and Southall qualified as his executor on the 26th of March of the same year. This bond came into the hands of Southall a few days after his qualification along with other papers of his testator; and no steps were taken to enforce its payment until the 5th of April 1851, when suit was instituted thereon in the Circuit court of Williamsburg, and judgment was ob-271 tained *at the May term 1851. On this judgment three executions were issued, which were returned "no effects;" and no part of the bond has been paid. Maupin died insolvent on the 26th of December 1850, and on the 2d and 3d days of May 1851, Sheldon made conveyances to and for certain creditors, which rendered it impossible to make the debt or any part of it out of him. The commissioner further reported that had said bond been sued on and judgment obtained at the fall term of 1850 of the said court, the money could have been made out of either Maupin or Sheldon, who were possessed of ample property to pay the same. Maupin and Sheldon had been merchants and partners for many years, and enjoyed the general confidence of the community, and were regarded as wealthy men; though several judicious persons had for some years before Maupin's death, entertained the impression that said Sheldon & Maupin were not in thriving circumstances, but rather on the decline; but by such persons they were thought to be solvent. Maupin was regarded by several persons as a reckless man in his business transactions. The commissioner submitted to the court the question whether the executor was to be charged with this debt.

As to the second question, the commissioner reported that Maupin had executed a bond to Southall for one thousand and twelve dollars and ninety-five cents, with Sheldon as his surety, for purchases made by Maupin at the sale of Taylor's property made by Southall. And that it was proved that Sheldon was for many years previous to the death of Maupin and up to that time considered by the community at large as a man of large property and a wealthy man, and would have been taken by the best business men of that community as ample security for purchases at the sale of a decedent to the amount of the aforesaid sum 272 *of one thousand and twelve dollars and ninety-five cents; and that the money might have been recovered if suit had been brought on the bond to the fall term of the Circuit court of Williamsburg for 1850. That Southall had ample time and opportunity to have sued and obtained judgment thereon at the said fall term 1850, but he did not sue until April 1851, and he obtained judgment at the next May term; on which executions were issued and returned "no effects." That the executions were rendered unavailing, by the conveyance by Sheldon on the 2d and 3d of May of all his own property and all the property of Sheldon & Maupin.

The third question was as to the commissions of the executor. The commissioner allowed commissions on the receipts of the year 1851, that being the year before the institution of the suit, but disallowed the commissions upon the amount received in 1849 and 1850, though a part of that then received was for real estate. Of this real estate, a large portion of the purchase money was permitted to remain in the hands of the purchaser; and was paid into bank by him under an order in this cause.

The cause came on to be heard on the 27th of December 1854, when the court held, among other things, that the executor was liable for the amount of the two bonds above mentioned, and was not entitled to the commissions, which had been disallowed by the commissioner, expect for so much of the estate, real and personal, as had been sold by Southall, and which remained unpaid at the time of his death. And the court then made a decree directing certain sums of money to be paid by Southall's administrator out of the assets of his intestate in his hands to be administered, to each of the children of Henley Taylor, though all of them but one were in-273 fants. And the cause was *sent back to the commissioner, for a further report. From this decree Southall's administrator applied to this court for an appeal; which was allowed.

Peachy, for the appellant.
Bowden, for the appellee.

DANIEL, J. The liability of Southall's estate for Sheldon and Maupin's bond of two thousand two hundred and sixty-two dollars and eighty-two cents, is, I think, free from serious doubt. The testator by his will directed that all his property, real and personal, except his slaves, should be sold, and that the proceeds of sale, together with whatever money might be due to him, should be put and kept at interest till his children should each marry or attain the age of twenty-one years. That his wife should receive annually one-third of the profits of his estate, and that the remaining two-thirds should go to his children; and by the second and third codicils to the will the testator declares it to be his intention that each of his children shall receive his or her portion of his estate as they respectively arrive at age or marry; that the funds of his estate shall remain in the hands of his executor as trustee during the minority of the children, or till they respectively marry; that the income is to be applied to their maintenance and education; and that the executor is to have the control and management of the children.

Independent of the general obligation (arising out of the very nature of his office) requiring the executor to proceed with due diligence to the collection of the debts due to the estate, the duty of so doing (if the directions of the testator are to receive a literal interpretation) is specially imposed upon the executor, in plain and unmistakable terms.

In this aspect of the case, the duty
274 of the executor *was obvious, and admitting of the exercise of little or no discretion. The bond was due, being payable on demand, and if Southall regarded it as one of the debts which he was required under the will to call in and put at interest, it was plainly his duty, at an early period after his qualification, independent of any considerations respecting the solvency of the debtors, to have looked about and made enquiries for a proper investment of the debt; and to have demanded its payment, or at least to have notified the debtors to hold themselves in readiness to respond to his call, whenever a suitable opportunity should arise of putting the money at interest, in compliance with the terms of the will. Yet, though he took out letters of administration in March 1849, there is nothing in the record from which even an inference can be drawn, of a demand having been made of the debt, or of any communication whatever having taken place between Southall and the debtors in relation to it, till April 1851 (a space of more than two years) when, after the death of Maupin, suit was instituted on the bond against Sheldon, the surviving obligor. Surely, if the terms of the will are to constitute the rule by which the conduct of the executor is to be adjudged, such a delay, wholly unaccounted for, cannot be treated as otherwise than unreasonable and unpardonable.

The death of Southall (in November 1851) before the institution of the suit by the appellees, it is true, is a circumstance presenting an appeal in behalf of a lenient view of his conduct. The suggestion arises, that had he lived it might perhaps have been in his power to furnish some excuse for his apparent want of attention to the interests confided to his care. The force of such an appeal, however, is greatly impaired by the opposing consideration that he wholly failed to make out any inventory, or to have any appraisement of the estate, or to return any account of sales.

275 *These evidences of a neglect of duty on the part of the executor, admit, obviously, of no explanation, and their presence, in the cause, is naturally calculated to repress any feeling, on the part of a court of equity, to hunt after explanations, at the best conjectural, of other conduct of his, indicating a loose administration of the estate. Viewing his conduct, however, in the most favorable light, it would be difficult to believe that with the exercise of ordinary diligence he could not have found a suitable investment for the money, in the interval between the date of his qualification as executor and that of the institution of the suit brought by him, or to conceive of any satisfactory reason why, if he contemplated a change of the debt, he did not institute legal proceedings for its recovery at an earlier period.

It is suggested, however, that, giving to the will a more enlarged and liberal interpretation, it was not necessarily the duty of Southall to call in all the debts of his testator; that if the testator left any of the debts, due to him, safely secured, the executor, though offending against the letter of the will, would be acting in accordance with its spirit, and the true intentions of the testator, in leaving such debts to remain undisturbed, seeing, that the real object of the testator was to keep his money at interest till his children should come of age or marry: the interest, in the mean time to be applied to their maintenance and education.

I think we should allow to Southall the benefit of this suggestion to the extent of holding that if he found any portion of his testator's money out at interest upon such loans or investments as he, in the exercise of a sound discretion, might have properly made himself, out of the testator's funds which might have come into his hands as executor, he would have been justified in suffering such loans or investments to 276 *stand, observing, however, the same watchfulness and vigilance in looking after their continued safety, that would have been needful in respect to investments of his own making. It would savor of too close a sticking to the mere letter of the will, and of harshness to the executor, to visit him with the consequences of a devastavit for failing to essay the needless, if not hazardous process of changing one safe investment for another productive of no greater income to the estate.

We are thus led to enquire whether the bond in question is such an investment of the testator's funds as a court of equity could properly sustain the executor in making. And were we to follow the rule of the English chancery upon the subject, we should be compelled to answer the enquiry at once in the negative, without any regard to the solvency of the obligors to the bond at the time of the qualification of the executor. For though, in one of the earlier cases, Harden v. Parsons, 1 Eden. R. 145, the lending of trust money on private bonds or notes, was held not to amount to a breach of trust, without other circumstances of negligence, it is now firmly established in England, that all investments of trust money by executors and other trustees, in mere personal securities, are at their own risk. In all cases of the kind, unless express power to put out the money on personal security is given by the cestuis que trust, or conferred by the instrument under which they are acting, trustees are held, by the courts of equity there, to account for all losses arising from loans of the trust funds, except when the loans have been secured by liens on real estate, or some other thing of permanent value. Where the executor has invested the moneys of the estate in such loans (on mortgages), or in such stocks as the court itself is in the habit of directing funds in its own possession to be laid out in (generally the "three per cents"), and loss arises from the insolvency of the debtors and depre-277 ciation *in the value of the mortgaged property, or from fluctuation in the stocks, the executor is excused: but in all other cases of putting out the trust funds at interest (except where authorized as before mentioned by the will or the beneficiaries), the executor is now required by the English chancery to make good all losses and deficiencies. Wilkes v. Steward, Cooper's Ch. Cas. 6; Adye v. Feuilleteau, 1 Cox R. 24; Holmes v. Dring, 2 Cox R. 1; Powell v. Evans, 5 Ves. R. 839, and notes; Story's Eq. Jur. § 1274, and note; 2 Lomax on Ex'ors 484.

Chancellor Kent, however, in the case of Smith v. Smith, 4 John. Ch. R. 281, whilst expressing his belief in the wisdom of the rule, as a general one, that trustees loaning money should be required to take adequate real security, or resort to the public funds, gave very strong intimations of opinion that there might be circumstances which would exonerate trustees in taking personal security, when they had exercised proper discretion and caution in the selection of such security. And I do not think that the English rule, or one like it, can be said to have been, as yet, adopted generally in this country. Certainly no such rule has as yet been declared by this court. Indeed it seems to me that until a very recent period it would have been extremely difficult, if not wholly impracticable, to have carried out a rule of the kind, to its full extent, in this state. It is only within a few years past that we have had public stocks in such quantity as to make it generally convenient, if possible, for executors and other trustees, especially those situated in parts of the state remote from the cities, to procure them. This fact, taken in connection with the well known reluctance of our people to fetter and encumber their estates with mortgages or deeds of trust (the giving of which even for loans, at the time, are generally esteemed as impairing to a greater or less extent the 278 *credit of the grantors), affords, as it seems to me, a sufficient reason why, hitherto, there should not have been any intimation of a purpose on the part of our courts to apply a like rule here. Whether, in the greatly increased facility which now exists of purchasing certificates of state stock, and in the well established policy of having, where practicable, a fixed rule on the subject, the court may not, hereafter, when passing on the recent transactions of trustees, find sufficient reasons for declaring some rule of the kind, is a matter about which I deem it unnecessary to go into any speculation or conjecture. At present I do not feel called upon to declare an executor or other trustee liable for loss, simply on the score of his having made, or allowed to stand, an investment of the trust funds in personal securities.

In the absence of any directions by the testator as to the character of the security on which his money was to be put out, I think that the executor would have been guilty of no breach of duty, in making loans to solvent borrowers, taking their own bonds or notes with one or more sureties of undoubted ability. But I do not think that he had a right (without accountability for loss) to make or continue a loan on the bond or note of the borrower alone, however ample his estate, or free from suspicion his solvency might be. Such conduct is out of the usual course pursued by prudent capitalists. To require on the one hand and to give on the other, security, in dealings of the kind, is, among men of business habits and experience, very much a matter of course.

In the case of Miller v. Holcombe's ex'or, 9 Gratt. 665, the trustees were clothed with a very broad discretion by the deed under which they acted; yet this court held that a sale by one of them, with the consent of the other, of a portion of the trust subject, to a solvent firm, on the credit of the 279 firm alone, constituted, *of itself, a breach of trust for which both trustees should be responsible. And the general views on the subject taken in the opinion of the court delivered by Judge Lee, would seem to me to apply with their full force to the case of a loan of his testator's funds by an executor, or of an unreasonable indulgence extended by the latter to persons indebted to the estate for moneys borrowed of the testator in his lifetime.

As I have already intimated, we cannot look to the mass of the English decisions on the subject as a guide in this case, inasmuch as they condemn all loans by trustees on personal securities. There is, however, a class of cases arising under wills, in which the executors are clothed with the power of lending on personal securities—which, as I conceive, are directly in point. These cases expressly forbid the lending by executors on the sole credit of mercantile concerns. Of this class of cases, Langston v. Olivant, Cooper's Ch. Cas. 33, is a marked and leading one. In that case the executors were empowered by the will to place out a specific pecuniary bequest "upon real or personal security, as should be thought good and sufficient;" and it was declared that they should not be answerable for any loss which might happen without their willful neglect or default. The executors loaned out the amount of the legacy, together with a greater amount of their own private funds, "to a trader" "in good credit and circumstances'' at the time, who failed some years thereafter. The security taken was the bond of the borrower. It was argued that the power conferred on the executors did not extend to the lending of the money on the mere credit of a man in trade, thus making the trust property liable to all the contingencies of trade; and the executors were held to answer for the loss: the court observing that the authority of the executors did not extend to such an accommodation. And in the case of 280 Sadler v. Hobbs, *2 Brown's Ch. Cas. 114, in which the executors were held liable for failing to call in a fund with due diligence, the fact that the party in whose hands the money was allowed to remain, was a tradesman, was one of the prominent grounds on which the court placed its action. And it is also to be observed that Chancellor Kent, in the case of Smith v. Smith, already cited, whilst intimating the opinion that trustees should not be held liable merely for lending on personal security, very plainly disavows any disposition or purpose to extend the indulgence to cases ''where the borrower or his surety is engaged in mercantile or other hazardous pursuits.''

I am aware that there are dicta to the effect that the executor ought to be less severely dealt with in cases where he has merely continued a credit originating with the testator; it is said that blame is not to be imputed to the executor for trusting persons in whose integrity and ability the testator himself confided. Yet I recollect no case in which considerations of the kind were allowed to have any material influence on its decision. And indeed it seems to me that in passing on the conduct of a fiduciary such considerations ought to be counted as of little or no value. Otherwise we should have to abandon all idea of any thing like a general rule on the subject, and to allow every executor to have a separate standard, by which to regulate his conduct, higher or lower, dependent upon the greater or less degree of prudence which his testator may have displayed in the management of his pecuniary affairs. The allowance of any serious weight to such considerations is further opposed by the obvious argument drawn from ordinary observation and experience, that the most prudent of men are often governed in their business transactions by motives at war with their pecuniary interests. Loans may have been prompted by feelings of 281 friendship, or debtors *indulged in a spirit of neighborly kindness and forbearance. How far these or motives of the like kind may have governed a testator in managing his affairs, his executor cannot well undertake to say. Any surmises, consequently, which he might form as to the degree of confidence which the testator had in the ability of his debtors, would necessarily be, generally, of the most vague and unreliable character.

The general rule for the guidance of executors in the administration of their trusts is thus clearly and succinctly stated by Judge Stanard, in delivering the opinion of this court in the case of Kee's ex'or v. Kee's creditors, 2 Gratt. 116, 128. ''The duties of the executor (he says) are to be performed under the obligations of sound judgment, acting on those considerations of worldly prudence which affect the safety of the pecuniary interests confided to his care. When such judgment, so governed, is fairly exercised (and tested by the facts existing and known at the time it is exercised), is such as would probably be formed by a judicious man managing his affairs with reference to considerations of mere worldly prudence, the executor is justified in acting on such judgment; and, so acting, is not responsible for alleged losses resulting from his conduct.'' Under such a rule, I apprehend that the creditors and legatees of an ignorant, improvident or careless testator would have a right to expect just as great a degree of prudence in the administration of his estate as could be properly required of the executor of a person who had managed his affairs with the utmost wisdom and prudence. And it is difficult to conceive of any good reason for saying that an executor, who, after having had a reasonable time to survey the facts on which to form his judgment, should neglect to call in a loan of an exceptionable character or doubtful safety, should not be held to the same responsibility that would have attached to his making (under 282 an authority *to lend) a loan of the like character, under a like state of facts and circumstances.

The commissioner, in his report of the substance of the testimony taken before him, states that, whilst it was proved that Sheldon & Maupin enjoyed the general confidence of the community (Williamsburg) in which they resided, and transacted their business, and were regarded as wealthy men, several judicious persons, who thought the firm solvent, had, nevertheless, for some years before the death of Maupin, entertained the impression that the firm was not in thriving circumstances, but rather on the decline; and that Maupin was regarded by several persons as a reckless man in his business transactions. This statement is well calculated to create the belief that if Southall had used due diligence in instituting proper enquiries, he would have found that the debt was in a very precarious condition. And upon a view of the whole case, I see no reason why we should struggle to except it from the operation of those decisions which, even irrespective of special proofs touching the safety of the debt, would hold Southall responsible for having allowed the money of his testator to stand out on the obligation alone of a mercantile firm, and thus to remain exposed to the well known uncertainties and hazards of trade.

I am also of the opinion that the Circuit court has decided rightly in charging Southall with the bond of Maupin & Sheldon for one thousand and twelve dollars and ninety-five and a half cents. Much of what has been said in respect to the debt just disposed of, is applicable also to this. The former, it is true, grew out of a transaction between the testator and the firm, and the latter out of a sale by the executor to one of the members of the firm in his individual capacity. The character of the obligation taken for the debt, however, is, in each case, the same, to wit, the joint 283 *and several bond of the two members of the concern. It is argued (it is true) that there is no good reason why a party should not be received as surety for another in his private dealings merely because the two happen to be associated in a mercantile firm. But of this I am not satisfied. On the contrary, the close and intimate relation which subsists between the members of such a partnership, and which confers upon each, whether prudent or reckless, an almost complete power over the pecuniary interests of all the members, presents to my mind a very strong argument why one of them, when contracting to give security, should be expected to tender some person whose credit and fortune are not thus blended with and dependent upon his own.

So far as the matter of security is concerned, the difference would seem to be one of form rather than of substance, between selling to a firm composed of two members, and taking their bond without security, and selling to one of the members, and taking his bond with the other as security.

I believe, too, that with the mercantile portion of the community, if not with business men generally, in transactions of loans of money, sales on credit, and negotiations of the like kind, when a surety or endorser is required, it is the common usage not to offer or accept one member of a mercantile firm as surety or endorser for the other.

Passing by these matters, however, without further intimation of opinion respecting them, it seems to me that Southall is clearly bound for the amount of the bond in question, on the ground that he did not use ordinary diligence in respect to it after it fell due. He suffered nearly twelve months to elapse after its maturity without (so far as the record shows) making any demand for its payment. And even after the death of Maupin, the principal in the bond, he suffered three 284 *months to pass before he brought his suit. The debt was one on which the debtors had no reason for expecting indulgence. When Maupin bought at the sale he no doubt expected that he would be required to pay when his bond should fall due. And the testimony is ample to show that the debt would in all probability have been paid if payment had been demanded and insisted on.

The case of Johnston's Estate, 9 Watts & Sergt. 107, is in point to show that after the debt became due the burden was with Southall to account for it, or to show, in case of its loss, that he had used due diligence in the effort to collect it. In England (as is said in that case) such sales are required to be for cash, and the executor is chargeable immediately after the sale with the price. But in Pennsylvania (as with us) the rule is to sell on short credits, taking bond with security. If the executor takes bond with sufficient security, he is not immediately chargeable, but on the maturity of the bond he becomes chargeable, and to discharge himself must show that the debt was lost without any default or neglect on his part. In that case the note was allowed to stand about six months, when the principal and surety, apparently before in good circumstances, both failed, and the administrator was charged with the debt.

There is nothing in the evidence more immediately applicable to the debt in question, to explain away the prima facie case made against Southall; and when we take into view his whole conduct in the management of the estate, his negligence and consequent liability are only made the more apparent.

The 6th section of the 132d chapter of the Code does not define the "negligence or improper conduct" which subjects an executor to liability for a lost debt, and I have not regarded it, therefore, as affecting in any manner the questions which I 285 have been considering. *The true object of the section is, as I conceive, to settle any question which might otherwise arise as to the propriety of charging the fiduciaries and other persons therein mentioned with the interest as well as the principal of debts lost by their negligence or improper conduct.

Upon the whole, I think that the decree of the Circuit court, in respect to both of the bonds of Maupin & Sheldon (viz: the bond for two thousand two hundred and sixty-two dollars and eighty-two cents, and the bond for one thousand and twelve dollars and ninety-five and one-half cents), is right. It seems to me, however, that the court erred in so much of its decree as relates to Southall's commissions on his receipts. On the 1st of July 1850, when the Code went into operation, he had not incurred any forfeiture of commissions under the provisions of the act of 1825, only sixteen months having then elapsed since the date of his qualification as executor. The effect of the Code was to repeal the act of 1825, in such case, and there being no longer, in existence, any law declaring a forfeiture of commissions on moneys received by him prior to the 1st of July 1850, for failing subsequently to settle his accounts within two years after his qualification, he was I think entitled to such commissions. And as he died before the expiration of six months after the end of the year commencing on the 1st of July 1850 he did not incur a forfeiture of commissions, on such of his receipts as were subsequent to that date, under the 8th section of chapter 132 of the Code. Boyd's ex'ors v. Boyd's heirs, 3 Gratt. 113.

I perceive no other error in the principles of the decree. It seems to me, however, that before executions should be allowed to go out for the sums decreed to the infant appellees respectively, some person should be designated by the Circuit court to 286 receive the *money in trust for the infants. When this shall have been done, executions can issue in the names of the infants, with an endorsement that the money is to be paid to the person so designated.

I am of opinion to reverse the decree to the extent of the error indicated in respect to Southall's commissions, and to affirm it in all other respects: and to remand the causes to the Circuit court for further proceedings, &c.

MONCURE and LEE, Js., concurred in the opinion of Daniel, J., except that Moncure, J., was not prepared do say that one partner would not be a proper surety for the other in a transaction wholly unconnected with the partnership.

ALLEN, P., dissented as to the bond given to the testator, but concurred in the opinion as to the one given to the executor; he being of opinion that a partner is not a sufficient surety for his copartner.

SAMUELS, J., dissented as to both bonds. Reversed in part, and affirmed in part.

287 *Hunter v. Humphreys.

April Term, 1858, Richmond.

1. Slaves—Suit for Freedom—Wrong Exercise of Jurisdiction—How Advantage Taken.—In a suit for freedom there is a special verdict which finds that the defendant took possession of the plaintiff in the county of Prince Georges, Maryland, and has since retained her in his possession down to the institution of this suit; but it does not state that the plaintiff was detained as a slave in the county where the suit was brought.—Though detention of the plaintiff where the suit is brought is necessary to give the court jurisdiction, yet as the court has general jurisdiction over the subject matter of controversy, the objection to the exercise of jurisdiction in the particular case, for this cause, is matter in abatement of the proceeding, and should be pleaded, or brought to the notice of the court by rule or motion before the jury is sworn in the cause.
2. Special Verdicts—When Not Defective.†—In a special verdict, if the facts found make a case upon which the court may render a judgment upon the merits, the verdict is not defective because other facts exist which might have been found, and which would have made a different case requiring a different judgment.
3. Wills—Construction of—Emancipation of Slaves—Case at Bar.—In July 1829 Mrs. H of P. G. county, Maryland, made her will, and emancipated certain of her slaves at her death. She then gave as follows: I give to my brother B, during his life, all the rest of my slaves; and at his death, those above the age of fifteen years to be immediately free and fully emancipated; and those under the age of fifteen years to be bound out in P. G. county in the state of Maryland, until they shall arrive at the age of eighteen years, when they and their increase shall be free and fully emancipated. A child of one of the female slaves left to B for life, born during the life of B, is emancipated by the will.

At the January term 1857 of the County court of Alexandria county, Harriet Humphreys, a negro, filed her petition for leave to sue for her freedom: and at the same term Robert W. Hunter appeared by his counsel, and claimed to be the owner of said negro. And, by consent of parties, the court made an order directing the sheriff of the county to hire out the petitioner 288 *until final judgment should be rendered in the case.

At the next May term of the court the jury found a special verdict, in which they stated, that Mary Green Hardy, of Prince Georges county, Maryland, in July 1829 made her will, which is set out in full; and that it was duly admitted to probate in said county in the year 1830. By the first and second clauses of her will Mrs. Hardy emancipated certain slaves by name and the children of one of them, at her death. The fourth clause is as follows: "I give and bequeath unto my brother Basil Hatton, during his life, all the rest of my slaves; and at his death, those above the age of fifteen years to be immediately free and fully emancipated, and those under the age of fifteen years to be bound out in Prince Georges county in the state of Maryland, or in the district of Columbia, until they shall arrive at the age of eighteen years, when they and their increase shall be free and fully emancipated." The residue of the testatrix's estate was given to Basil Hatton; and he was appointed sole executor of the will.

The special verdict further found that among the slaves embraced in the residuary bequest of negroes to Basil Hatton, was a woman named Marietta, of whom the petitioner Harriet was born about the year 1836, and more than a year prior to the death of Basil Hatton. That Hatton died in August 1840, in the county of Prince Georges, Maryland, where he resided before and at the time of his death. That the defendant Hunter took the petitioner into his possession in the county of Prince Georges, where he had obtained letters testamentary on the estate of Basil Hatton; and has since retained possession of the petitioner down to the time of the institution of this suit.

After the finding of the special verdict, the cause was at the same term react of the state of Maryland passed in 1809, was agreed to be considered as incorporated in it; and it was further agreed that the said act was in force at the date of the will of Mary G. Hardy, and ever had been since and is still the law of Maryland. This act, after reciting that by the law of Maryland slaves may be emancipated either by last will and testament or by deed of manumission; and that as to slaves liberated at a future day or on a contingency, the state and condition of the issue of such slaves was not settled with sufficient legal precision, it was enacted, § 2. "That from and after the first day of February eighteen hundred and ten, if any negro or mulatto female slaves, by testament or last will or deed of manumission, shall be declared to be free after any given period of service, or at any stipulated age, or upon the performance of any condition, or on the event of any contingency, it shall be lawful for the person making such last will and testament or executing such deed of manumission, to fix and determine in the same the state and condition of the issue that may be born of such negro or mulatto slave during their period of service." By section 3 it was provided that if in such cases, such persons did not in their will or deed of manumission, fix or limit the state or condition of the issue that might be born of such negro or mulatto female slave, then the state and condition of such issue should be that of a slave.

The Circuit court rendered a judgment upon the special verdict in favor of the petitioner: And thereupon Hunter applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was allowed.

Brent, for the appellant, insisted:

1st. That this case having occurred in Maryland, must be governed by the 290 law of Maryland; and that *from a very early period, it had been held in that state, that the issue of slaves conveyed or bequeathed by deed or will for life or years, born during the existence of the particular estate, belong absolutely to the owner of the life or particular estate, unless such issue shall be otherwise disposed of by the deed or will. Scott v. Dobson, 1 Har. & McH. 160; Somerville v. Johnson, Id. 348; Standiford v. Amos, 1 Har. & John. 526; Hamilton v. Cragg, 6 Har. & John. 16; Chew v. Gary, Id. 526; Bohn v. Headley, 7 Id. 257; Sutton v. Crain, 10 Gill & John. 458; Holmes v. Mitchell, 4 Maryl. R. 532. That by the act of 1809 the grantor or testator had authority to confer freedom on such issue; but if that was not done, they were slaves. That the act was in accordance with the case of Maria v. Surbaugh, 2 Rand. 288, and was to be construed and applied upon the principle of that case. And he insisted that this will made no disposition of the issue of the slaves given to Hatton for life; and therefore they were slaves.

2. That the special verdict did not find that the appellant Hunter held the slave in the county of Alexandria, which was necessary to give the court jurisdiction; but on the contrary, finds that he took possession of the petitioner in the county of Prince Georges, Maryland, and had since retained possession of the petitioner down to the institution of this suit. Code, ch. 106, § 1, p. 464; Ratcliff v. Polly & als., 12 Gratt. 528.

3. That the special verdict was too uncertain and defective for the court to render judgment thereon. That it was not sufficient to find the act of 1809; but it was an established rule of law in Maryland, that the legatee for life of slaves, was entitled to the issue of the female slaves born during the existence of the life estate: and this had not been found. 1 Rob. Pr. 184.

4. The special verdict has not found
291 whether Basil *Hatton ever qualified as executor of his sister; and as such assented to the bequest of freedom: and this assent was necessary. Tucker, P., in Nicholas v. Burrus, 4 Leigh 289; Sutton v. Crain, 10 Gill & John. 458; Bolling v. The Mayor of Petersburg, 3 Rand. 563.

Funsten and Carrington, for the appellee, insisted:

1. That the act of 1809 recognized the distinction drawn between, on the one hand, the case of Maria v. Surbaugh, and cases of that class, and on the other, the cases of Elder v. Elder's ex'ors, 4 Leigh 252; Erskine v. Henry, 9 Id. 188; Lucy v. Cheminant's adm'rs, 2 Gratt. 36, and Osborne v. Taylor's adm'r, 12 Id. 117. That whilst the statute established the principle of Maria v. Surbaugh, yet whether a case came within the operation of the statute was to be ascertained in the same way and by the same criteria, as we ascertain in Virginia, whether a case falls within the principle of Maria v. Surbaugh or Erskine v. Henry. For this they referred to Hamilton v. Cragg, 6 Har. & John. 16. And applying the principle of the cases to the construction of the will of Mrs. Hardy, they insisted that she intended to emancipate all her slaves, and all their issue.

2. That the question of jurisdiction could not be taken in this court. The act, Code, ch. 169, § 1, p. 641, authorized a suit to be brought in any county wherein the defendant resided; and the County and Circuit courts of Alexandria county being courts of general jurisdiction, the objection could only have been taken by plea in abatement, or by motion to the court to dismiss the petition on the ground of want of jurisdiction. Bradley v. Welch, 1 Munf. 284; Monroe v. Redman, 2 Id. 240; Ratcliff v. Polly and als., 12 Gratt. 528.

3. That it was too late to object in this court that it did not appear that Hat-
292 ton had qualified as executor *of Mrs. Hardy. But if the objection might be taken here, the time for which he had held the slaves must be conclusive to show, either that he qualified as executor and assented to the bequest in his favor, or that some one else had qualified and had assented to the legacy. And if assent had been given to the legacy for life, it operated in favor of the legatee in remainder.

ALLEN, P. Upon the petition of the appellee that she was unlawfully detained as a slave in the county of Alexandria, in the possession of the appellant, she was permitted to institute a suit for her freedom; the appellant appeared and claimed to be the owner of the negro, and, by consent of parties, the court ordered the appellee to be hired out by the sheriff of said county until final judgment. At a subsequent term a jury was sworn to try whether the appellee was free or not. A special verdict was found, which by consent was afterwards amended; and by further consent the cause was removed to the Circuit court, which rendered judgment on the special verdict as amended for the appellee.

One of the errors assigned in the petition is, that it is found by the special verdict that the appellant took possession of the appellee in Prince Georges county, Maryland, and still retains possession of her there, and the court of Alexandria county had therefore no jurisdiction to try the cause. The special verdict finds that the appellant took the appellee into his possession in said county of Prince Georges, where he administered on the estate of Basil Hatton, and has since retained her in his possession down to the time of the institution of this suit. But it is not found, as the petition states, that he retained possession of her in Prince Georges county.

The verdict does not find that she was detained as a slave in Alexandria 293 county; and detention as a slave *in the county or corporation where the suit is brought, is necessary to give the court jurisdiction. The court, however, has general jurisdiction over the subject matter of the controversy, and the objection to the exercise of the jurisdiction in the particular case for the cause alleged is matter in abatement of the proceeding, and should be pleaded, or brought to the notice of the court by rule or motion before the jury was sworn to try whether the petitioner was free or not. No such motion or suggestion was made in this case. The detention of the petitioner as a slave in Alexandria county, instead of being controverted, seems to have been conceded in previous stages of the proceedings. It was so alleged in the petition. The appellant appeared at the same term, and without controverting this allegation, consented that the sheriff of Alexandria county should hire her out until final judgment. It thus appeared she was detained as a slave within the county. In Polly v. Ratcliff, 12 Gratt. 528, Judge Daniel observes, "that it is hardly to be supposed that the legislature, in dispensing in these suits for freedom, with the rules and declaration and pleadings, designed that questions of jurisdiction should be litigated before the jury without notice to the petitioner." Still less can it be supposed that it was ever contemplated that such questions, though not litigated before, and therefore never passed upon by the jury, should for the first time be raised in the appellate tribunal.

Another error assigned in the petition is, that the verdict is too uncertain and defective for the court to render judgment thereon. The law of Maryland is not found or stated by the jury with sufficient certainty, and being a foreign law should have been found as a fact by the jury. After the verdict was found, certain facts were agreed between the parties, which by their consent were to be considered as in-294 corporated *in and to form part of the special verdict. In this agreement of facts an act of the general assembly of Maryland is set out in full, and it is agreed that this act was in force at the date of M. G. Hardy's will, under which this controversy arises; and that said act has ever been since and still is the law of Maryland.

It does not appear on the face of the verdict, nor is there a suggestion in any part of the record, that there was any other law of Maryland bearing upon the case. There is no uncertainty in this respect on the face of the verdict. In the absence of a finding of any other law in Maryland affecting the questions in controversy, the court must act on the presumption that the law of Maryland in other respects is similar to the laws of Virginia. Harper v. Hampton, 1 Har. & Johns. 623, 710; and 1 Rob. Pr. 230, and the cases there referred to.

A third objection though not assigned as error in the petition, has been taken in the argument here. The verdict, it is argued, has not found that Basil Hatton ever qualified as the executor of his sister, and as such assented to the bequest of freedom. The verdict finds the will, the probate, the birth of the appellee about a year before the death of B. Hatton the residuary legatee and executor, the death of the said B. Hatton, and that the appellant took possession of the appellee, having administered on B. Hatton's estate, and that he has since retained possession. The will was admitted to probate in 1830, B. Hatton died in 1840, and this suit was instituted in 1857.

The verdict shows that the appellant took and held possession of the appellee in his representative character as part of B. Hatton's estate. If B. Hatton did not qualify as the executor of his sister, it would seem from the facts found that he held the slaves; and therefore after such a length of time the reasonable presumption is that the 295 administrator with the will *annexed did assent to the legacy. The claim of the appellant and his taking possession of the appellee as part of B. Hatton's estate, is an affirmation on his part of an election by B. Hatton to hold as legatee for life under the will, if he qualified as executor, or that there was an assent so as to perfect his title as residuary legatee, and that so he became entitled to the increase born during his life estate. I think that there is no valid objection to the finding of the special verdict, upon either of the grounds relied on; and that the question whether the appellee under the will of Mary G. Hardy is entitled to her freedom, which alone was intended to be presented and was decided by the court below, fairly arises upon the record.

The testatrix had her domicil in Maryland; the property was in that state; and there her will was published and admitted to probate. The will must, therefore, be considered with reference to the laws of that state. The act of the general assembly of Maryland incorporated by agreement in the special verdict, after reciting in the preamble that slaves may be liberated by the laws of that state either by last will and testament or by deed, and that when female slaves were declared to be free at a future time, the condition of the issue born before that time seemed not to be settled with sufficient legal precision, proceeds in the first section to enact that it shall be lawful for the person making such last will or deed to fix and determine in the same the state and condition of the issue that may be born of such negro or mulatto female slave during the period of her service. The second section provides that if the state and condition of such issue shall not have been so fixed and limited, that then the state and condition of such issue shall be that of a slave. The effect of these provisions is to establish by positive enactment the principle recognized by this court 296 in Maria v. Surbaugh, 2 Rand. 228, confirmed by many *subsequent cases, and the established law of this state until it was modified by the Code, ch. 104, § 10, p. 458, which provides that such issue of any female emancipated by deed or will thereafter made, shall be free when the mother's right to the enjoyment of her freedom arrives, unless the deed or will otherwise provides.

It has been averred in argument, and the cases referred to prove, that in Maryland the increase of slaves conveyed or bequeathed by deed or will for life, born during the existence of the particular estate, belong absolutely to the owner of the particular estate, unless such increase shall be otherwise disposed of by the deed or will. This proposition, as between the owner of the particular estate and the remainderman, was decided in Maryland as early as 1749, in Scott v. Dobson, 1 Har. & McH. p. 160. It was reaffirmed and acted upon between similar parties in Somerville v. Johnson, 1 Har. & McH. 348. In that case the opinion of Daniel Dulany, a member of the proprietary's council, is published, who though he disapproved of the principle, considered himself bound by Dobson v. Scott, and gives the two principal reasons which governed the court in that case:

1st. That unless the owner of the particular estate took the increase, he might have no interest worth regarding, to take care of the issue.

2nd. That in such cases a bounty was intended; but if the issue went over, instead of a benefit there might be a loss. The principle established in these cases seems still to be adhered to in Maryland. See Holmes v. Mitchell, 4 Maryl. R. 552. A different rule prevails in Virginia; the slaves born during the particular estate constitute a part of the testator's estate, unless otherwise disposed of; Erskine v. Henry, 9 Leigh 183; and the owner of the particular estate is entitled to their services
297 during the existence of that estate, and no *longer. As has been already observed on another error assigned, this law of Maryland, as gathered from judicial decisions, is not referred to in the special verdict, and there is nothing in the record indicating that it was relied on or brought to the notice of the court below. If it constituted a material part of the appellant's case, it should have been proved as a fact on the trial; and a mere suggestion in the appellate court that other facts existed which might have been proved and found, ought not to avail the party, if the facts as proved make out a good case.

But the interpretation of the will would not be affected, whether construed with reference to this rule of the Maryland courts, or the law of Virginia only. The law of Maryland, and the principle established in Virginia in Maria v. Surbaugh, equally recognize the right of the testator to fix and determine the state and condition of such issue born during the existence of the particular estate. It resolves itself at last into a question of intention. In the construction of wills we are to find out the meaning, the intention, the will of the testator; and unless it violates some provision of law, it must be carried into effect. Anderson's ex'ors v. Anderson, 11 Leigh 616. And in Holmes v. Mitchell, 4 Maryl. R. 532, the judge observes, "that in the interpretation of wills the intention of the testator is to be gathered from the entire instrument, and prevails, unless it violates some established principle of law; and where there is a general intent and a particular minor intent, the latter must give place." In Virginia, as such increase, if not otherwise disposed of, are the slaves of the testator's estate, any words showing an intention to emancipate all his slaves, will embrace the after-born. Thus, in Pleasants v. Pleasants, 2 Call 270, "respecting my poor slaves all of them as I shall die possessed with shall be free." In Elder v.
Elder's ex'ors, 4 Leigh 252, "the 298 remaining part of my negroes." *In Erskine v. Henry, 9 Leigh 188, "all his negroes to be free and at full liberty." In Binford's adm'r v. Robin, 1 Gratt. 327, "that all my negroes be liberated." In Lucy v. Cheminant's adm'r, 2 Gratt. 36, "all the rest of my slaves." In Osburne v. Taylor's adm'r, 12 Gratt. 117, the testator bequeathed in trust for the benefit of another for life, the whole of his negroes not before disposed of or devised; and provides that at the death of the beneficiary for life, "it is further my will and direction that the slaves embraced in this item be emancipated." In all these cases these general terms of description were held to embrace the after-born issue. The last is a peculiarly strong case, because it was contended that as the slaves undisposed of were given in trust for life, and the clause emancipating referred to the slaves embraced in this item, it was equivalent to a bequest emancipating slaves by name. As, however, the life tenant was entitled to the issue during the existence of the particular estate, the clause emancipating was descriptive of the class, and embraced all.

In Maryland it was decided, before the passage of the law made part of the bill of exceptions, that under a will leaving certain slaves who were named, and their increase, to his wife for life, and at her death he left all the above negroes free, and also left his lands after her death to be divided amongst them, that the increase were emancipated. Jack v. Hopewell, cited in a note to 6 Har. & John. R. 2.

And in the case of Hamilton v. Cragg, 6 Har. & John. 16, the clause was in these words: "Item. I give to my sister five negroes by name Frank, Joe, &c., to possess and enjoy during her natural life them and their increase; and my will is that after the death of my sister the above named negroes be free." There, as in this case, there was no limitation over of the increase, and it was decided that such 299 increase became free at *the death of the life tenant, because though not directed to be free and the emancipation was confined in terms to the above named negroes, it was merely descriptive of the persons who were to take their freedom. That the will made no difference in the condition of the mother and children during the life of Mrs. T., none at her death was intended, but all were equally the objects of the benevolence of the testatrix.

The will in the case under consideration, shows an intention to dispose of all her property; and the leading intent is to emancipate all her slaves. By the first and second clauses referring to her slaves, she emancipated certain slaves named, with their children, to take effect immediately at her death. By a third clause she bequeaths to her brother B. Hatton, during his life, all the rest of her slaves; and at his death, those above the age of fifteen years to be immediately emancipated, and those under the age of fifteen to be bound out in Prince Georges county until they arrive at the age of eighteen years, when they and their increase shall be free and fully emancipated.

The rest and residue of her estate, real, personal and mixed, she gives to her brother Basil Hatton; and appoints him sole executor. The will interpreted with reference to the decisions in this state, would emancipate the after-born issue; and construed with reference to the rule established in Maryland, the terms used are stronger to manifest the intention to fix the state and condition of the increase than the terms used in the cases of Jack v. Hopewell, and Hamilton v. Cragg. No difficulty arises from certain slaves named being bequeathed, and declared to be free on the death of the legatee for life. Here the bequest is of all the rest of her slaves, treating them as a class. That she intended to embrace issue as well as parents, is evident from the whole context of the will.
300 In *two clauses she gives freedom immediately at her death to certain slaves who are named, and she takes care in each case to declare that the children shall also be free. In the clause in regard to the rest of her slaves, after dividing them into those above and those under fifteen, and directing the latter to be hired out until they attain the age of eighteen; considering that some of the last class might have issue after the death of the legatees for life, and before arriving at the age of eighteen, she takes care to provide for such increase.

In the various provisions concerning the slaves and their emancipation, the testatrix had reference not so much to the time when the will would legally take effect, the period of her death, as to the time fixed for the actual enjoyment of freedom. When the emancipation was to be immediate, she provides for the children of the females so immediately set free. When after the termination of the particular estate, emancipation was conferred after a limited servitude, the increase if any in this interval are provided for. She could not foresee the duration of the life estate. If it continued more than fifteen years, all the negroes under fifteen years of age when it ended, would have been born during the existence of the particular estate. But looking to the termination of the life estate as the period when emancipation was to take effect as to the slaves included in the general bequest of the rest of her slaves, she divides the whole class into those above and those under fifteen, without reference to the period of their birth, thus including all parents and issue; and to one set she gives immediate freedom; to the other and their after-born issue, freedom at eighteen. I think the general intent to fix the state and condition of all, is sufficiently apparent from the whole context of the will, 301 and that the descriptive *terms used, when interpreted with reference to what precedes and follows, show that the testatrix intended to embrace all living at the termination of the particular estate, the increase as well as the mothers, in the two classes of negroes above and those under the age of fifteen.

I am for affirming the judgment.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Allen, P.

Judgment affirmed.

This was an action of assumpsit in the Circuit court of the city of Petersburg, brought by David Condon against the South Side Rail Road Company. The plaintiff had been a contractor to execute the work on a section of the road of the company; and the only question was, Whether, under the contract between the parties, the action of the engineer in determining the character and fixing the price of removing certain rock, was conclusive upon the parties? The case is stated in the opinion of Judge Moncure. There was a judgment for the defendant in the Circuit court: and thereupon Condon applied to this court for a supersedeas, which was allowed.

†__Same—Same—Contract Binding.__—In Kinney v. Baltimore & O., etc., Ass'n, 35 W. Va. 385, 14 S. E. Rep. 8, the first point of objection made by the appellant to the decree was that the plaintiff could not sue because of a certain article of the constitution of the association which read thus: "Should any difference arise between any claimant for the benefits herein set forth and the committee of management, it shall be submitted to three arbitrators, one to be chosen by each party, and the third by the two thus chosen, whose decision shall be final."

The question arose therefore, whether this article forbade the plaintiff from resorting to a court of justice to inforce her demand, and limited her to arbitration. In dealing with the question, BRANNON, J., delivering the opinion of the court, said: "Indeed, a mere agreement to refer, without an actual consequent reference, is no bar to an action in any case. 2 Pars. Cont. 707 states: 'Both in this country and England it has long been considered that the parties to a contract are not bound by an agreement, whether in or out of the contract, to refer questions under the same to arbitration: because they cannot oust the courts of their jurisdiction by any agreement that these claims shall be submitted to arbitration.' Same doctrine in Morse, Arb. 91. Many American cases are cited for this proposition. It will be seen in Condon v. Railroad Co., 14 Gratt. 314, that JUDGE MONCURE, and in Scott v. Avery, 36 Eng. Law & Eq. 1, that COLERIDGE, J., criticise the doctrine as standing on no solid reason, but say it is law too long settled to be disturbed. In the case of Condon v. Railroad Co., the Virginia court, following the English case, feeling the unreasonableness of the rule, as I myself do, drew a distinction, which, however clear

MONCURE, J. This is a supersedeas to a judgment of the Circuit court of Petersburg, rendered in an action of assumpsit brought by the plaintiff in error, David Condon, against the defendants in error, the South Side rail road company, on a contract between them, whereby the said Condon agreed to excavate, embank and construct sections Nos. 38 and 40 of the South Side rail road, according to certain specifications, and the said company agreed to pay for the work at certain rates, and in a certain manner, prescribed by the 304 *contract. The main, if not the only, object of the action, was to recover eighty cents per cubic yard for twelve thousand six hundred and sixty-two cubic yards of excavation, instead of the price allowed therefor in the final estimate of the engineer of the company, to wit, eighty cents per yard for two hundred and sixty cubic yards, thirty-five cents per yard for five thousand seven hundred and ninety-six cubic yards, and forty cents per yard for the remaining six thousand six hundred and six cubic yards thereof. The declaration contains three counts, all of which are special counts. There is little material variance between them. There was a general demurrer to the declaration, which was sustained by the court, and judgment thereupon rendered for the defendants: to which judgment the supersedeas in this case was awarded.

The contract is set out in totidem verbis in each count of the declaration. It embodies the specifications according to which the work was agreed to be done, but which it is unnecessary to detail. Under the head of "Items to be estimated and mode of estimating," is the following among other statements:

"All materials necessarily excavated for the road way, ditches or common road, will be estimated and paid for by the cubic yard, under the following heads, viz: Common excavation, Loose rock, Solid rock, and Slate that requires blasting.

"Common excavation will include sand, clay, gravel, soft rock, loam, and all other earthy matter, also detached rock intermixed, which do not contain more than three cubic feet each.

"Loose rock will include all detached rocks containing more than three and less than twenty-seven cubic feet each.

"Solid rock will include all rock in masses containing more than one cubic yard, which requires blasting.

"Slate—all slate which requires blasting."

305 *The contract then proceeds:

"And the South Side rail road company covenant and agree to pay to the said party of the second part when the above contract shall have been faithfully complied with, at the following rates, to wit:

Section No. 38, 9¼ cents per cubic yard for common excavation.

Section No. 38, 9¼ cents per cubic yard of embankment.

At the engineer's estimate for loose rock.

Section No. 38, 80 cents per cubic yard for every yard solid rock.

At the engineer's estimate for slate rock.

Section No. 38, $3 per cubic yard of every yard of dry stone drains.

And they will make their payments in the following manner, that is to say: On or about the 1st day of every month during the progress of this contract, the company aforesaid will pay 80 per cent. of the relative value of such work as may be done, to be judged of by their engineer, and at such places as their said engineer may appoint, until the whole of the work herein contracted for shall have been finished agreeably to contract, and shall have been accepted by their said engineer as so finished and completed, when the balance due shall be forthwith paid to the said party of the second part."

Then follow sundry other provisions, of which the last is the following:

"And whereas the above work must be inspected and received, it is hereby agreed that the engineer of the South Side rail road company, or some one appointed by in words, is not in principle; as JUDGE MONCURE admits that parties may by contract lawfully make the decision of arbitrators, or of any third person, a condition to a right of action, and that then such decision is a part of the cause of action; and until such decision is made the courts have no jurisdiction, and therefore cannot be said to be ousted of their jurisdiction, and they can only be said to be so ousted when an independent cause of action does or will exist which itself is referred to arbitration; and the Virginia court held that where a contract provided that work in construction of a railroad should be inspected and received by the engineer, and the amount of the work and all disputes touching the same should be determined by him, and his decision should be final, without further appeal, the contract was obligatory. But both the Virginia and English courts say that such a contract as this under said article 25 does not prevent suit in a court. So the first point made by appellant cannot be sustained."

him, shall be the inspector of the said work, shall determine when this contract has been complied with, according to its just and fair interpretation, and the amount of the same, and all disputes 306 *and difficulties arising under the same, and his decision shall be obligatory and conclusive between the parties to this contract, without further recourse of appeal."

After setting out the contract, it is, among other things, averred in the first count of the declaration, that section No. 40 had been transferred to another contractor, with the consent of the engineer of the defendants, and been completed and accepted; that in consideration of the agreement aforesaid, the plaintiff entered upon section No. 38, and excavated, embanked and constructed the same according to the agreement; and the same was on the 30th day of March 1852, accepted by the said engineer as so completed; that he did on said section a certain quantity of work stated in detail, one item of which is "twelve thousand six hundred and sixty-two cubic yards of rock in masses containing more than one cubic yard which required blasting;" that the chief engineer of the defendants, C. O. Sandford, appointed one B. H. Gordon to inspect and receive the work; that said Gordon, after he was so appointed, declared that the said twelve thousand six hundred and sixty-two cubic yards of rock excavation were in masses of more than one cubic yard, and required blasting, and could not be classified as "common excavation," yet refused to classify the same (except two hundred and sixty cubic yards) as "solid rock;" but adopting an arbitrary and unauthorized mode of classification, put down five thousand seven hundred and ninety-six cubic yards thereof at thirty-five cents, and six thousand six hundred and six yards at forty cents, instead of the whole at eighty cents per cubic yard; claiming that, under the contract aforesaid, the chief engineer or person appointed by him to inspect and receive the said work, had authority to classify the said rock as "soft rock," although it was in masses of more than one cubic yard and required blasting, and 307 although it could not be classified *as common excavation; that the said Gordon, governed by this mistake and illegal view of his authority, proceeded to make the classification (which is set out in the said count) of the work done on said section 38; three of the items of which classification are, making the whole amount to the sum of ten thousand four hundred and thirty-eight dollars and sixty-one cents; and that the determination and classification of the said Gordon were adopted and adhered to by said Sandford, the chief engineer of the defendants: whereupon the plaintiff says that the said classification is contrary to the terms of the contract, and illegal and void, and that he is entitled to demand of the defendants eighty cents per cubic yard for the said twelve thousand six hundred and sixty-two cubic yards of excavation.

"260 cubic yards solid rock, worth 80 cents per yard;
5,796 cubic yards soft rock, worth 35 cents per yard;
6,606 cubic yards soft rock, worth 40 cents per yard;"

The second count, substantially, agrees with the first. The third differs in substance from the first and second only in the assertion of an additional demand for expense alleged to have been incurred by reason of the lowering of the grade of said section 38, and not estimated by the engineer. But this additional demand seems not to be relied upon, and no special notice need be taken of it.

If the classification, or final estimate, as it may be called, of the engineer of the defendants, or his appointee, be final and conclusive between the parties, the demurrer to the declaration was properly sustained, and the judgment must be affirmed. For that estimate is set out in each count of the declaration, and shows how the rock in question was classified, and at what price it was estimated by the engineer; and the plaintiff seeks in this action to estab-308 lish a different *classification, and to recover a different and higher price.

Then the questions to be considered are: 1st. Whether by the terms, or the true intent and meaning of the agreement, the final estimate or decision by the engineer or his appointee of the matter in controversy, is made final and conclusive between the parties? And if so, 2ndly. Whether such agreement is lawful? I will consider these questions in their order. And

First. Does the agreement make the final estimate conclusive?

The agreement does not, as most agreements for the construction of rail roads do, expressly declare that when the work is completed there shall be a final estimate of the amount due to the contractor, which estimate shall be conclusive between the parties. But such is, I think, the effect and meaning of the agreement. It gives to the engineer of the defendants a general superintendence and direction of the work, and confers upon him very extensive powers in regard to it. He is, monthly, during the progress of the work, to judge of its relative value, and appoint the places at which eighty per cent. thereof is to be paid to the contractor. He is to make such a deduction from the stipulated price as he may deem fair and right, if any portion of the work be constructed in an inferior manner. He is to estimate and adjust the increase or decrease of expenses occasioned by any change which may be made in the line of the rail road, or the width or the level of the road way, or the plan of the works contracted for. He may object to the transfer of the contract to any person to whom the contractor may propose to transfer it; may require the discharge of any overseer, workman or laborer employed by the contractor: and if, in his opinion, a sufficient force shall not be placed and 309 retained upon the *work to insure its completion by the time stipulated, he or his assistant, after giving notice as required by the contract, may, at his option, either place a sufficient force upon the work at the expense of the contractor, or declare the whole or any portion of it abandoned. And finally, it is agreed that he, "or some one appointed by him, shall be the inspector of the said work, shall determine when this contract has been complied with, according to its just and fair interpretation, and the amount of the same, and all disputes and difficulties arising under the same; and his decision shall be obligatory and conclusive between the parties without further recourse of appeal." Under these provisions of the contract, I do not perceive how there can be any question as to the intention of the parties, that at the completion of the work a final estimate should be made by the engineer or inspector, for the purpose of ascertaining the amount due on the contract, that all disputes and difficulties arising under it should be determined by him, and that his decision should be final and conclusive between the parties. Indeed, by express stipulations of the contract, portions of the work were to be paid for, not at agreed prices, but "at the engineer's estimate." He was to make reasonable deductions from agreed prices of work done in an inferior manner; and was to estimate and adjust the increase or decrease of expressed expenses occasioned by changes of the plan of the work, &c. Without a final estimate by the engineer, therefore, it was impossible to ascertain the balance due upon the contract. It was an entire contract, and on its complete execution there could be but one demand upon it. Not one demand for that part of the compensation which was fixed by the contract, and another for that part to be fixed by the estimate of the engineer. The making of a final estimate, therefore, was a condition precedent to the right of action.

310 *It now only remains, under the head of the subject we are now considering, to enquire, Whether the estimate made by the engineer in this case was such a one as the contract authorized? Did the engineer exceed his authority in making the estimate? If he did, then by analogy to the case of an award, and according to a principle of law which governs this case alike with that (if in fact there be any difference, in this respect, between the two cases), the estimate is void. The parties intended that all questions, whether of law or of fact, which might arise under the contract, should be determined by the engineer; and that intention is, I think, plainly expressed therein. It is expressly declared that he "shall determine when the contract has been complied with, according to its just and fair interpretation, and the amount of the same, and all disputes and difficulties arising under the same;" and that "his decision shall be obligatory and conclusive between the parties without further recourse of appeal." He cannot set aside or disregard the contract of the parties. That contract must furnish the law of the case. He cannot alter the prices thereby ascertained, even though he may consider them too high or too low. If it should appear that he did so, his act would, undoubtedly, be void. He must decide "according to the just and fair interpretation" of the contract. But of that interpretation he and he alone is the judge, as he is of any other question arising under the contract. And he is not a judge whose decision may be reviewed like the judgment of an inferior tribunal; but he is a judge of the parties' own choosing, and in the last resort; as to whom they have expressly agreed that "his decision shall be obligatory and conclusive, without further recourse of appeal." If he do not keep within the bounds of his authority, his act will, of course, be void. But if he keep within those bounds, his act will be valid, however erroneous

311 *in law or in fact it may be, and however plainly the error may appear. The court cannot set aside his act merely because it differs in opinion with him, whether on a question of law or of fact; for all questions arising under the contract, whether of law or of fact, were referred by the parties to his decision, and not to that of the court. His act may be set aside on the ground of fraud, and perhaps of palpable mistake. But it is unnecessary to state that ground of relief more fully, or to enquire whether it is available at all or not in a court of law, as it does not exist in this case. The only question here is, Did the engineer exceed his authority? It is contended by the counsel for the plaintiff in error that he did, because the contract requires all excavation done under the same to be estimated under four certain heads, and at prices therein respectively prescribed; whereas he estimated twelve thousand four hundred and two cubic yards of said excavation under a head and at prices not prescribed by the contract. It is contended that, according to the contract, this quantity of rock should have been estimated as "solid rock," at eighty cents per cubic yard; or, if not, at least as "common excavation," at nine and one-fourth cents per cubic yard; whereas it was estimated as "soft rock," at thirty-five and forty cents per cubic yard; there being no such head of classification and no such prices as these last prescribed by the contract. The stipulated price for common excavation is nine and one-fourth cents per cubic yard; and "soft rock" is expressly enumerated, among other substances, under the head of "common excavation." So that if the engineer has committed any error, so far as appears on the face of the estimate, it would seem to consist in allowing thirty-five and forty cents, instead of nine and one-fourth cents, per cubic yard for twelve thousand four hundred and two cubic yards of excavation. In could hardly be contended

it is averred in the declaration that the engineer declared that the "soft rock" in question was "in masses of more than one cubic yard and required blasting," and could not be classified as "common excavation;" and it is therefore contended that the said rock should have been estimated as "solid rock;" the contract providing that "solid rock will include all rock in masses containing more than one cubic yard which requires blasting." If this alleged declaration of the engineer were part of his estimate; or, being matter dehors the estimate, could be relied on as a ground to invalidate it, I think it is insufficient for that purpose. At most, it only shows that in the opinion of the engineer, the "soft rock" in question was a substance not falling under either of the four heads of classification enumerated in the contract; and therefore he allowed such price for its excavation as he deemed reasonable, under that provision of the contract which authorized him to determine "the amount of the same, and all disputes and difficulties arising under it." If this court had the power, could it undertake to say that the engineer's opinion was erroneous? that "soft rock" can be "solid rock" even though it be "in masses containing more than one cubic yard which requires blasting?" Or that "soft rock in masses containing more than one cubic yard which requires blasting," can be "common excavation." If it were necessary that the "soft rock" in question should be classified under one or the other of the two heads of "solid rock" or "common excavation," would there not be at least as much reason in classifying it under the latter as under the former head? But was it not for the engineer to decide under which of the heads enumerated in the contract the said rock should be classified; and, if of opinion that it could be classi-313 fied under none of them, what *price should be allowed for its excavation? Was not this one of the "disputes and difficulties arising under the contract," which he was expressly authorized to determine, and which it was necessary for him to determine, in order to ascertain the amount due upon the contract? And can this court, even though it may differ in opinion with him, revise and reverse his decision? If it did differ in opinion with him, it could only say, as did Parke, B., in Faviell v. Railway Company, 2 Welsb. Hurl. and Gord. 346, "It is simply the case of an erroneous decision; and if parties choose to refer a matter to a judge of their own selection, they are bound by his decision both in fact and law. The fallacy lies in assuming that the arbitrator has exceeded his jurisdiction." See Russ. on Arbitration, 63 Law Library, marg. p. 113-116, 295-300, 306-313, 455, 516, 632, and the cases cited in the notes. My conclusion on this branch of the subject is, that the engineer did not exceed his authority in making the estimate; and that it is final and conclusive as to the matter in controversy, if the agreement under which it was made be lawful; which brings me to the question next to be considered.

Secondly. Is the agreement lawful?

The only ground on which it can be said to be unlawful is, that in referring all disputes and difficulties arising under the contract to the engineer or inspector, it tends to oust the courts of law of their jurisdiction; and is therefore against the policy of the law and void, according to the principle of the cases of Kill v. Hollister, 1 Wils. R. 129; Thompson v. Charnock, 8 T. R. 139, and others of the same class. That principle is, that wherever a cause of action exists, a right of action in a court of law is incident thereto, and inseparable therefrom, even by the agreement of the parties. So that, if parties enter into an agreement referring a present or future cause of action to 314 the decision of *an arbitrator, even though they expressly stipulate that no action shall be brought in the mean time, the agreement will be no bar to such action. A covenant never to sue, is an implied release, or has the effect of a release, to avoid circuity of action. A covenant not to sue for a limited period, is no release express or implied, nor any bar to the action; though the breach of it is an independent cause of action; as also is the breach of an agreement to refer, by revoking the reference or bringing an action in disregard thereof. The principle in question, it is said, though considered to be now settled, is doubtful in its origin and not to be extended in its operation. It is carefully to be distinguished from another principle with which it is sometimes confounded, and from which it is separated by a line not always easily discernible. That other principle is, that parties by their contract may lawfully make the decision of arbitrators or of any third person a condition precedent to a right of action upon the contract. In that case such decision is a part of the cause of action. Until the decision is made and the cause of action thus becomes complete, the courts have no jurisdiction of the case, and therefore cannot be said to be ousted of their jurisdiction by the contract. They can only be said to be so ousted when an independent cause of action exists, or will exist, which is itself referred to the decision of arbitrators. This principle is commonly applied to building contracts and the like, in which it is stipulated that compensation for the work is not to be paid until the work has been accepted and the amount of compensation ascertained by an architect, engineer, or other referee. Without referring to the many cases which illustrate this principle, I will notice only that of Scott v. Avery, 36 Eng. L. & E. R. 1, decided by the house of lords in 1856. That was an action brought upon three policies of insurance. By the con-
315 tract of *insurance it was provided that the sum to be paid for any loss should first be ascertained by the committee; but in case of difference between the insured and the committee relative to the settling of any loss, or to a claim for average, or any other matter relating to the insurance, then arbitrators were to be appointed to decide upon the claims and matters in difference. There was a further proviso, that no member who refused to accept the amount of any loss as settled by the committee, should be entitled to maintain any action at law or suit in equity on his policy until the matters in dispute should have been referred to and decided by arbitrators, and then only for such sum as they should award; and the obtaining such decision was to be a condition precedent to the right to maintain such action or suit. It was held by the house of lords (affirming the judgment of the court of exchequer chamber), that the proviso was not a contract ousting the jurisdiction of the courts, but was legal and binding on the parties, and that it created a condition precedent to the right of action on the contract. The distinction between the two principles before referred to, is well illustrated in the opinion of Coleridge, J., in that case (who also delivered the opinion of the court of exchequer chamber in the same case). "If two parties enter into a contract for the breach of which in any particular an action lies, they cannot make it a binding term that in such event no action shall be maintainable, but that the only remedy shall be by reference to arbitration. Whether this rests on a satisfactory principle or not, may well be questioned, but it has been so long settled that it cannot be disturbed." "But nothing prevents parties from ascertaining and constituting as they please the cause of action which is to become the subject matter of decision by the courts. Covenanting parties may agree that in case of an alleged breach the damages to be 316 *recovered shall be a sum fixed, or a sum to be ascertained by A B, or by arbitrators to be chosen in such or such a manner; and until this be done, or the nonfeasance be satisfactorily accounted for, that no action shall be maintainable for the breach." "In settling the amount to be recovered by a builder or a rail way contractor, the architect, or engineer, or whoever may be the preliminary referee agreed on for the purpose, must examine and decide that which may really be the very point in dispute between the parties, namely, the quantity or the goodness of the work, or the quality of materials used; yet no one objects that on this account the stipulation for submission to this previous enquiry is void as ousting the jurisdiction of the courts. I am certainly not disposed to extend the operation of a rule which appears to me to have been founded on very narrow grounds, directly contrary to the spirit of later times, which leaves parties at full liberty to refer their disputes at pleasure to public or private tribunals; and I think the judgment of the court of exchequer chamber stands on a safe distinction between an agreement which would close entirely the access to the courts of law, and that which only imposes, as a condition precedent to the appeal to them, that the parties shall have first settled, by an agreed on mode, the precise amount to be recovered there." Id. 15 and 16. That case seems to be much stronger than this in favor of the validity of such agreements, and if the agreement in that case was valid, so a fortiori is the agreement in this. Indeed I think the agreement in this case is valid according to all the cases I have seen. I mean of course, in the construction I have put upon it, that the estimate of the engineer or inspector ascertaining the amount due upon the contract, is, by the terms and true intent and meaning of the contract, a condition precedent to a right of action thereon. The agreement, 317 in effect, is *not to pay a specific sum, but the amount which the engineer may determine to be due upon the contract: and according to all the cases, such an agreement is valid and binding.

But even if the agreement in this case came within the operation of the principle which prevents parties from ousting courts of law of their jurisdiction, it would not on that account be unlawful, but would only leave the parties at liberty to resort to the courts of law as if no other mode of decision had been agreed upon by them. They would still be at liberty, at their election, to pursue the remedy agreed upon; and having pursued it to a decision, they would be bound and concluded thereby. Now in this case the remedy agreed upon was pursued; the engineer made his final estimate; and the only complaint is that he made it erroneously; that he classified as "soft rock" at thirty-five and forty cents per cubic yard, what he ought to have classified as "solid rock" at eighty cents per yard; and that he persisted in doing so though requested by the plaintiff to make a different and proper classification. Therefore, if the engineer did not exceed his authority in making the estimate, it is final and conclusive; and that he did not, has already, I think, been shown.

I am of opinion that the judgment be affirmed.

there is no difficulty in ascertaining the county intended. This is not error.

2. Same—Body of—Designation of County as "Said County"—Effect.—Though it is not stated in the body of the recognizance, of what county the justice was, yet as it states that he was a justice of the said county, that refers to the county named in the caption, and is sufficient.

3. Same—Scire Facias—Averment as to Transmission of the Recognizance.—In a scire facias upon a recognizance, a substantive and direct averment that the recognizance was transmitted by the justice to the clerk of the County court, is not necessary. The recital of the recognizance, which purports to be taken by a justice in the county, and the implied averment of the transmission of the recognizance, contained in the prout patet per recordum, is sufficient.

This was a scire facias upon a recognizance, issued from the clerk's office of the County court of Alexandria county, against Esleeck Stearns alias William Slick and Samuel Gedney his surety. The record states that on the 17th day of February 1854

Esleeck Stearns alias William Slick
319 and Samuel Gedney his *surety entered into a recognizance before a justice of Alexandria county, which recognizance is in the following words and figures, to wit:

Alex County, to wit:

Be it remembered, that on the 17th day of February 1854, Esleeck Stearns alias William Slick and Samuel Gedney, of the said county, came before me Robert Hunter a justice of the said county, and severally and respectively acknowledged themselves to be indebted to the commonwealth of Virginia in manner and form following—that is to say, the said Esleeck Stearns alias William Slick in the sum of five hundred dollars good and lawful money of the United States, and the said Samuel Gedney in the sum of five hundred dollars, of like good and lawful money, to be respectively made and levied, &c.

The condition was that said Stearns should personally appear before the county court on the first day of the next term thereof, then and there to answer the commonwealth on and concerning a certain felony by him committed, in feloniously stealing a gold watch and chain of the value of twenty dollars, the property of Stephen P. Wilson, in the county of Alexandria, &c., and should not depart thence without leave of the said court.

At the March term of the County court, three justices only being present, Stearns being called and not appearing, his default was entered of record, and a scire facias was directed to be issued upon his recognizance. Afterwards, at the May term of the court, it was organized as an examining court, with five justices on the bench, and took up the case of Stearns; and he being solemnly called and not appearing, it was ordered that his default be entered of record, and that a scire facias be issued on said recognizance according to law.

320 *The scire facias was in fact issued in April, in pursuance of the first order of the County court; but the parties having agreed to remove the case to the Circuit court, it was agreed between them that no exception should be taken to the date of the scire facias, and that the court might inspect the recognizance and both records of the County court, and decide all questions arising thereon.

The scire facias was against both Stearns and Gedney, and recited the recognizance correctly; but concluded by referring to a copy of the recognizance to our said County court transmitted, and now remaining filed among the records thereof. And further reciting the forfeiture of the recognizance, it commanded the sheriff to summon the said Esleeck Stearns alias William Slick and Samuel Gedney to be before the justices of the County court of Alexandria, at the courthouse thereof, on a day specified, to show if, &c., why the said commonwealth's execution against them the said Esleeck Stearns alias William Slick and Samuel Gedney, of the several sums of money aforesaid, according to the force, form and effect of the recognizance aforesaid, ought not to have, if to us it shall seem expedient, &c.

Gedney appeared and demurred to the scire facias. And the case coming on to be heard, the court rendered a judgment that the demurrer be overruled, and that the commonwealth may have execution against the goods and chattels, lands and tenements of the said defendant Esleeck Stearns alias William Slick, for five hundred dollars; and also may have execution against the goods and chattels, lands and tenements of the said defendant Samuel Gedney, for the five hundred dollars, in the writ aforesaid specified, according to the form and effect of his recognizance therein mentioned. †Code, ch. 171, § 31, p. 650. "On a demurrer (unless to a plea in abatement), the court shall not regard any defect or imperfection in the declaration or pleadings, whether it has been heretofore deemed mispleading or insufficient pleading, or not, unless there be omitted something so essential to the action or defence, that judgment according to law and the very right of the cause, cannot be given. No demurrer shall be sustained because of the omission in any pleading of the words "this he is ready to verify," or "this he is ready to verify by the record," or "as appears by the record:" but the opposite party may be excused from replying, demurring, or otherwise answering to any pleading which ought to have, but has not, such words therein, until they be inserted."

judgment Gedney applied to this court for a supersedeas; which was allowed.

321 *Brent, for the appellant, insisted:

1. That the recognizance did not set forth in what county it was taken, nor did it aver that Robert Hunter, by whom it was taken, was a justice for Alexandria county. The word Alex does not indicate that it is an abbreviation, and if it is an abbreviation, it does not indicate necessarily what it is intended to represent. Wood v. Commonwealth, 4 Rand. 329.

2. That the scire facias was defective, because it does not aver that the recognizance was transmitted to and filed in the office of the clerk of the County court. And it was insisted that the recognizance does not become a record until it is enrolled, or under the Code, transmitted and placed on file in the proper office. Bias v. Floyd, governor, 7 Leigh 640, 649; Code, ch. 211, § 7, 8, p. 785. And it was further insisted, that the scire facias was defective, because it does not show that it was founded on a record; but on the contrary it sets out that a copy of the recognizance was transmitted to and remained on file among the records of the County court.

3. That the County court at its March term, at which the recognizance required Stearns to appear, was not competent to try him as an examining court; there having been but three justices on the bench. And it was therefore incompetent to adjudge and record his default. Dillingham v. United States, 2 Wash. C. C. R. 422, 426; Code, ch. 211, § 8, p. 785; ch. 205, § 8, p. 765.

4. That the action of the court at the May term was unauthorized; and therefore of no legal validity. That the party bound to appear can only be called on the day on which he is recognized to appear, unless the recognizance is respited or regularly adjourned to another term by a court of competent jurisdiction; or at least express notice to appear at another day must be given him. Petersdorf on Bail, part 322 2, ch. 7, *p. 517, 518, 7 Law Libr.; Thruston v. Commonwealth, 3 Dana's R. 224; Goodwyn v. The Governor, 1 Stew. & Por. 465.

5. That the recognizance is several, and not joint and several; and the scire facias is joint; and will not lie on this recognizance. Hildreth v. The State, 5 Blackf. R. 80; Garland v. Ellis, 2 Leigh 555.

The Attorney General, for the commonwealth, insisted:

1. That the recognizance did set out the county in which it was taken. That Alex was stated to be a county, and the word would stand for no other county in the state but the county of Alexandria. That the county in the caption being Alexandria, the other objections stated to the recognizance fell to the ground. In Wood v. The Commonwealth, 4 Rand. 329, no county was stated. As to the abbreviations, he referred to McNeale v. Governor, for, &c., 3 Gratt. 299.

2. That if the recognizance was void if not filed, which is at least doubtful; it appears here that it was filed. And then the question is if it is not cured by the statute. Code, ch. 211, § 11. That the reference to the copy of the recognizance is mere surplusage; and the Code, ch. 171, § 31, shows how little regard is now to be paid to merely technical objections. To show what was necessary to be averred in a scire facias, he referred to Archer's Case, 10 Gratt. 627; People v. Van Eps, 4 Wend. R. 387; People v. Higgins, 10 Id. 464.

3. That it was true that the only court which can record the default is a criminal court. But the County court is competent to record the default; though not to initiate the prosecution. But this is an immaterial question. All the cases now hold that the first day of the term is the first day of the first term at which a court is held competent to try the cause. Cohen's Case, 323 *2 Dana's R. 135. And therefore, if it be true that the March court was not organized so as to authorize the entry of default, then that entry was merely void, and the entry at the May term when the court was for the first time properly organized, is good. And moreover, this objection cannot be taken on demurrer.

4. That the scire facias is not joint, though it is against two; and a separate judgment was properly entered up against each. Adair v. The State, 1 Blackf. R. 200, which case was recognized in Minor v. The State, 1 Id. 236, and in Thompson v. The State, 4 Id. 88.

DANIEL, J. There is, I think, no sufficient ground on which to rest the first assignment of error. The county in which the recognizance was taken (it is true) is not set forth in the body of the recognizance; but this is done with reasonable certainty in the caption; in which the letters Alex are so written, and are used in such a connection, as to show obviously that they were designed as a contraction or abbreviation of the name of the county in which the recognizance was taken. A portion of the name is evidently written in place of the name in full. Alexandria is the only county in the state which answers to, or is susceptible of, such a representation as that employed, and the recognizance ought, accordingly, to be treated as showing with sufficient certainty that it was taken in that county.

This view disposes also of the other question raised in the first assignment of error. The statement that the recognizance was taken before Robert Hunter, "a justice of the said county," being referred, as it should be, to the caption, as understood and explained, becomes, necessarily, a substantial averment that the recognizance was taken by a justice of Alexandria county.

In this aspect of the case, the deci-
324 sion in Wood v. *Commonwealth, 4 Rand. 329, cited by the plaintiff's counsel, can have no bearing upon it. In the report of that case, the copy of the recognizance on which the questions there decided arose, is not set out, but, on looking to the manuscript record, it will be seen that there was no caption to the recognizance; and in the language of the court, "nothing appears of its being entered into in Albemarle, and therefore that fact (and an important one) does not appear of record." And the court held that this defect (a defect in a record) could not be supplied by averment; and that as the scire facias averred that the recognizance was entered into in the county of Albemarle, the variance was incurable. In the case before us (as has been just shown) the recognizance does, in effect, and with sufficient freedom from ambiguity, state the county in which it was taken, and that it was taken by a justice of that county. The case of Wood v. Commonwealth consequently does not apply to it.

The defect in the scire facias, which is assigned as the second cause of error, seems to me to be met by the 31st section of ch. 171 of the Code, which provides that on a demurrer (unless it be to a plea in abatement) no defect in the declaration or pleadings shall be regarded, unless something be omitted so essential to the action or defence, that judgment according to law and the very right of the cause cannot be given. And that no demurrer shall be sustained because of the omission in any pleading of the words "this he is ready to verify," or "this he is ready to verify by the record," or "as appears by the record;" but the opposite party may be excused from replying, demurring, or otherwise answering, to any pleading which ought to have, but has not such words therein, until they be inserted.

A scire facias upon a recognizance is an action, and the writ in practice very 325 often serves in the double *capacity of process and declaration, and is in many respects amendable. 18 Wend. R. 526.

The counsel for the plaintiff has cited no authority showing the necessity under our laws and practice, of a substantive and direct averment that the recognizance was transmitted by the justice to the clerk of the County court. The scire facias (as is usual) recites the recognizance, which purports to have been taken by a justice in the county. This recital, together with the implied averment of the transmission of the recognizance contained in the prout patet per recordum, when the usual form is pursued ("as by the said recognizance to our County court sent and now remaining in the said County court manifestly appears"), is, according to our practice, received as presenting a sufficient averment that the recognizance had been transmitted by the justice.

The averment was not otherwise made in Wood v. Commonwealth, nor in Bias v. Floyd, governor, 7 Leigh 640; and no objection was made to the scire facias in either case, because of the omission. And in the case of Starr v. The Commonwealth, 7 Dana's R. 243, when the question was directly presented to the Supreme court of Kentucky, it was held that there was no necessity that the fact should be more directly averred.

The clerk in the present case, however, in suing out the writ, has (in the particular out of which the irregularity arises), by mistake, pursued the form of the scire facias which goes out on a recognizance taken in a County court for the appearance of a party before a Circuit court, instead of the form used when the recognizance is taken by a justice out of court, and transmitted to the clerk of the court where the party is to appear. See Robinson's Forms 260-261. In the former case a copy of the recognizance may be used as evidence against the party (Code, ch. 211, § 8), and the verification by a copy is formal and proper. In 326 *the latter case the original recognizance is the only proper evidence, and the prout patet, instead of being (as it is) "as by a copy," &c., should have been as has been already indicated. The mistake, however, does not furnish ground for reversing the judgment. If the plaintiff regarded it as one by which he might be prejudiced, he might have had it corrected by adopting the course pointed out in the section referred to. On a demurrer, the defect cannot be regarded by the court.

In passing upon the third and fourth causes of error, which may be conveniently considered together, it is unnecessary to consider whether the County court held on the 6th of March 1854, composed as it was of three justices only, was so constituted as to be legally authorized to record the default of Stearns, and order a scire facias on the recognizance. For, if it was, the proceedings were all regular. And if it was not, then there being (so far as the record shows) a failure of a proper court to meet at the March term, the recognizance by force of the provisions of section 15, ch. 161 of the Code, stood over to the April term; when again, as the record does not show that there was any court, it was, by force of the same provision, continued to the May term. At that term the presiding justice and four associate justices were regularly organized as an examining court for the trial of Stearns. He was called, and failing to appear, the court again ordered that his default should be recorded; and that a scire facias should go out on the recognizance. As it was agreed by the parties that no exception should be taken to the date of the scire facias, the difficulties suggested are solved by a reference to the provisions of the Code just cited.

The fifth and last cause of error, which would seem to be the one mainly relied on by the plaintiff, remains to be yet considered. It is said that the recognizance is a several one, and not joint and several;
327 and that *the scire facias is a joint one, and therefore will not lie. And the legal proposition thus stated is rested mainly on the authority of Hildreth v. The State, 5 Blackf. R. 80. In that case two parties entered into a recognizance, by which they acknowledged themselves to be indebted to the state of Indiana in the sum of one thousand dollars each; and it was held by the Supreme court of that state that the recognizance was several, and that a joint scire facias would not lie against the recognizors. The court bases its opinion and judgment chiefly on one of its own previous decisions (Thompson v. The State, 4 Blackf. R. 188). On referring to the latter case, it will be seen that it was not a case of a scire facias on a recognizance. The facts there were (as appears from the reported opinion of the court) that a Circuit court, for an alleged contempt, had ordered a fine of twenty dollars to be entered against each of the two parties. Upon that order a joint scire facias issued, requiring the defendants to show cause why a capias pro fine should not issue against them. A motion to quash the scire facias and a demurrer were successively overruled, and a judgment entered awarding execution against each defendant severally. The Supreme court reversed the judgment, remarking simply, that there was no privity between the defendants; that the fine was against each severally, and that there was consequently no ground for a joint scire facias.

It is true that in 7 Blackf. R. 417, we have also a brief abstract of the case of Lockwood v. The State, from which it would seem to have been again decided, by the same court, on the authority of Thompson v. The State and Hildreth v. The State, that a joint scire facias will not lie on a general recognizance.

How far these cases of Hildreth v. The State and Lockwood v. The State may have settled the doctrine in Indiana, it would not seem very material to enquire.

328 *So far as they are sought to be used as persuasive authority here, however, it seems to me obvious that their force is much impaired by the consideration that they appear to rest on the authority of a case (Thompson v. The State) which does not, either in express terms or by necessary implication, assert the doctrine contended for; and that they are directly at war with earlier cases in the same court (well considered cases), which, in Hildreth v. The State, and Lockwood v. The State, are passed over without comment or notice.

In the case of Adair & al. v. The State, 1 Blackf. R. 200, three parties entered into a recognizance, by which they acknowledged themselves to owe the state one thousand dollars each. A scire facias was issued against all three of the parties, but was served on two only, against whom there was an award of execution. In the Supreme court the judgment was affirmed.

In the conclusion of its opinion, the court remarked that "it was contended that the recognizance is several, and that there is a joint scire facias against the three, and a joint judgment against two only. Such is not the fact. The terms 'joint and several' are not strictly applicable to these proceedings. The recognizance, although but one instrument, contains three distinct obligations, each for a separate sum of money. Each of the three Adairs acknowledged himself indebted to the state in the sum of one thousand dollars. Each of these obligations has an independent existence, and the discharge of one would have no effect on the others." "There is nothing joint. The one entry of judgment operates as a separate judgment against each for the sum of one thousand dollars. So with the scire facias. It is but one writ, but it operated in requiring each one to show cause why the state should not have execution 329 against him in particular. *The award of execution against two has nothing in it irregular. The execution is not awarded against them jointly. Neither of these two defendants is charged with the demand against the other, nor with the demand against James Adair, junior. Each one is liable on his own obligation only, and is unaffected by the judgment or execution against the others."

The same principles were again asserted by the same court in the case of Minor & al. v. The State, 1 Blackf. R. 236.

A reference to the reports of other states (so far as I have had access to them) has resulted in showing a strong current of authority in accordance with the earlier decisions in Indiana; and, indeed, I have found no case in which the contrary doctrine is maintained, except the two cases of Hildreth v. The State, and Lockwood v. The State. See Smith & als. v. The State, 7 Porter's R. 492; Dean v. The State, 2 Smeedes and Marsh. 200; Madison v. The Commonwealth, 2 A. K. Marsh. R. 136, 565; The State v. Stout & al., 6 Halsted's R. 124.

In the case last cited the whole subject is very ably and fully discussed; and after a thorough examination of the English reports and books of forms and entries, the result is arrived at, that in cases of scire facias on recognizances, the rule applicable to actions on bonds (in the particular in question) does not hold; and that against a plurality of recognizors bound severally in one recognizance, there may be one writ, one judgment and one execution, with this caution only, that each party is made liable for what he has severally undertaken, and for nothing more.

The case of Garland v. Ellis, decided by this court, and reported in 2 Leigh 555, does not apply to this. In that case, in an action of debt by Ellis against H. Ballinger, R. Ballinger and T. Richeson, 330 Garland, *Muse and J. Richeson, by several recognizances, severally undertook as special bail for the defendants, viz: Garland for H. Ballinger, Muse for R. Ballinger, and J. Richeson for T. Richeson. One scire facias went out against the three bails, requiring them to show cause "why the plaintiff should not have execution of the debt against them according to the form and effect of their several recognizances:" And this court affirmed the judgment of the County court sustaining a demurrer to the scire facias. The two cases are marked by the difference that in Garland v. Ellis, there was no community among the parties either in respect of the instruments by which they bound themselves, or in respect of the persons for whom they undertook; whilst here the undertaking is by one instrument and for the appearance of the same person, to wit, the principal.

I know of no case in which the precise question has been distinctly presented to, and expressly decided by, this court; but so far as I have been able to ascertain the practice in cases of the like kind, I believe it has been not unusual to embrace the principal and his bail in the same scire facias. Such was the course pursued without complaint in the case of Wood v. The Commonwealth, already cited. The manuscript record shows that the undertakings of the principal and bail, in the recognizance there, were several, to wit, Isaac Wood the principal, in the sum of one thousand dollars, and John Wood his bail, in the sum of seven hundred and fifty dollars. Yet, though the case appears to have been much contested in the County and Circuit courts, and in this court, no difficulty seems to have been made about the scire facias on this score, either by the counsel or by the cost. So, in the case of Randolph, governor, v. Brown & als., decided by the General court, and reported in 2 Va. Cas. 351, there were (as appears from the manuscript copy of the record) three recognizors 331 *bound severally in the same recognizance: the principal in the sum of thirty dollars, and the bail in the sum of fifteen dollars each; and one scire facias was issued against the three parties. The scire facias passed through a like ordeal, without challenge or question, as respects the particular under consideration. See also the case of Bias v. Floyd, already cited.

Upon the whole, I am satisfied that the common law practice regulating actions on several obligations, does not apply to writs of scire facias on several recognizances; but that, provided the scire facias recites the recognizance truly, and seeks to have execution according to the effect of the recognizance (as is the case here), it is no valid ground of objection that the principal and his bail, who have bound themselves, though severally, by one and the same instrument, are proceeded against in one and the same writ.

I think the judgment ought to be affirmed.

332 *Phaup & als. v. Wooldridge & als.

April Term, 1858, Richmond.

Wills—Revocation by Marriage—Exception.*—Under the statute, Code, ch. 122, § 7, p. 517, marriage is a revocation of a will, "except a will made in pursuance of a power of appointment, when the estate thereby appointed would not, in default of such appointment, pass to his or her (the testator's) heir, personal representative or next of kin."†

This was an appeal from the sentence of the Circuit court of Chesterfield county, reversing the sentence of the County court, by which a paper was admitted to probate as the will of Benjamin Phaup deceased. The paper was propounded for probate by Ellis, Joseph and William Phaup, the nominated executors therein, and its probate was opposed by Edward Wooldridge and Mary his wife, and Martha Goode, the two female daughters of Benjamin Phaup deceased. It was duly executed and attested in July 1852. And afterwards, in July 1854, Phaup, then seventy-four years old, married Mrs. Judith Bass, who was forty-nine.

Prior to the marriage the parties entered into a marriage settlement, whereby it was agreed that all of her property should be settled upon her, with a general power of disposition on her part; and that she should have no claim upon his estate, if she survived him. And this agreement was executed prior to the marriage, by their 333 uniting in a deed by which *she conveyed her property to a trustee in trust for herself, and relinquished all interest in his estate; and he covenanted that she should have the power of disposition by deed or will; and that if she survived him she should have an annuity of one hundred and fifty dollars out of his estate; but not so as to hinder a division thereof.

The parol proofs were, that Phaup died in 1856, leaving his wife surviving him; there having been no issue of the marriage. That he expressed himself from the time of his marriage up to the time of his death, as much gratified that the marriage settlement would render it unnecessary to make his will again; and recognized the one offered for probate as his will and in full force. In his last illness he called for the paper and consulted one of the witnesses as to whether the property left to one of his daughters was effectually secured to her and her children, free from the control of her husband, telling the witness if that was not the case, he wished the witness to fix it.

The Circuit court held that though the paper had been duly executed and attested, and Phaup was competent to make a will, yet under the statute, it was revoked by the marriage; and therefore pronounced a sentence against the will; and reversed the sentence of the County court, by which the paper had been admitted to probate. From this sentence, the nominated executors and ALLEN, P. It was settled at an early period in England, that as to wills of personalty, marriage and the birth of a child for whom no provision was thereby made, operated as an implied revocation.

334 Lugg v. Lugg, *2 Salk. R. 592. As to realty, it was determined in Spraage v. Stone, Amb. R. 721, and Christopher v. Christopher, Dickens' R. 445, "that revocations by operation of law did not fall within the statute of frauds. The rule established by these decisions was adopted in this court in Wilcox v. Rootes, 1 Wash. 140. The principle on which these implied revocations rested has been controverted. On the one hand the revocation was grounded on the implied intention to revoke under the new circumstances occurring after the will was made. On the other hand, in the case of Doe v. Lancashire, 5 T. R. 49, Lord Kenyon held that such implied revocations were dependent on a condition annexed to the will by law, under which it would fail of effect in case of a subsequent marriage and birth of issue who would be left without provision were the will allowed to be effectual: and such was held to be the true view of such revocations in Marston v. Roe, 35 Eng. C. L. R. 303, where it was held that the revocation under such circumstances is in consequence of a rule of law, independent of any intention. The Court of appeals, in Wilcox v. Rootes, 1 Wash. 140, seemed to rest the principle of such implied revocation upon the implied intention to revoke under the new state of circumstances, and as a consequence that parol evidence was admissible to rebut such intention. It is remarked by the author, in 3 Lomax Dig. 131, that when we consider the provision made by our law for children pretermitted, or born after the will, or posthumous, and besides the provision of dower for the wife, in the real estate, legal or equitable, her rights as distributee, of which no testamentary act can deprive her, for she may renounce the provision made for her by the will, there would seem to be less ground in Virginia than in England for the rule that marriage and birth of a child should revoke a will made prior to the marriage.
335 *In England these questions have been set at rest by the statute of 1 Victoria, which provides that every will made by a man or woman shall be revoked by his or her marriage (except a will made in the exercise of a power of appointment, &c.). Under this statute, Jarman says, vol. 1, p. 114, that "marriage alone will produce absolute and complete revocation as to both real and personal estate, and that no declaration, however explicit and earnest of the testator's wish that the will should continue in force after marriage, still less any inference of intention drawn from the contents of the will, and, least of all, evidence collected aliunde, will prevent the revocation." With this statute before the revisors, and with direct reference to it, they reported the 7th section of chap. 122 of the Code, page 517. The terms are too clear to admit of doubt, if they are to be construed literally. The statute of Victoria was understood by the commentator to be free from difficulty, and it is admitted that in England it must be taken literally to effectuate the intention of the legislature. Ours is a literal copy; and why should it not receive the same construction? It lays down a plain rule; it makes one exception; and from what source can the courts derive any authority to make another? Our statute has received the same construction by Lomax, 3d vol. of his Digest, p. 148, which has been put upon the English statute, and which it is conceded it must there receive. It is argued, however, that where the interests of the new parties brought by the marriage into close relation with the testator are in no wise affected by the will, the reason for such revocation ceases, and therefore the law should not apply. If this position could be maintained, it would result in a repeal of this 7th section of our statute; for in view of the provision of dower for the wife in the realty, her paramount right to her portion of the personalty, independent of any testamentary disposition, if she chooses to renounce 336 the *provision made for her in the will; and in view of the provisions made by the Code, ch. 122, § 17, 18, p. 518, in favor of the children of the testator pretermitted, or born after the will, or posthumous, the rights growing out of this new relation are sufficiently protected, and therefore there was no necessity for such implied revocation. This might have been an argument against incorporating the provision contained in the statute of Victoria into our Code; but when it has been so incorporated, it is not for the court to say that the legislature did not mean precisely what they have said. They may have thought that as marriage is the most important step a man can take, gives rise to new duties, brings into close connection new parties, and of necessity calls for a different arrangement of his property, it should, without reference to the provision made by law for these new parties, lead to new arrangements in regard to his property. Nor is the provision made by the law precisely the same which follows upon intestacy, or which it is presumable the testator would have made by his will. The 18th section of chap. 122 provides, that if the after-born child or descendant die under age, unmarried and without issue, his portion of the estate, or so much as may remain unexpended in his support and education, shall revert to the person to whom it was given by the will. By the 3d section of the same chapter, minors eighteen years or upwards may by will dispose of personal estate. The wife of a minor would be entitled to dower in his real estate, and her interest in his personal estate; and his estate, in case of his death under age intestate, would descend and pass according to the statute of descents and distributions. Whereas by the 17th section, the will is to be construed as if the devises and bequests therein had been limited to take effect in the event the after-born child should die under the age of twenty-one years, unmarried and without issue; and by the 337 18th section, if the pretermitted *child dies as aforesaid, his portion reverts to the person to whom it was given by will. The interests, therefore, of such issue are materially affected by the previous will. Again, we have seen that in Virginia in the case of Wilcox v. Rootes, ubi supra, and also in Yerby v. Yerby, 3 Call 28, the court considered that such revocation was grounded on the implied intention of the testator to revoke under the new state of circumstances, and upon such intention only. To rebut such presumed intention to revoke, any evidence is admissible in support of the will to show a contrary intention, 3 Lomax Dig. 129: thus letting in evidence of circumstances and of the parol declarations of the testator. The evils resulting from this practice have led the English courts to refer the revocation to a condition in law attached to the will so as to exclude such parol testimony of the declarations.

This conflict of decision and the evils arising from letting in parol testimony in such cases, so much against the policy of our legislation and the current of decisions in later times, upon the subject of wills, may have had some influence in inducing the legislature, by adopting the provision of the statute of Victoria, to put to rest all questions as to implied revocations by marriage and the birth of issue. They have done so by declaring that marriage alone, save in the excepted cases, shall be an absolute revocation.

I think the Circuit court properly held, that notwithstanding the deed of marriage settlement, by reason of the marriage the paper writing offered for probate was fully and completely revoked; and that the sentence should be affirmed.

As early as 1827 a marriage settlement was executed, by which certain land in Powhatan county and the slaves and other property thereon, were settled on William Finney and Elizabeth C. his wife, and the children of the marriage. In January 1837 Finney was dead, having left a widow and several children; and John Heth was the surviving trustee in the deed. On the 23d and 24th of January John Heth sold at public auction the whole of the trust property; at which sale his brother Beverly Heth purchased the land in Powhatan, and a number of the slaves; his whole purchase amounting to twenty-five thousand one hundred and three dollars and six cents. John Heth purchased slaves amounting to eleven thousand three hundred and forty-five dollars. These slaves the plaintiffs alleged were purchased for the Black Heath company of colliers, a corporation of which John Heth was the president and acting manager. This corporation had been created in 1833, and at its creation Beverly Randolph, John Heth and Beverly Heth were the owners of the property which 340 constituted its *capital stock. The number of shares were three thousand, nearly all of which in 1840 John Heth was the possessor or had the control.

In 1840 John Heth entered into a contract with persons living in England, by which he undertook to procure a charter for a new company, to be called "The Chesterfield coal and iron mining company," with certain provisions, which would enable them to conduct the business in England; and to transfer to the new company all the property of the Black Heath company (except their slaves and some lands specified), and all the shares of stock in that company; for which they were to pay him a certain sum of money, and a royalty of one shilling and three pence (reduced afterwards to one shilling) upon every ton of coal raised by the company. This agreement was carried out, with some modifications; and in 1841 the Chesterfield coal and iron mining company was organized, and the shares of the stock in the Black Heath company were transferred on their books to the Chesterfield coal and iron mining company: but there does not appear to have been any conveyance of the real estate from the one company to the other.

In 1840 Mrs. Finney, for herself and her infant children, filed her bill in the Circuit court of Powhatan county against John Heth and others, seeking an account of the trust property. In March 1841 there was a decree directing John Heth to account for the whole purchase money of the trust fund; which, upon a settlement of the account, it appeared amounted to forty thousand seven hundred and fifty-five dollars and eleven cents, after crediting him with his disbursements and the amount of the purchases made by Mrs. Finney. This decree was unproductive, Heth having become insolvent.

In 1842, after the death of John Heth, the plaintiffs filed a supplemental bill, 341 making Beverly Heth, the *two corporations herein before mentioned, and others, parties, seeking to recover from Beverly Heth and those claiming under him, the trust property he had purchased, and seeking to subject the Chesterfield coal and iron mining company for the price of the slaves alleged to have been purchased by John Heth for the Black Heath company, on the ground that the Chesterfield company took the property of the Black Heath company, with the burden of paying the debts of the latter. The pleadings and proceedings in the case are stated by Judge Allen in his opinion.

There having been a decree for the plaintiffs against Beverly Heth or his trustees for the trust property in his possession, and against the Chesterfield coal and iron mining company, for the amount due upon the slaves purchased by Heth for the Black Heath company, William J. Barksdale and four others, who were judgment creditors of John Heth, on which judgments he had taken the oath of an insolvent debtor, filed their petition asking to be made parties in the cause, and claiming that they were entitled to have the royalty which the company had contracted to pay to John Heth subjected to satisfy their debt, in preference to the claim of the plaintiffs. But the court rejected their petition; and thereupon they and the Chesterfield coal and iron mining company applied to this court for an appeal; which was allowed.

Lyons and Macfarland, for Barksdale, &c.

C. Robinson, for the Chesterfield company.

P. Roberts and Morson, for the appellees.

ALLEN, P. The decree from which this appeal has been taken, subjected the Chesterfield coal and iron mining company to a heavy recovery on account of a debt alleged to be due to the appellees from the Black Heath company of colliers. The first 342 question, *therefore, which arises upon the record, and which is presented by the first assignment of errors, relates to the existence of this debt. Was the latter company at any time liable to the appellees for this debt; and if so liable, has that liability been discharged by the acts of the appellees?

On the 16th of December 1840 the widow of William Finney, in her own right, and as the next friend of her infant children, filed their bill against John Heth, Beverly Heth, and the Black Heath company of colliers, setting forth their claims as cestuis que trust under a deed of marriage settlement and other deeds touching the trust property, under which John Heth had become sole surviving trustee; and complaining of a sale made by John Heth in January 1837 of the whole trust property; which. they alleged in the bill, was made by John Heth without authority, and directly against the plain provisions of the deeds under which he was acting as trustee; and were a clear and distinct breach of trust committed by him, and by all who participated with him in the sale: and that at the sale of the trust property made by John Heth as trustee, he as the manager of the business of the Black Heath company of colliers, purchased for the company slaves, and perhaps other property, to the amount of eleven thousand three hundred and forty-five dollars. The bill further averred that at the said sale, Beverly Heth purchased land and slaves to the amount of twenty-five thousand one hundred and three dollars and six cents. It made John Heth, Beverly Heth and the Black Heath company of colliers defendants, and prayed for a decree that said purchasers should pay the principal and interest due from them respectively, and that John Heth should pay any balance appearing to be due from him, and for general relief.

To this bill John Heth filed his an-
343 swer, admitting *the sales of the trust property as stated in the bill; thereby admitting the purchase of the slaves by himself as manager of the Black Heath company at the sale made by him as trustee, at the price charged. And in regard to that purchase he states in his answer, that the sufficiency of the securities of the debt due from the Black Heath company for the purchase money of the slaves is undoubted, as until it is paid to this respondent the best property of that company is bound for it. What the securities for the debt were, he does not state: if any bond was given, it was not exhibited. The record shows that prior to this period he claimed to own or control almost all the stock of the company, and that he had actually made a transfer, by his deed of the 29th day of April 1840, to Stevenson and Brockenbrough, as trustees, of two thousand six hundred and eighteen shares of said company; the deed reciting that the remaining three hundred and eighty-two shares were vested in other persons, but were intended to be purchased or got in by him. The answer was sworn to on the 14th of January 1841, and filed on the 6th of March thereafter.

On the 30th of March 1841 an interlocutory decree was rendered, which recites, "that the cause came on to be heard upon the bill, the answer of the defendant John Heth, with the replication thereto, the bill taken for confessed against the other defendants, more than two months having elapsed since the filing of the plaintiffs' bill and the return of the subpœnas, with service acknowledged by the other defendants, and they still failing to appear and answer, and sundry exhibits." The decree then directs accounts to be taken in relation to the trust estate, and amongst them an account showing the exact amount due from the Black Heath company and from Beverly Heth to John Heth as trustee, or to the trust fund. The commissioner, in the report made out in obedience to this 344 decree, states *that John Farrar attended and filed the accounts of John Heth as trustee, with the vouchers, from which the commissioner stated the accounts returned by him. John Farrar was afterwards made a defendant by an amended bill, as clerk and agent of said company; and in his answer admits he was such clerk and agent, and that as such the books and papers of the company were kept by him, and still remained in his possession. In the account returned by the commissioner the trustee was charged as of the 24th of January 1837, with eleven thousand three hundred and forty-five dollars, amount of articles purchased by the Black Heath company. No accounts were taken at this time with any parties except with the trustee; and in the account so taken the trustee was charged with the whole amount of the sales of the trust property; and there being no exception, the account was confirmed; and on the 27th of October 1841 an interlocutory decree was rendered against John Heth for the whole amount of the trust fund unaccounted for. The decree directed the commissioner, if required by the plaintiffs, to execute those parts of the decretal order directing the accounts, which had not been executed; and then proceeds to declare that liberty is hereby reserved to the plaintiffs to resort to this court for any further decree against the defendants, or any of them, and as to any of the subjects mentioned in the plaintiffs' bill in this suit, to which they may show themselves entitled in the event this decree shall prove unavailing in the whole or in any part. And liberty was given to them to amend their bill and make new parties.

On this decree an execution was issued against John Heth; the sum of four hundred and thirteen dollars and thirty-six cents made as of the 7th of February 1841; and a return of no effects found to make the balance.

Having thus made an unsuccessful
345 effort to collect *the amount of the trust fund from the trustee, and shown by the official return of the proper officer, that the decree against him had proved unavailing for nearly the whole amount decreed, the appellees, under the leave reserved to them in the said decree, to resort to the court for any further decree against the defendants, or any of them, and as to any of the subjects mentioned in the suit, filed their amended and supplemental bill on the 11th of February 1842, in which they make new parties, amongst them the Chesterfield coal and iron mining company, a new company incorporated by an act of assembly passed the 15th December 1840; Sess. Acts of 1840–41, p. 148; and allege in their bill, amongst other things, that John Heth, untruly pretending that he was the owner of the whole stock of the Black Heath company, had made some contract with the Chesterfield coal and iron mining company, by which the whole property of the Black Heath company, except slaves, had been taken possession of by the Chesterfield company, by their agents in this country; and that the stockholders of the latter company were all aliens, and with the exception of one of the agents, non-residents. They further state, that if John Heth had ever executed a deed conveying the property or stock of the Black Heath company to the members of the Chesterfield company, it had never been recorded in the County court of Chesterfield county, the county where the property was situated. And the bill contains the further and most material averment bearing on one of the questions arising in this controversy, that the property being corporate property, even if John Heth had been the owner of all the stock, he had no legal power or authority to convey as an individual the corporate property, exempt from the payment of the debts of the company. The bill furthermore, as to this branch of the case, alleges a sale
346 by John Heth of some of the *slaves purchased by the Black Heath company, and seeks to charge them in the hands of the purchasers or incumbrancers; and prays that the debt due from the Black Heath company be satisfied out of the proceeds of said slaves, or out of the other property of the Black Heath company in the possession of the Chesterfield company, and under the control of their agents, who are made defendants.

The bill also details the circumstances attending the sale of the land and other trust property to Beverly Heth; alleges a conveyance by Beverly Heth of the land and slaves pending the suit, to a trustee to secure certain creditors; and prays that the property be reconveyed to the appellees, or sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of the debt due to them from John Heth.

On the 1st of November 1842 the cause again came on to be heard on that branch of the case affecting Beverly Heth's purchases; and the court decreed that John Heth committed a breach of trust in the sale of the trust property to Beverly Heth, in which the latter actively concurred; that the other defendants claiming under him were pendente lite purchasers, and they with their vendor should be regarded as trustees of the property for the appellees; and directed a reconveyance thereof to a trustee for their use. And an enquiry was directed to ascertain what portion of the property held by the trustees of Beverly Heth was the property sold to him by John Heth as trust property; and an account of hires of the personal property, and of rents, profits and permanent improvements was directed.

From this decree an appeal was taken to this court by two of the creditors of Beverly Heth. This appeal brought up the whole case for revision. The correctness of the decree of the 27th of October 1841 against John Heth for the 347 whole amount of the trust *fund, reserving liberty to pursue the purchasers if the decree against the trustee was unavailing, as well as the propriety of the decree of November 1st, 1842, setting aside the sale of the land, and directing a reconveyance of the land and such of the slaves as upon enquiry should be ascertained to have been part of the trust fund, were open for consideration.

It was assigned as one of the errors committed in the cause, that to repudiate the sales made by the trustee was incompatible with the course pursued, as the appellees had sought to enforce them by every means in their power; had taken a decree against the trustee for the balance due, and in part enforced it. On the 12th of May 1845, this court affirmed the decree.

After this affirmance, further proceedings took place in the court below in relation to the branch of the case now under consideration; and a report was made by the commissioner ascertaining the amount of the debt due from the Black Heath company on account of the slaves purchased at the sale of the trust property. In this account the company receives credit for several sums paid as interest by the company on this debt; and the deposition of John Farrar proves that those charges against the appellees were taken from the books of the company. He also furnishes a list of the slaves purchased for the company, and their prices: and in his answer to the amended bill, he states that a short time after the trust sale the president of the company directed him as clerk to charge against the company on its books a note given to John Heth for the amount of the company's purchase at the sale of the trust estate; which entry he made in the presence of the president.

From this reference to the pleadings and proofs in the cause, there can be no question as to the existence of the debt at one time. It is charged in the original 348 *bill, and that bill was taken as for confessed against the Black Heath company. This of itself concludes the company. But the report of the commissioner charged John Heth with the debt; and to that report there was no exception. And the clerk and agent of the company proves that the debt was entered on the books of the company as a charge against it, and credits entered for the interest paid.

The original existence of the debt does not appear to have been seriously controverted; and accordingly, in the special statement made out at the instance of the Chesterfield company, the Black Heath company is charged with the amount given for the property purchased at the trust sale.

But it is argued, that the appellees have elected to disaffirm the sale and pursue the property; that the purchase was merely void, and the slaves remained their property. It is true that John Heth having been the agent for the Black Heath company in making the purchase, as well as the trustee who sold, the company could not deny notice; nor have they done so. That it was a gross violation of duty and breach of trust in the trustee, to turn over the trust property to the company of which he was principal stockholder and the manager, without securing and investing the price, has not been controverted; and the cestuis que trust had a right to set aside the sale, and follow the property, if it could be traced, in the hands of the company, or any others, claiming it with notice of the breach of trust.

The question raised by this objection has already been adjudicated in this cause. Although the court gave a personal decree against the trustee for the whole amount for which he sold the trust property, it affirmed the right of the appellees to pursue the purchasers as to any of the subjects mentioned in the bill, if the decree against the trustee proved unavailing;
349 *and the construction put upon this reservation is shown by the decree on the amended bill, which set aside the sale of the land and such of the slaves as were purchased by Beverly Heth, so far as they could be traced in the hands of purchasers with notice: the court thus holding that a personal decree against the trustee for the price did not preclude a resort to the property itself in the hands of the wrong-doer participating in the breach of the trust, or in the hands of those who had notice of the fraud. And if the property can be so pursued, the reason applies with equal force to the party himself. All who participate in a breach of trust are jointly and severally liable. A purchaser concurring in a fraudulent breach of trust, and, as in this case, actively participating in it, and converting the property to his own use, incurs the like liability with the fraudulent trustee. Pinckard v. Woods, 8 Gratt. 140; Attorney General v. Corporation of Leicester, 7 Beav. R. 176, 29 Eng. Ch. R. 175; Hill on Trustees 520, n. The relief afforded in equity in such cases is two fold, retrospective in order to remedy the mischief done, and prospective to prevent further injury. Hill on Trustees 521. The court endeavors in the first place to replace the parties in the same situation they would have been in if no breach of trust had been committed. And, therefore, where the trust property improperly disposed of can be followed in specie, as where it consists of real estate, it will compel the trustee or party in possession, if the latter have taken with notice of the trust, to reconvey the estate to the purposes of the trust. Hill on Trustees 522.

And where trust moneys are followed into land, the cestui que trust may either take the land for the whole, or may have a decree for a sale; and if there be a deficiency, then prove on the estate of the trustee. Hill 522, n. 1. It is true that where property 350 has been *improperly sold by a trustee, the cestui que trust cannot claim both price and property; for that would be to get a double satisfaction; but he is entitled to one or the other; and it does not lie in the mouth of the fraudulent participator in the breach of trust to say that the sale was void and so no debt was due; for this would be setting up his own wrong to protect himself. Nor can the decree of the court replacing the parties in the same situation they would have been in if no breach of trust had been committed, by restoring the property where it can be restored, be held to release the party from all personal responsibility for the residue which the purchaser has converted to his own use.

In this case, as all were before the court, and jointly and severally liable, the decree against the trustee was for their benefit; for if the fund could have been collected and invested according to the stipulations of the deed of trust, they would have been relieved, as it was not alleged that the prices bid for the property were too low; and the trustee was empowered from time to time to vest any part of the property in real estate or other property. The breach of trust resulted from his failure to collect the price, and in permitting the purchasers to take and convert the trust property to their own purposes, without paying for it, or giving any adequate security for the money. It was therefore proper, in every aspect of the case, that an effort should be made to collect the amount from the trustee before resorting either to the property or the purchasers.

If these views as to the effect of the decree in this case, or of the law as applicable to the facts of the cause, are correct, the court did not err in holding that the existence of the debt due to the appellees by the Black Heath company was proved, and that they had not lost their right to proceed against the company for payment: and, therefore, the first exception taken by 351 *the Chesterfield coal and iron mining company to the report of Commissioner Shore, made under the decree of the 28th of October 1848, was properly overruled.

The second and third exceptions were sustained, and the credits allowed.

The prices of the two slaves surrendered to the appellees voluntarily by R. Gwathmey and Lewis Rogers, have been applied to the principal of the debt, the most favorable mode of applying the credit for the appellants. And having had the use of the slaves in a dangerous occupation, whereby one is proved to have been badly injured, a credit for their value, as at the time they were returned, is as much as they could claim.

Nor is there any just pretension for a claim to a credit for the whole amount of Beverly Heth's purchases. They amounted to twenty-five thousand one hundred and three dollars and six cents. The price of the land was fifteen thousand dollars, leaving upwards of ten thousand dollars for slaves and other property. Of the slaves, it would seem six were recovered. For the land which was decreed to be restored and the price of the slaves John Heth would be entitled to a credit; but it is manifest the six slaves restored did not sell for the ten thousand dollars; and that sum, with the interest, would far exceed the value of the slaves returned, leaving Beverly Heth largely indebted to the trust fund. The assumption that a credit should be given for the whole amount of Beverly Heth's purchases, because by pursuing the property the sale must be considered as disaffirmed, and the appellees be restricted to the property alone, has already been adverted to. So far as the trust property could be reached, they were entitled to pursue it, without thereby losing their remedy against the fraudulent alienee for the price of so much as was converted to his own use, and could not be restored in specie. Nor does 352 the failure *of the appellees to pursue the property in the hands of other purchasers or claimants, furnish any ground of complaint to their immediate debtor, the Black Heath company. Being directly responsible as participating in the breach of trust, the appellees have a right to look to the company for payment, as one of the original wrong-doers; and the company cannot insist on their creditor being sent on a doubtful and perhaps ineffectual pursuit of the property in the hands of those who, but for the intervention of the company, would not have acquired the possession of it.

If then the Black Heath company was alone sued, the appellees would have a right to a recovery against it for the amount of their claim, as ascertained by the decree, and to satisfaction out of the corporate property. And it remains to enquire whether, under the facts appearing in this record, they can charge this debt on the Chesterfield coal and iron mining company, either as holding the property of the Black Heath company, or as its successor liable for its debts at least to the extent of the property received from it.

The Black Heath company of colliers was incorporated by an act passed February 20th, 1833. The preamble, after reciting that B. Randolph, John Heth and Beverly Heth represented to the general assembly that they were owners of certain lands in Chesterfield county, on which there are valuable mines of coal, of a coal yard, and certain personal property, consisting of slaves, &c., and that they were desirous of carrying on their business under the management of a corporate body, proceeded to enact that the capital stock, consisting of the real and personal property aforesaid, should be divided into three thousand shares, and that as soon as one thousand five hundred shares shall have been sold on the joint account of the proprietors, and by them duly conveyed by deeds recorded in said county, then that the title that 353 the three *proprietors had in the capital stock should be vested in them and the purchasers in proportion to the shares respectively held by them, and that the stockholders, their heirs and assigns, should be a body politic and corporate by the name, &c., with the usual corporate powers. And it was further provided, that the stock should be real estate, and as such pass by descent, devise and sale. By an act passed January 10th, 1837, Sess. Acts 202, so much of the act before mentioned as declared the stock to be real estate, was repealed; and in lieu thereof it was enacted that it should be deemed personal estate, to be transferred, and certificates thereof issued in such manner as the president and directors or stockholders in general meeting should prescribe; with a proviso, that nothing in the act should be so construed as to prevent the company from selling and conveying any part of such real estate as they may hold, and which had been incorporated into stock, and thereby declared personal estate; or to authorize the conveyance of such real estate, when sold or disposed of, in any manner than that prescribed by the laws of the commonwealth for the conveyance or disposal of real estate; and when so sold and conveyed, from being considered as real estate. These two acts constituted the character of the Black Heath company, when the transactions between John Heth and the parties afterwards incorporated in the name of the Chesterfield coal and iron mining company, took place.

On the 29th of April 1840 a deed was executed between John Heth of the first part, Stevenson and Brockenbrough of the second part, and various individuals residing in England, of the third part; which, after reciting the charter of the Black Heath company as aforesaid, describing its landed property, reciting that two thousand six hundred and eighteen shares of the stock 354 were then vested in John Heth, *and that he intended to get in the remaining outstanding shares vested in other persons; and describing various other portions of real estate belonging to Heth, or over which he had the control, proceeds to recite that said John Heth had proposed to the parties of the third part to form a company with them, to carry on the business of coal and iron mining, and to vest or to cause and procure to be vested in such company the fee simple and inheritance in possession, free from all incumbrance of the real or landed property of the Black Heath company, and the other lands described; and that the said parties of the third part had agreed with John Heth to join in forming such company, and that they should purchase said property which John Heth had so proposed to vest in them, in case the authority of the general assembly could be obtained in the manner described. The deed then, for the consideration therein mentioned, sets forth that John Heth had that day transferred the two thousand six hundred and eighteen shares of said Black Heath company to the parties of the second part, on the books kept for the transfer of such shares; and had also conveyed the other land owned by said Heth, to said parties of the second part, upon the various trusts set forth.

On the 15th of December 1840, Sess. Acts 148, an act was passed to incorporate the Chesterfield coal and iron mining company, as provided for in the deed before referred to, and an agreement of the same date with the deed between John Heth and the parties of the third part, named in said deed. By this act the company thereby incorporated was invested with full power and authority in their corporate capacity to take and receive valid conveyances and transfers of all the property and stock owned or occupied by the Black Heath company, setting forth that the said stock consisted of three thousand shares, and describing the 355 *lands of the company. The act also authorized and empowered the company to receive conveyances of and to hold the other property named in the deed of John Heth, before referred to.

After the passage of this act another deed, dated the 3d of August 1841, was entered into between John Heth and the persons constituting the company, by which certain differences between them were compromised, the terms of the agreement and the deed to Stevenson and Brockenbrough somewhat modified, and provision made for the indemnity of the Chesterfield coal and iron mining company against incumbrances and defects of title in the property agreed to be conveyed by John Heth. This deed, however, makes no specific conveyance of any of the property.

In the answer put in by A. F. D. Gifford, he states he is the sole general agent of the Chesterfield company; and he exhibits the deed, the articles of agreement, and the articles of agreement and compromise before mentioned, to show how the company acquired their property. He avers, that as such agent he holds certain conveyances of real estate, all recorded in Chesterfield county, intended in part to carry into effect the contracts made with said John Heth, and which it is not deemed material to the purposes of this suit to file or describe particularly. The answer further alleges, that all the stock of the Black Heath company was regularly transferred to John Heth, and by him conveyed to Stevenson and Brockenbrough, the trustees of the company, and afterwards transferred upon the books of the Black Heath company to the Chesterfield company.

There does not appear, in any part of the record, a conveyance of any real property by the Black Heath company of colliers to the Chesterfield coal and iron mining company. The amended bill averred that John Heth, as an individual, had no legal 356 power or authority *to convey the corporate property, exempt from the debts of the company.

The proviso of the act of January 10th, 1837, making the stock personal estate, whilst it authorized the sale and conveyance of real estate theretofore created into stock, declared the law should not be construed to authorize the conveyance of such real estate in any other manner than that prescribed by law for the conveyance or disposition of real estate. Such conveyance must be by deed duly executed in the name of the corporation by its duly authorized agent. In the absence of any such conveyance, the property still belongs to such company or its successor, the transferee of the stock.

Under this aspect of the case, it is unnecessary to consider many of the propositions so elaborately discussed at the bar: such as that,

The right of a corporation to dispose of and convey its real estate is commensurate with that of an individual.

That although creditors may subject the corporate property, this right does not give a lien so as to attach to the property in the hands of the bona fide purchaser.

Digitized by Google

And although creditors may follow the assets in the hands of corporators who have sold out the whole corporate property and fraudulently appropriated the proceeds, yet such fraudulent appropriation would not affect the bona fide purchaser.

These propositions may all be sound; but they do not affect the present case.

If the appellees had procured a judgment or decree against the Black Heath company of colliers eo nomine, and issued their execution, what would have prevented a levy on the real estate of the company? Once vested in the company, it could be divested only by a conveyance executed by the company. A transfer of all the stock by the old or new stockholders, would 357 *not destroy the relation in which creditors stood to the company and its property.

A share in a joint stock company is not strictly speaking a chattel, but bears a greater resemblance to a chose in action. "If (says C. J. Shaw) a share in a bank is not a chose in action, it is in the nature of a chose in action, and what is more to the purpose, it is personal property." By bank-stock, say the Supreme court of Tennessee, is meant individual interest in the dividends as declared, and a right to a distribution pro rata of the effects at the expiration of the charter. Angel & Ames Corp. § 560, where the cases are cited.

A corporation may be seized of real property, as well as be possessed of personal property; but, as has been said by Lord Abinger, "the interest of each individual shareholder is a share of the net produce of both when brought into one fund." Bradley v. Holdsworth, 3 Mees. & Welsb. R. 422. And in Humble v. Mitchell, 11 Adol. & Ell. R. 205, 39 Eng. C. L. R. 46, it was held that shares in a joint stock company such as this, are mere choses in action, incapable of delivery, and not within the scope of the statute of frauds requiring certain contracts for the sale of goods, wares and merchandise, to be in writing. It would seem, therefore, to be clear law, that where, as in this case, the stock is declared to be personal estate, and the certificates are made transferable on the books of the corporation, and it is authorized to acquire real estate, such estate is vested in it as a corporation, and not in the individual shareholders; that the certificate of stock is evidence of the right of the owner to his proportion of the profits or dividends, and on the expiration of the charter, to his proportion of the assets remaining after the payment of the debts; and every purchaser of the stock takes it subject to the same liabilities. The transferee occupies the place—sits in the seat of his predecessor.

358 *It has been argued that the agreement of the parties contemplated and provided for a purchase of the property which John Heth proposed to vest in them, and that the law incorporating the Chesterfield company invested it with the power and authority, in its corporate capacity, to take and receive valid conveyances and transfers of all the property and stock of the Black Heath company. It may be remarked that the deeds referred to make no provision, in express terms, for a conveyance by the Black Heath company. And the law, while it authorizes a conveyance, also provides for a transfer of the stock. If a mere vesting of the property was all the law contemplated, there would have been no use in a transfer of the stock. By providing for both, the authority was given to step into the place of the corporation so merged in the one newly created; and the new corporation, by accepting the transfer of the entire stock, have thereby, under the authority given by their charter, placed themselves in the position of successors to the former corporation, liable, to the extent of the property received, to the debts, and entitled to all the rights of the former corporation. They have so construed their authority under the charter, by taking possession of and holding the property of the Black Heath company as transferees of the stock, since the time limited for the expiration of the charter of the Black Heath company.

It was decided in Rider v. Union Factory, 7 Leigh 154, that as a corporation, without express provision of law, could never hold property, and can only hold it for so long a time as the charter permits, that after the expiration of its charter it can hold no property; and therefore a judgment against it would be fruitless. And 1 Lev. 237, is cited to show, that by the principles of the common law debts of a corporation, either to it or from it, are extinguished by its dissolution. This decision was in 1836. And afterwards, and no doubt 359 *in consequence of the suggestion contained in the opinion in that case, the act of February 13th, 1837, now incorporated in the Code, was passed. That act prescribed general regulations for the incorporation of manufacturing and mining companies which might thereafter be incorporated, and provided that when such corporation should be dissolved by lapse of time or other cause, the corporate name, with the right to sue and be sued, should continue for the purpose of collecting and paying debts and the distribution of its property.

As this law in terms was limited to joint stock companies thereafter incorporated, a grave question might arise as to the right of the Chesterfield company to hold any of the property of the Black Heath company, since the time limited for its existence has expired, if the argument of the appellants and their construction of the agreements of the parties and the charter of the Chesterfield company be correct. The property was vested in the Black Heath company. The law expressly provided for the mode of conveying such property; and no such conveyance is shown. The legal title must therefore have continued in the Black Heath company until its existence, as limited by the charter, expired. No such difficulty arises, by giving the act incorporating the Chesterfield company the construction contended for by the appellees, as authorizing the latter company, by accepting a transfer of the stock, to take the place of the former company, to incorporate the former company with itself, and as its successors to hold its property, with all its rights, and subject to all its liabilities under the new charter.

This, it seems to me, is the true construction to be given to the acts of these parties, and the charters referred to. It conforms with the understandig of the parties, as manifested by their acts. John Heth, in his answer to the original bill filed after 360 the deed to *Stevenson and Brockenbrough, the trustees of these parties, and after the passage of the law incorporating the Chesterfield coal and iron mining company, states that the sufficiency of the security for the debt due from the Black Heath company for the purchase of slaves, was undoubted, as until it was paid, the best property of that company was bound for it. And the Chesterfield company, by taking a transfer of stock as their evidence of right, and providing for their indemnity, by retaining a lien on the royalty to be paid to John Heth, and stipulating for a bond in the penalty of one hundred thousand dollars on the payment of the balance of the purchase money, with condition to indemnify them for any defects of title, &c. showed that they were not looking to any conveyance by the Black Heath company, in its corporate capacity, but that they were looking to John Heth, as the holder of the stock, to a substitution to his rights as such stockholder, and to an indemnity to be provided by him personally against defects of title. I think the appellees have, under the facts disclosed by the record, a right to charge their debt on the property of the Black Heath company in the hands of the Chesterfield company as the successors of the first company.

Nor do I think the appellees were under any obligation to convene all the creditors of the Black Heath company. They were asserting their individual claim against their personal debtor. It is not a creditor's bill calling for a distribution of the assets of an insolvent corporation amongst all entitled to participate. They occupy the position of any other creditor of a corporation seeking satisfaction by judgment and execution against their debtor. The corporate property can alone be charged, and there would be as much reason to require every creditor, the nature of whose claim compels a resort to equity, to convene all the creditors, as to exact it from these appellees. They 361 have *established their debt, and shown that the property held is much more than sufficient to pay it.

But an order was made to convene the creditors. If they failed to appear before the commissioner and prove their debts, the appellees were not in fault.

After the decree establishing the right of the appellees, a petition was offered by William J. Barksdale and others, asking, for the reasons set forth in the petition, that the appellees should be required to amend their bill, and make them defendants. The motion was overruled, and they have united in the petition for an appeal; and the refusal of the court to require them to be made parties, is assigned as error. The parties have not brought before this court the record of Barksdale v. Heth, referred to in the petition; but that perhaps would not vary the case. The motion of these petitioners seems to be of a somewhat anomalous character. The appellees have proceeded against the Black Heath company, and the Chesterfield company as its successor, to establish a personal debt; and after a decree in their favor, third persons, strangers to the proceeding, and who do not claim to be creditors even of either company, insist upon being made parties, upon the ground, in substance, that they are creditors of John Heth, who, as they allege, was a creditor of the Chesterfield company, for certain royalties, &c. That if the Chesterfield company is compelled to pay this debt to the appellees, they may insist on deducting the amount so applied from the sum they would otherwise be liable for to John Heth, and so the ability of John Heth to pay the petitioners would be diminished to that extent.

For the same reason, every creditor might insist on his right to intervene between any other creditor and the common debtor. For a recovery and satisfaction of the debt due to one creditor would diminish the means of the common debtor.

362 *This application seeks to carry the doctrine a step further. For this company is not the common debtor. These petitioners are creditors of John Heth, and seek to intervene between the appellees and their personal debtor, because the latter, in the event of being compelled to pay, may seek indemnity from John Heth, by applying his funds in the hands of the company to this purpose. With this question the appellees have no concern. Whether their debtor is or is not a debtor of Heth, and whether the latter is bound to indemnify the company on account of this recovery, does not affect them. The right of the company to such indemnity, and to apply the royalty, or any other funds of John Heth, under the control of the company, to that purpose, must be litigated between the company and John Heth, and those claiming under him. The appellees have shown that the company is their personal debtor, and has effects sufficient to pay the debt; and it would be most oppressive on them to be required to renew the contest with every stranger whose claims against others may be remotely and in some collateral way affected by such recovery.

I think the decree should be affirmed.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Allen, P.

Decree affirmed.

363 *Reid's Adm'r v. Blackstone & als.

April Term, 1858, Richmond.

Wills -- Precatory Words -- Case at Bar.—Testator gives his whole estate, including lands, slaves, bonds, &c., to his nephew R. of Pittsburg. And then in a postscript he says, "I wish you to take the negroes to Pennsylvania where they will be free." He appointed no executor, but B. qualified as administrator with the will annexed.

1. Same—Same—Trust.—QUÆRE: If the will creates a trust in favor of the negroes.
2. Same—Emancipation of Slaves—Duty of Administrator.—If the negroes are entitled to their freedom, they cannot maintain an action at law for its recovery against B. the administrator; his duty is to deliver them to R.
3. Same—Same—Right of Slave to Action at Law against Executor.†—Slaves emancipated by will cannot maintain an action at law against the executor to recover their freedom, without proving the assent of the executor to the bequest.

This was an action at law for freedom, in the Circuit court of Fairfax county, brought by the appellees against the appellant. The case is stated in the opinion of Judge Moncure.

The Attorney General, for the appellant.
Lawrence B. Taylor, for the appellees.

MONCURE, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a supersedeas to a judgment of the Circuit court of Fairfax, in a suit for freedom, brought by Joseph Blackstone and two others against Henry W. Thomas, adm'r de bonis non with the will annexed of Patrick J. Reid. The jury found in a special verdict, that the said Reid died in the county of Fairfax, having first made his will, which, after his death, to wit, on the 16th of February 1852, was duly admitted to record in the County court of said county, and is in the words and figures following, viz:

364 *"In the name of God, amen. I will and bequeath to my nephew John Reid of Pittsburg all that I die possessed of, land, negroes, bonds, cash, horses and cows and household furniture. If Barney Reid is living or any other of my relations, I wish him to divide equally among them.

P. J. Reid,

Trust—Precatory Words.—There has been considerable fluctuation of judicial opinion of late years as to the doctrine of implying a trust on words of recommendation, entreaty, hope, etc. 2 Min. Inst. (4th Ed.) 250. The modern tendency seems to be to abandon the rule that, in the interpretation of wills, words of hope, recommendation, etc., prima facie, create a trust (4 Va. Law Reg. 545), and to give such recommendatory expressions their natural, ordinary, and familiar sense, and, having arrived at the intention of the testator, to let that intention, if lawful, be the rule of decision in the particular case. 2 Min. Inst. (4th Ed.) 251; note to Harrisons v. Harrison, 2 Gratt. 1, 44 Am. Dec. 377; Crump v. Redd, 6 Gratt. 372.

In 4 Va. Law Reg. 545, it is said: "In Harrisons v. Harrison, 2 Gratt. 1, the language of the will was: 'In the utmost confidence in my wife, I leave to her all my worldly goods, to sell or to keep for distribution amongst our dear children, as she may think proper. My whole estate, real and personal, are left in fee simple to her; only requesting her to make an equal distribution amongst our heirs.' This was held to constitute a trust, carrying a life-estate only to the widow, with remainder in trust for the children of the marriage. BROOKE, J., dissented, holding that no trust was created.

"In Rhett v. Mason, 18 Gratt. 541, where the gift was to the wife for life, 'for her maintenance and support and for the maintenance and support of our children,' it was held that no trust was created for the children, but that the language, 'for the maintenance and support of our children,' was a mere expression of the motive of the gift. MONCURE, P., in delivering the opinion, quotes, with apparent approval, the dissenting opinion of BROOKE, J., in Harrisons v. Harrison. The decision in Rhett v. Mason (supra) has been followed by a long line of Virginia cases, among the last of which is Fackler v. Berry, 93 Va. 565, 25 S. E. Rep. 887 (2 Va. Law Reg. 531, and note)."

As to the effect of the words, "for the sole and separate use of herself and child or children," on a gift to the wife, see foot-note to Leake v. Benson, 29 Gratt. 153, and cases collected; foot-note to Rhett v. Mason, 18 Gratt. 541, and cases collected.

See also, on the subject of precatory trusts, an extensive note collecting the authorities appended to Harrisons v. Harrison, 44 Am. Dec. 365.

Same—Same—Case at Bar.—Hon. John Randolph Tucker, who was counsel for the administrator in the principal case, narrates its subsequent history in a letter published in 2 Va. Law Reg. 231. He says: "The slaves filed a bill in equity, making the administrator and the legatee parties thereto. The court (JUDGE JOHN W. TYLER) decided in their favor, and decreed against the legatee in favor of the trust for emancipation. The administrator and legatee appealed, and the question, free from all technical obstructions, was presented by me, on application for appeal, with full argument. The court refused to grant an appeal; so that the unanimous court held that the will clearly created a trust for emancipation. * * * This case is one where all the qualities required of precatory words in order to their validity are found to concur—certainty of object, of subject, and of purpose. The use of the word 'wish,' which usually expresses only desire, is coupled with the summons of the legatee, as it were, to the presence of the testator, with the admonitory prefix, 'N. B.'; and the statement presents the whole rationale of the testamentary disposal, in selecting as legatee a nonresident of Virginia, and a resident of a free state, to which, if slaves were taken, freedom would result.

"Despite the late tendency in England, stated in Lambe v. Eames, L. R., 6 Ch. App. 597, by LORD JUSTICE JAMES, and followed in other decisions, cited and commented on in Brett's L. C. Eq. 13, this decision in the Reid will case would be held valid. The refusal of the appeal excluded all doubt in the mind of the court on the case, and was acquiesced in by my client, JUDGE THOMAS and myself, as a sound decision, and valid as authority in Virginia."

Nov. 15, 1851. From the county of Austin, Ireland.

N. B.--I wish you to take the negroes to Penn'a, where they will be free.

P. J. Ried."

That the plaintiffs were negro slaves of said P. J. Reid at the time of his death, and are now held in slavery by the defendant, and have been so held since the death of said Reid. And if upon the whole matter so found, it should seem to the court that the issue was for the plaintiffs, then the jury found for them, and assessed the damages of each of them at fifty dollars. But if it should seem to the court that the issue was for the defendant, then the jury found for him.

The court rendered judgment on the said verdict for the plaintiffs; and the defendant obtained a supersedeas.

In the petition for the supersedeas, the first and main error assigned in the judgment is, that upon a true construction of the will of P. J. Reid, the plaintiffs were not entitled to their freedom. The question raised by this assignment of error is discussed at great length, in the petition and in the printed arguments of the counsel on both sides; and many authorities, pro and con, are therein cited. But in the view which this court takes of the case, it will be unnecessary and would be improper now to decide that question. Two other grounds of error in the judgment are relied on, which are thus stated in the petition.

"1st. The administrator or defend-365 ant never assented *to the bequest of emancipation, and an action at law could not be brought. Nor did it appear by the special verdict that there were no debts, for which the negroes, though emancipated, might not be liable.

2d. The will, if it emancipated, did not require the administrator to grant it. The devise is to John Reid in trust for emancipation. It was the administrator's duty to hand them over to the legatee; and a court of equity could alone execute the trust reposed in him. An action at law does not lie under the will against the administrator."

These two grounds of error, in proper order, first present themselves for our consideration; and if they or either of them be well assigned, there is an end of the case. We think they are both well assigned.

As to the 1st. While the statute declares, that "Any person may emancipate any of his slaves by last will in writing, or by deed, recorded in the court of his county or corporation" (Code, ch. 103, § 9), it also declares, that "all slaves emancipated as aforesaid shall be liable for any debt contracted by the person emancipating them, before such emancipation is made." (Id. § 11.) The slaves of a testator emancipated by his will, are a part of his assets, which his personal representative is entitled to receive, and bound to apply if necessary to the payment of his debts. They cannot recover their freedom of the personal representative in an action at law, without proving his assent to their emancipation. Tucker, P., in Nicholas v. Burruss, 4 Leigh 289, 295; Anderson's ex'ors v. Anderson, 11 Id. 616; 2 Lomax Ex'ors 236–238, new edition. He has a right to withhold his assent until he can ascertain that they will not be required for the payment of debts. If he improperly withhold his assent, or retain possession of them longer than is necessary, they are not without remedy, but may obtain relief by a suit in equity. That 366 a court of equity had *jurisdiction in such a case before the enactment of the Code, is well settled by authority. 2 Lomax Ex'ors 338; Patty, &c. v. Colin, &c., 1 Hen. & Munf. 519; Dempsey v. Lawrence, Gilm. 333; Dunn v. Amey, 1 Leigh 465; Paup's adm'r v. Mingo, 4 Leigh 163; Anderson's ex'ors v. Anderson, 11 Id. 616; Ellis v. Jenny, 2 Rob. R. 597; Peter v. Hargrave, 5 Gratt. 12; Jincey v. Winfield's adm'r, 9 Id. 708. There is no material difference between the old and the new law in regard to the remedy of persons unlawfully detained in slavery, as may be seen by comparing 1 Rev. Code, ch. 124, § 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8, with the Code, ch. 106. The same reason exists under the new law as existed under the old for the jurisdiction of a court of equity in such cases; and the authorities above cited are as applicable to the former as they were to the latter. No suit can be maintained, either at law or in equity, for the recovery of freedom, unless it has been conferred in the mode prescribed by law. And the suit must always be brought at law, when there is no impediment to the legal remedy. But the legal remedy may sometimes be obstructed; as where an executor improperly withholds his assent to the emancipation; and then the aid of a court of equity may be invoked to prevent a failure of justice. There can be no right without a remedy; and wherever the law gives a right, it gives by implication, if not expressly, such remedies as may be necessary to recover that right. On this principle the cases before cited depend. And on the same principle it has been held, and is well settled, that emancipated slaves may propound for probate the deed or will conferring their right to freedom. 2 Lom. Ex'ors 337; Redford's adm'r v. Peggy, 6 Rand. 316; Manns v. Givens, 7 Leigh 689; Phœbe v. Baggess, 1 Gratt. 129; Ben Mercer v. Kelso's adm'r, 4 Id. 106.

The assent of the defendant to the emancipation of the plaintiffs being neces-367 sary to maintain this action, *and no such assent having been found in the special verdict, the judgment must for that cause be reversed. In Nicholas v. Burruss, 4 Leigh 289, there was a demurrer to evidence, and the court inferred the assent of the executor from the evidence set out in the demurrer. In this case, even if there had been a demurrer to evidence instead of a special verdict, nothing appears from which such assent could have been inferred. But upon a special verdict, the court cannot infer other facts from those found by the jury. 1 Rob. Pr. 372-3, and the cases cited. In the case of Lemon v. Reynolds, 5 Munf. 552, there was a special verdict, in which it does not appear that the assent of the defendant was found, though the substance only of the verdict is set out in the report. The only question litigated in that case was as to the validity of an emancipation conferred by a will accidentally destroyed in the testator's lifetime, but of which a copy was admitted to probate after his death. No question appears to have been raised, either in the court below or in this court, in regard to the assent of the defendant, who indeed had no counsel in this court. The case occurred in 1817, long before the necessity for proof of an executor's assent to an emancipation conferred by the will of his testator, in an action at law for freedom, had been settled, or even considered, by this court. It cannot be regarded as an authority to show that such proof in such an action is unnecessary, or that the fact may be inferred from a special verdict which finds nothing on the subject. In Hunter v. Humphreys, ante, p. 287, the action was not against the personal representative of the testator under whose will freedom was claimed by the plaintiff, but against the personal representative of a person claiming as legatee under the will. Proof of the former's assent was therefore unnecessary.

As to the second of the two grounds
368 of error last *assigned. The devise of the testator's whole estate, including negroes, is to his nephew John Reid: and whether it be to him in his own right, or as trustee in whole or in part, he alone can maintain an action at law for the estate, or any part of it. He is entitled to receive the whole estate, or so much of it as may remain after the payment of debts and expenses of administration. If the will creates a valid trust in regard to any part of the subject, and there should be a breach of trust, or any reasonable ground for apprehending one, the parties injured or likely to be injured thereby, can obtain relief in a court of equity. The negroes, if emancipated at all, are emancipated by means of such a trust. But whether they are so emancipated or not, is a question which it would be premature now to decide, and which can only be decided in a suit between proper parties. Whether an action at law could be maintained by them against John Reid, after he shall have received possession of them, is also a question which it is unnecessary, and would be improper, now to decide.

We think the judgment must be reversed.

Judgment reversed.

369 *Harcum's Adm'r & als. v. Hudnall.

April Term, 1858, Richmond.

Wills—Case at Bar.—H died in February 1820; and by his will, among other things, gave a tract of land and grist mill thereon, to his wife during her widowhood: and at her death or marriage the same was directed to be sold; but not until his youngest child came of age; and the proceeds of the sale he directed to be equally divided among all his children, to them and their heirs. The widow renounced the provision made for her by the will. There were four children; E who married L in 1836, who died in 1842, and E afterwards married S, and died in 1852, leaving S surviving her; T who died an infant, intestate and unmarried, before the youngest child came of age; M who died in 1840, and bequeathed her share of the property to E; and J the youngest child, who came of age in 1839. L after his marriage with E, and S as the guardian and agent of J, rented out the land; and L took one-third of the rents, and paid one-third to M till her death, when he took two-thirds, and S, as guardian or agent of J, took the other third. After the death of L, E and S rented out the land, and took the rents in the same way; and after the marriage of E with S, he rented it out, and took the rents in the same way until 1850, when W was appointed the agent of J, and took his share of the rents. E left one child by L and two by S. J seems to have lived in New Orleans. S was the administrator of E, and S S was administrator of T, and administrator de bonis non of M. HELD:

1. Same—Equitable Conversion.—The land and mill is to be considered as money, and to pass as such to and from the legatees of H.

2. Same—Same—Election—Essentials.†—Though the legatees might have elected to take the same as land, yet such an intention must have been clearly manifested; and all the parties interested in the property must have united in the election.

Equitable Conversion.—In Zane v. Sawtell, 11 W. Va. 48, it was said: "A court of equity regards lands deeded or devised to be sold and converted into money, or money either articled or bequeathed to be invested in land as having the character of property into which it is to be converted, though the actual conversion by sale or purchase as the case may be, has not been actually effected. *Harcum's Adm'r &c. v. 3. Same—Same—Same—Evidence—Case at Bar.‡—The renting out the land and taking the rents by L, during his life, is not sufficient evidence of an election on his part to take the land as land.

4. Same—Same—Same—Same—Same.—M having in her will spoken of a bill about to be filed for the sale of the land, and having given either the land or the proceeds of sale to E, it is evident she had not elected to take the land as land; and therefore no election by L could change the character of the bequest.

370 *5. Same—Same—Sale after Specified Period—Case at Bar.—The property having been directed to be sold when J came of age, it will be considered as money from that period: And the interest which E took under her father's will being an interest in money, the proceeds of the sale of the property whenever it should be made, at her death nothing passed to her children as her heirs at law.

6. Same—Same—Same—Nature of Property after That Time.—M having lived until J came of age, her bequest to E was a bequest of money, the proceeds of the sale of the land.

7. Same—Same—Same—Nature of Property before That Time—Quære.—T having died before J came of age, and therefore before the time fixed for the sale of the property, quære, if his interest passed as real estate to his heirs, or as money to his administrator.

8. Same—Same—Same—Same.—If T's interest descended to his heirs, they took it subject to be converted into money by a sale, just as he held it.

9. Same—No Debt Due from Estate—Rights of Beneficiaries.—There being no suggestion by the administrator of T and M, that there are any debts due from them, the interest of T in the property may be distributed among his brother and sisters; and E may take directly her sister's third of the whole under her will, without regard to the claim of S as administrator of T and M.

10. Same—Equitable Conversion—Nature of Beneficiary's Interest—Case at Bar.§—The interest of E was not an estate in the premises, but a mere chose in action, a right to have a sale of the property, and to receive her two-thirds of the proceeds. The act of her first husband L in renting out the land and receiving the rents, was not a reduction of the chose in action into possession; and therefore on his death it survived to E; and on her second marriage and death, her surviving husband is entitled to it as her administrator.

11. Same—Same—Sale at Future Time—Right to the Rent before Sale.—The rents of the property before the sale belonged to the persons who were entitled to the principal subject, and would go to them in common with the moneys arising from the sale, as personal property. And those received by L in his lifetime were thus reduced into his possession, and became his absolute property.

This was a suit in equity instituted in September 1853, in the Circuit court of Northumberland county, by John J. Hudnall the younger, for the division of the estate left by his father; and the only subject of controversy was the land.

John Hudnall the elder died prior to February 14th, 1820, having left a will, 371 which was admitted to probate *on that day. By his will he gave to his wife certain slaves by name, certain other personal property, and the plantation on which he lived and his water grist mill, to be held by her during her widowhood, for the support of herself and of the testator's children. At the death or marriage of his wife, he gave all the slaves and personal property to be equally divided among all his children. And at the death or marriage of his wife, he directed that his mill and land should be sold; but it should not be sold until his youngest child came to the age of twenty-one years. And the proceeds of the sale of said mill and land he directed to be equally divided among all his children, to them and their heirs. William Hudnall, who was appointed executor, refused to qualify, and administration with the will annexed was committed to William Harding. The widow also renounced the provision made for her by the will. There were four children. Elizabeth, who married Leroy Harcum, in 1836, who died in 1842. She afterwards married Samuel Harcum, and died in 1852, leaving him surviving; and he qualified as administrator on her estate. Thomas Hudnall died an infant, intestate and unmarried, before the youngest child came of age. Margaret Ann died in 1840, having made her will, in which reciting, that steps had been taken to obtain a decree for the sale of the land, for the purpose of distribution, she gave her share of the proceeds of sale, if it was sold, after paying her debts, to her sister Eliza-

to do so before the sale has been made; and this election they may make as well by acts or declarations clearly indicating it as by application to a court of equity. Craig v. Leslie, 3 Wheat. 563; Harcum's Adm'r v. Hudnall, 14 Gratt. 369." See also, in accord, the principal case cited in Zane v. Sawtell, 11 W. Va. 49.

‡Same—Same—Evidence.—In Shanks v. Edmondson, 28 Gratt. 812, it was said: "The election to hold such real estate, either by a person sui juris, or by a married woman, made by her husband in her behalf, or conjointly with himself, must be plainly and distinctly proven, and cannot be left to mere inference, unless such inference is so strong from all the circumstances as to be equivalent to positive proof of a clear intention so to elect. beth. And if the land should not be sold, that it should go to Elizabeth and at her death to the heir or heirs of her body. Leroy Harcum qualified as administrator with the will annexed on her estate. John J. the youngest child was born in 1818, and came of age therefore in 1839. He seems to have lived for years in New Orleans. It does not appear in the record when the widow of John Hudnall died.

372 *During the lifetime of Leroy Harcum, and after his marriage with Elizabeth, he and Samuel Harcum, who acted as guardian or agent of John J. Hudnall, rented out the land devised by John Hudnall, the elder, jointly, as a whole tract, and Leroy Harcum took two-thirds of the rents, including the share of Margaret Ann, and Samuel Harcum as guardian or agent of John J. Hudnall, the plaintiff, took the other third. After the death of Leroy Harcum, Elizabeth his widow, and Samuel Harcum as agent of John J. Hudnall, rented out the land jointly, and took the rents in the same proportions, until her marriage with said Samuel Harcum, when he rented the land out himself, and took two-thirds to himself and one-third as the agent of John Hudnall, until 1850, when he settled with said John J. Hudnall. And since 1850 Harcum rented out the land and received two-thirds of the rents himself; but he then ceased to act as the agent of John J. Hudnall, who at that time appointed William B. Hudnall as his agent to receive his part of the rents. Elizabeth left one son by her first and two children by her last husband. And at the time of the decree Samuel L. Straughan was the personal representative of Margaret Ann and Thomas Hudnall.

The cause came on first to be heard on the 28th of October 1853, when the court held that the remainder in the land and mill mentioned in the will of John Hudnall deceased, was by his will converted into personal estate, in equity, and that the right thereto devolved upon the four children the legatees of the testator as legatees of personalty, and upon the personal representative of such as were dead. And a commissioner was appointed to sell the land and mill.

After this decree was made William B. Hudnall, the administrator of Leroy Harcum deceased, filed his petition asking to be made a party in the cause, and claiming that the will of John Hudnall having 373 converted *the land and mill into personal estate, Leroy Harcum had reduced it into possession during his marriage with his wife Elizabeth; and this included his wife's share of the interest of her brother Thomas, and the whole of the share of Margaret Ann, both of whom were dead whilst he was alive. The petitioner relied on the possession of the land by Leroy Harcum, and his renting it out and receiving two-thirds of the rents, as the means by which his wife's interest in the property had been reduced into his possession.

The cause came on again to be heard in April 1854, upon the report of the commissioner and the petition of Leroy Harcum's administrator, when the court confirmed the report, and held that the interest of Elizabeth Hudnall, as legatee under her father's will, as distributee of her brother Thomas, and as devisee of Margaret Ann, survived to her upon the death of her first husband Leroy Harcum, without having reduced the same into possession; and that the proceeds of the sale of the land, when due and collected, belonged to Samuel Harcum as her administrator, to the extent of her interest, which was two-thirds thereof: and the petition was therefore overruled. From this decree Leroy Harcum's administrator and Leroy Harcum his son applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

Patton, for the appellants.
C. Robinson, for the appellees.

LEE, J. That the effect of the disposition made by John Hudnall of his real estate by his will was, in the view of the court of equity, to change its character and as between the representatives of the realty and the personalty of those who were to take under the will, to render it transmissible as money, is agreed by the counsel for the appellants and for the appellee 374 *Samuel Harcum. Nor could this be successfully questioned on behalf of the children of Mrs. Harcum. It is a familiar doctrine of that court that land articled or devised to be sold and converted into money, or money articled or bequeathed to be invested in land shall assume the very character of the property into which it is to be converted; and if the new form thus impressed upon it remain unchanged, it will pass to such of the representatives of those who take under the will as would be entitled to it as property of the character into which it is to be converted. 2 Story's Eq. Jur. § 79, 1212; Fletcher v. Ashburner, 1 Bro. Ch. Cas. 497, and editor's note; Craig v. Leslie, 3 Wheat. R. 563, and cases cited by Judge Washington. And land thus directed to be converted into money, will pass as money although the actual conversion by a sale may not yet have been effected; and if the will directing the conversion also dispose of the proceeds, the gift of the proceeds is to be considered as a gift of personal estate. Tazewell v. Smith's adm'r, 1 Rand. 313; Pratt v. Taliaferro, 3 Leigh 419; Craig v. Leslie, ubi supra; Ashby v. Palmer, 1 Meriv. R. 296.

But though the subject thus directed to be converted is thus stamped with the character of the property into which it is to be converted, the party entitled to the beneficial interest may elect to prevent the actual conversion, and to hold it in the form in which he found it; and this election he may make by application to the court of equity or by unequivocal acts or declarations plainly manifesting his determination. Cruse v. Barley, 3 P. Wms. 22, n. 1; Edwards et ux. v. Countess of Warwick, 2 P. Wms. 171, 175, n.; Craig v. Leslie, ubi sup.; 2 Story's Equ. Jur. § 793. If however he die without having made an election, the property will pass to his heirs or personal representatives just as it 375 would have passed if the purpose *of the will or other instrument under which he claimed had been fully carried into effect and the conversion actually made before his death. Kirkman v. Miles, 13 Ves. R. 338; Edwards et ux. v. Countess of Warwick, 2 P. Wms., ubi supra; Craig v. Leslie, 3 Wheat. 563, 577 et seq.; 2 Story's Equ. Jur. § 793, and authorities cited in n. 1.

Thus in a controversy between the heir and personal representative of a party who was beneficially entitled to a subject thus directed to be converted, as to the succession to the property, it becomes material to ascertain whether such party had made an election to retain the subject as it was and dispense with the actual conversion, as it is not the mere right to make the election, but the actual exercise of the right, which changes the character of the subject and makes it either real or personal at the will of the party entitled to the whole beneficial interest. Craig v. Leslie, ubi supra; 2 Story's Equ. Jur. ubi supra, and n. 1, and authorities there cited.

In this case I think nothing appears sufficiently manifesting an intent to elect by any of the parties interested. The only thing that looks at all like such election was the failure of the parties to cause the sale to be made at an earlier period and the retention of the property so long in the form of realty. But by the will of the testator the property could not be sold until John J. Hudnall attained the age of twenty-one years which was not until the fall of 1839, and from the retention of the property afterwards in the same form unaided by other circumstances or any express declaration, the intent to elect is not necessarily to be inferred. The acts or declarations which shall constitute an election must clearly manifest the determination to make it. Willing v. Peters, 7 Barr (Pa. R.) 287; 2 Story's Equ. Jur. § 793. And the mere continuing to hold and rent the prop-376 erty is not inconsistent *with the intent to carry out the direction of the testator and to have a sale of the property at some convenient period. It may have been deemed expedient to defer the sale in the hope of receiving a larger dividend by an improvement in the value of real estate. Moreover, in order to make a valid election all who were jointly interested must have concurred. Willing v. Peters, ubi sup.; Fletcher v. Ashburner, 1 Bro. Ch. C. 497, opinion of Sir Thomas Sewell (master of the rolls); Allison's ex'or v. Wilson's ex'ors, 13 Serg. & Rawle 330, opinion of the court delivered by Gibson, J. In these opinions it is distinctly stated that where an estate is directed to be sold and the proceeds divided amongst several persons, none has a right to say that any part shall not be sold, and that one having an undivided interest in the subject cannot compel those who are associated in interest with him to take in land what was bequeathed to them in money. And accordingly it was held in Willing v. Peters, above cited, that all who are jointly interested must unite in the act of election, otherwise it is nugatory.

Now it would seem that Margaret Hudnall did not consider that she had made any election to take land instead of money, for in her will dated in 1840, she speaks of steps having been taken to obtain a sale of the land by a decree, and gives her portion of the proceeds or her share of the land if it should not be sold, to her sister Mrs. Harcum. And in 1853 John J. Hudnall who had for many years previously resided in New Orleans, filed his bill claiming the right to have a sale of property and a division of the proceeds, alleging that since he arrived at the age of twenty-one years, the period at which the land was directed to be sold, there had been no representative of his father's estate, and no one authorized to sell the land. Not a single act or declaration evincing the purpose to make an election can be imputed to either 377 beyond the bare acquiescence *in the retention of the subject in the form of real estate after John J. Hudnall became of age, and this may be sufficiently explained by the circumstances.

No discrimination appears to be made in this doctrine of "equitable conversion," between the case of a conversion which is not required to be made at any particular period and which therefore in the case of a will, should be made presently after the death of the testator, and one in which the conversion is to be made at some future period prescribed. In the latter case "we must consider the property as converted from the time when it ought to have been converted." Per Cranworth, Lord Chancellor, Ferrie v. Atherton, 28 Eng. Law and Eq. R. 1. Here the will directed in effect that the conversion should be made when John J. Hudnall arrived at the age of twenty-one years, and equity will regard that which ought to have been done as having been actually done and consider the property devised as stamped with the character of money from and after that period, and as so continuing afterwards in the absence of an election by all those jointly interested to take the testator's bounty in the form of real estate.

We must conclude therefore that the interest which Mrs. Harcum took under the will of her father was an interest in money, the proceeds of the sale of the property whenever the same should be made, and that at her death nothing in this subject could pass to her children as her heirs at law. And this is equally true of the interest which she took under the will of her sister Margaret, and as one of the heirs at law and distributees of her brother Thomas. Margaret by her will made after her brother John became of age, gave her whole interest to her sister Mrs. Harcum; and as the period for the conversion of the property had arrived, it was clearly a bequest 378 of money, her share of *the proceeds of the sale. Thomas Hudnall died before his brother John attained his majority, and before the actual conversion of the property by a sale could be made; and if his interest for that reason is to be regarded as in the realty and descendible to his heirs, they would nevertheless take it subject to be converted into money by a sale, just as he held it, and as they held their respective interests in the same subject, under the will of their father. If it be regarded as personalty, it might now be successfully claimed by his administrator Straughan if it were needed for payment of any debts due from his estate; and Straughan as administrator of Margaret Hudnall might also lay claim to have her interest paid to him if any such exigency of her estate required it. But Thomas Hudnall died an infant, unmarried, intestate and without issue, and in the absence of any suggestion to the contrary, it will be presumed that he owed no debts. Myers v. Wade, 6 Rand. 444, 448, opinion of Green, J. Leroy Harcum administered upon the estate of Margaret Hudnall and as it appears, settled the affairs of the same in his lifetime; and as Straughan in his answer or elsewhere, makes no suggestion that there were any debts due from the estate of Margaret, it should be taken that there were none. The interest of Thomas would then be properly distributed among his surviving sisters and brother, and Mrs. Harcum might take directly her sister's third of the whole under her will in addition to her own, without regard to the claim of Straughan as administrator of Thomas and Margaret.

Thus the case is resolved into a controversy between the administrator of Leroy Harcum, the first husband, and Samuel Harcum the second husband and personal representative of Mrs. Harcum whom he survived. The interest of Mrs. Harcum was not an estate in the premises, but a mere chose in action, a right to have 379 a *sale of the property and to receive her two-thirds of the proceeds. Willing v. Peters, ubi sup. If Leroy Harcum during his life did any thing that can be accepted as a reduction of this chose into possession or as the equivalent, it thereupon became his property and his administrator would be now entitled to recover it. If otherwise, then upon his death it survived to Mrs. Harcum, and upon her death Samuel Harcum her second husband who qualified as her administrator became entitled to receive it. Coke Litt. 351; 1 Bright on Husband & Wife, ch. 4, § 1, p. 34; Id. § 4, p. 41; Siter, &c., v. McClanachan, 2 Gratt. 294.

It appears that after Leroy Harcum's intermarriage with Elizabeth Hudnall, which took place in 1835 or 1836, he and Samuel Harcum (as guardian, it is to be inferred, for John J. Hudnall during his minority and as his agent afterwards), rented out the land, conjointly, and received the rents. Margaret Hudnall during her life received her third of the rents, and after her death her portion was appropriated by Leroy Harcum along with his wife's third. And it is urged for the appellants that this was such a reduction into possession on the part of Leroy Harcum as vested the property in him because the subject being in the form of real estate until a sale took place it was not susceptible of any other possession.

No case has been cited, nor in my examination have I seen any, presenting the question as to a subject situated precisely like the present. There are however some cases to be found bearing a strong analogy to this and which will serve to aid in its elucidation.

The acts to effect a reduction into possession of the wife's chose in action must be such as to change the property in it or something to divest the wife's right and to make that of the husband absolute; such as a judgment in an action commenced by him in his own name, or a receipt of the money or a decree that it be 380 *paid to him or applied to his use. Prec. in Ch. 412, 418; Schuyler v. Hoyle, 5 John. Ch. R. 196; 1 Bright, ch. 5, sect. 1, p. 48. In Yerby et ux. v. Lynch, 3 Gratt. 460, the question was whether settling with a guardian and administratrix and taking a bond to the husband for the amount due his wife was a reduction of the chose into possession of the husband; the court however was equally divided. In the course of his opinion, Judge Baldwin said that by suing out execution upon a judgment recovered in the name of himself and wife, the husband divested the interest of the wife. He referred to Clancy on Rights, 113 to 116. This proposition is controverted by a learned writer who maintains that it is entirely unsupported by authority. 3 Rob. N. P. 206. However this may be, Leroy Harcum, in his lifetime effected no change of the condition of this property, he obtained no decree that his wife's interest should be paid over to him or applied to his use. He received the rents and thus reduced them to possession: but he did not and could not appropriate the principal subject. He took no step to obtain such a decree as would have vested the property in himself. He made no demand on Harding the administrator, who if living might have made sale of the property, to make it; nor if he were dead or refused, did he file a bill to execute the trust. He contented himself with receiving the annual rents. Now if he could have done nothing more during John J. Hudnall's minority towards a reduction of the subject into possession, the same cannot be said of the period that lapsed after John J. Hudnall attained his majority. Leroy Harcum lived some three years after that event, and might readily have obtained a decree which would have vested the property in himself. But to any proceeding instituted to obtain such a decree, he would have had to make his wife a party. For although as to all rights of personalty and causes of action ac-wife jointly, during the coverture, he may, if he will, sue in his own name alone, yet as to such rights and causes of action as accrued before the coverture including negotiable instruments (though as to them the rule was formerly different), it is now well settled that he cannot maintain an action at law to recover them without joining his wife as a party. Hardy v. Robinson, 1 Keb. R. 440; Milner v. Milner, 3 T. R. 627; Rumsey v. George, 1 Mau. & Sel. 176; Richards v. Richards, 2 Barn. & Ald. 447, 22 Eng. C. L. R. 119; Sherrington v. Yates, 12 Mees. & Welsb. 855; 1 Bright, ch. 5, sect. 4, p. 63, 64. Here as the interest of the wife was in the nature of a legacy, to obtain which the aid of a court of equity must be invoked, it would a fortiori, have been necessary that the wife should be joined in any proceeding in the court to obtain it. Blount v. Bestland, 5 Ves. R. 515. And the criterion by which to determine whether the wife may join in the action is whether the right of action would survive to her upon the death of her husband in her lifetime. Ayling v. Whichner, 6 Adol. & Ell. 264; 1 Bright, ch. 5, § 4, p. 63.

The rents issuing out of the property before the sale belonged to the same persons who were entitled to the principal subject and would go to them in common with the moneys arising from the sale, as personal property. Yates v. Compton, 2 P. Wms. 308; Doughty v. Bull, Id. 320. And as already stated, those received by Leroy Harcum in his lifetime were thus reduced into his possession and became his absolute property; but it does not follow that therefore the principal subject was thus reduced into possession. After the death of Leroy Harcum, Mrs. Harcum continued to receive the rents in the same way, and after her marriage with Samuel Harcum he received them by virtue of his marital rights. Thus the acts of Samuel Harcum after his marriage with Mrs. Harcum, constituted as much *a reduction of the subject into possession as did those of Leroy Harcum, for the reason that the property remained just as it was throughout the whole period, including the widowhood of Mrs. Harcum, without any change having been effected in its condition. None of these parties had any estate in the land under the will or any interest which could be the subject of a lien by a judgment or could be reached by a creditor with an execution against his lands. Allison's ex'or, v. Wilson's ex'ors, 13 Serg. & Rawle 330; Morrow, use, &c., v. Brenizer, 2 Rawle's R. 185; Willing v. Peters, 7 Barr's R. 289, et seq. and cases cited in the opinion of Bell, J. Nor did the receipt of the rents by either change the character of the subject or confer upon him any other or different interest than he already had. If it had constituted a reduction into possession by Leroy Harcum, it would be unnecessary for his representative to come into court now and ask it to give him possession.

The receipt of interest by a husband upon a chose in action belonging to his wife, has not been held to be such a reduction into possession as would vest the chose in him and defeat the wife's right by survivorship. Thus where a sum of money was charged in favor of a feme sole upon her brother's estate, and he upon occasion of her marriage covenanted in a settlement to pay it to her husband, and the husband received the interest for some time after the marriage but died without having collected the principal, it was held that although the husband during the coverture might have released or discharged it, yet not having done either, upon his death it vested in the wife by survivorship. Howman v. Corie, 2 Vern. R. 190, and n. 1. So where a promissory note bearing interest was given to a woman before coverture, and after her marriage her husband received the interest upon it during her life, it was held that the note was not *thereby reduced into his possession, but passed to her administrator. Hart's adm'r v. Stephens, 6 Ad. & El. N. S. 937, 51 Eng. C. L. R. 537. In Nash v. Nash, 2 Madd. R. 133, a promissory note for ten thousand pounds payable on demand was given to a woman after her marriage, and she delivered it to her husband who received one thousand pounds of the principal and also received the interest on the remaining nine thousand pounds up to his death. His wife survived him, and it was held by the vice chancellor (Sir T. Plumer) that this was no reduction of the chose into possession, but that the right to the nine thousand pounds belonged to the wife by survivorship.

In Hart's adm'r v. Stephens, 6 Ad. & El. 937 (51 Eng. C. L. R. 537), Patterson, J., speaking for the court, says that for the proposition that the receipt of interest by the husband on a note belonging to his wife will serve to reduce it into possession, "we think there is no foundation." The observations of Lord Ellenborough in giving judgment in McNeilage v. Holloway, 1 Barn. & Ald. 218, which were supposed to favor that doctrine, have been considered too strong and disapproved of in subsequent cases. See Richards v. Richards, 2 Barn. & Ald. 447; and Gaters v. Madely, 6 Mees. & Welsb. 423.

The cases which I have thus cited and briefly stated, seem to me to be not stronger against the husband's claim, in principle, than the case in judgment, and to my mind their tendency is very direct to deny to the receipt of the rents by the husband in such a case as the present, the effect of a reduction of the subject into his possession so as to defeat the wife's right of survivorship. Nor will the case be helped by a reference to the doctrine touching the husband's interest in his wife's chattels real. To these the law gives the husband a qualified title with a right to the possession and enjoyment of the subject and a power of *alienation during the coverture. If he dispose of his wife's terms for years by a complete act in his lifetime, her right by survivorship will be gone, and this whether his disposition was with or without consideration, and whether the legal estate in the terms was in the wife or was held in trust for her benefit. Grute v. Locroft, Cro. Eliz. 287; Tudor v. Samyne, stated in note to Scarborough v. Borman, 4 Mylne & Craig 389; Sir Edward Turner's Case, 1 Vern. R. 7; S. C. 1 Ch. Ca. 307; Carteret v. Paschal, 1 P. Wms. 197; Mitford v. Mitford, 9 Ves. R. 87, 98, opinion of Sir William Grant. But if the husband do not alien the terms and survives his wife, he takes them by virtue of his marital rights. Co. Litt. 46, b, 351, a; 1 Bright, ch. 8, s. 1, p. 94. But notwithstanding the husband's possession and enjoyment of the terms during the coverture, if the wife be the survivor and the terms remain in statu quo and unchanged, she and not the husband's next of kin will be entitled to them; and even his disposal of them by will will not prevail against her right by survivorship; for as this takes effect immediately upon his death, it takes precedence of the bequest in the will which cannot take effect until after his death. Co. Litt. 351; 1 Bright, ubi sup. and p. 95.

In every view that I have been enabled to take of this question, I think that upon the death of Leroy Harcum, the right to Mrs. Harcum's share of the proceeds of the property survived to her; that upon her death it passed to her second husband Samuel Harcum, who also qualified as administrator to her estate, and that the Circuit court did not err in directing the same, being two-thirds of the whole, to be paid to him. And I am therefore of opinion to affirm the decree.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Lee, J.

Decree affirmed.

Taxation—Shares of Railroad Stock—Case at Bar.*—The shares of a railroad company are not liable to be taxed by the council of the city of Richmond, either under the charter of the city or § 19 of ch. 54 of the Code.†

This was an action of assumpsit brought by Peter V. Daniel, jr. against the city of Richmond, to recover back the sum of two hundred and twenty-two dollars and seventy-six cents, which he had paid as city taxes on stock owned by him in the Seaboard and Roanoke and the Richmond and Petersburg rail roads. The parties agreed the facts; and it was agreed that if the plaintiff was not bound by law to pay the sums assessed against him, and collected of him for said taxes, judgment should be entered up in his favor for the amount he had paid. The acts of assembly in relation to the city of Richmond, and the ordinances of the city having reference to the subject, were made a part of the case agreed. The only questions were whether the stock of the rail roads was exempted from taxation by their charter: and if not, whether the city council were authorized to tax the stock owned by a person living in Richmond. The Circuit court rendered a judgment for the plaintiff: and the city of Richmond obtained a supersedeas from this court.

386 *SAMUELS, J. This case is brought here by writ of supersedeas to a judgment of the Circuit court of the city of Richmond, rendered in an action of assumpsit for money had and received. The object of the suit is to recover money alleged to have been improperly assessed as a city tax on certain rail road stocks held by the defendant in error and paid by him. This court has jurisdiction under article 6, § 11, of the constitution. The facts are

*Power of Taxation—Conferred on Corporations or Counties—Rule of Construction.—Laws conferring the power of taxation upon a municipal corporation, or upon a county, are to be strictly construed, for the power of taxation as confided in them is a delegated trust; they act, not by virtue of any inherent power, but as mere agencies of the state. Legislature—Taxing Power.—"There is certainly one proposition which will not be questioned, and that is that the legislature possesses the full, absolute, sovereign power of taxation, excepting so far as it may have been surrendered to the general government or may be interdicted by the constitution of the United States, or as it may be controlled by the restrictions and mandates of the constitution of the state. agreed between the parties, and made part of the record; and it was further agreed by them, that if the defendant in error had not been bound by law to pay the tax assessed, or any part of it, judgment should be rendered in his favor for so much of the money as he had not been bound by law to pay. Thus the parties by consent submitted to the court a question of law, and by like consent the judgment was to be in favor of the party with whom the law was on that question.

The consent of parties withdraws the case from the rule declared in Mayor, &c. of Richmond v. Judah, 5 Leigh 305, if the protest under which the money was paid would not have had the effect of so withdrawing it.

The only question is, Whether the city council, acting under the charter of the city of Richmond, had authority to assess the taxes on rail road stock held by the defendant? The chartered powers of the city, so far as involved in this case, are created and defined by the statutes, ch. 335, p. 259, Sess. Acts 1852; and chapters 54 and 56 of the Code of Virginia.

In order to ascertain the extent of the powers granted, it is necessary to know the general principles ruling the construction of such grants. The power in question is of the class merely derivative, and to be distinguished from the class of original and sovereign powers. Each class has its own rules of construction. The first named 387 having power only in *derogation of common right, being merely carved out of the power theretofore vested only in the general assembly, its powers are to be strictly construed. See 2 Kent's Com. p. 298; Grant on Corporations 7 and 8; Richmond, &c. R. R. Co. v. Louisa R. R. Co., 13 How. U. S. R. 71. Especially is the power of taxation, when granted to a subordinate body, to be strictly construed. The powers of the second class are illustrated in the general assembly. That body is invested with the sovereign power of taxation pertaining to the whole commonwealth, with only the limits prescribed by the mandates or the prohibitions of the constitution. The council of the city of Richmond can exercise no power of taxation unless granted by charter; the general assembly may exercise all power of taxation not prohibited by the constitution; and it may omit to exercise the power, unless compelled to act by mandate of the same instrument.

That the general rule of strict construction is to be applied to charters, seems free from doubt; and I find nothing to warrant a different rule in regard to the charter of the city of Richmond. In section 55 of the charter it is enacted, that "In all courts this act shall be construed as favorable for the city as the nature of the case will admit of." In regard to this section, it must be said, that "every case," "in all courts," in its "nature," is made up of the very facts thereof, and of the mere law upon the facts; there is no case, and can be no case, which, in its nature, allows any judgment other than that required by the law upon the facts. When, therefore, the section refers to the nature of the case as the measure of favor, it refers only to that which would have controlled the decision, if no favor had been required. If there be any difficulty in prescribing definite legal limits to the operation of the section in question, still it is enough for the purposes of this case to decide 388 that it does not confer any *power which would not have existed if the section had been omitted from the charter.

The validity of the assessment is denied by the defendant in error, because the council had no authority to make it; and because if this would have been otherwise or the general grants of power, still his stocks in the rail roads (Seaboard and Roanoke and Richmond and Petersburg) are exempt under the respective charters of these rail roads. In this position of the controversy it is incumbent on the plaintiff in error to show an authority in the city council, under its granted powers, to make the assessment. If this be done successfully, it will then be incumbent on the defendant in error to make good his claim to exemption.

We are referred to several portions of the charter, and of the statute, ch. 54 of the Code, as giving the power claimed. I shall consider each of these alleged sources of power in its turn.

It is said that section 36 of the charter, giving power to tax personal property within the city other than slaves under the age of twelve years, gives the power to tax the rail road stocks above mentioned held by the defendant in error, who resides within the city. In answer to this claim, it may be said that it is a material question whether these stocks be personal property within the meaning of the general assembly when exercising the tax laying power; for the word when used in the charter is to bear the same signification as when used in the state tax laws. A careful reading of all the tax laws passed since the adoption of the existing constitution, has left no doubt on my mind as to the meaning of the general assembly when imposing a tax on personal property; it is not understood as embracing every thing of a personal nature which one may own, to the exclusion of all others. In Sess. Acts 1852, § 2, p. 14, we find the first tax law under the existing constitution. Personal property is 389 mentioned *as a subject of taxation. Moneys and credits are also mentioned separately, as subjects of taxation. Again, money itself is subjected to different rates of taxation, to be ascertained by reference to the source from which it was received. If the general assembly had regarded all these subjects as property, then the discrimination in rates of taxation would be a palpable infraction of article 4, § 22, of the constitution. If, however, we suppose that the legislature properly used the word "property" in its popular sense, meaning visible subjects, then no violation of the constitution was produced by the tax law. The subsequent tax laws are substantially the same in the particulars above mentioned. It is not material in this case to consider whether the state tax laws are in conformity with the constitution; our only enquiry is, What meaning did the general assembly attach to the word "property," when itself exercising the power of taxation? Whatever the meaning was, we must hold it to be the same when used in granting power of taxation to a subordinate authority. It would therefore seem that rail road stocks are not taxable under the denomination of property.

If, however, I am wrong in this, still the question recurs, Are these rail road stocks property within the city? To sustain the affirmative of this question, the counsel for the plaintiff in error relied only upon the argument that personal property and especially choses in action are of the place at which the owner resides. In regard to goods and chattels, the tax laws regard them as of the place at which they may be, and accordingly direct that taxes be assessed and paid at that place. If it be conceded that credits due to a party are, for some purposes, even for the purpose of taxation, of the place of the owner's residence, it would still remain to be shown that rail road stocks in themselves are credits.

390 These stocks are only evidence *that if in future dividends shall be declared, the holder will be entitled to a ratable share; and moreover, that in case the corporation be dissolved, the holder will be entitled to a ratable share in the surplus, if any remain after discharging superior claims. These claims possess no ingredient in common with credit. This last never exists without a debtor, nor without a sum to be paid, nor without a time of payment, not one of which has any sort of connection with rail road stocks, the specific subject of taxation in our case. After dividends shall have been declared, they (unless exempt) would be classed with such liquidated demands as are taxed under the name of credits, or otherwise, as provided by the law at the time. The dividends not yet declared being of uncertain existence as well as uncertain in amount, cannot be taxed as credits, which by the terms of the tax laws must have actual existence, and be taxed on the amount. Nor can the remote and contingent claim to a share of the corporate effects after dissolution, be relied on as assimilating rail road stock to a credit. The charters are without limit of duration, and thus the claim is postponed indefinitely; it is uncertain, and cannot be classed with such liquidated claims as are taxed under the name of credits.

In further support of the power of taxation, the counsel for the plaintiff in error relied on § 19 of chapter 54 of the Code, insisting that rail road stocks may be classed with those "other subjects" not specifically enumerated, on which tax may be assessed. This argument cannot prevail, unless it be shown that the rail road stocks in question had been, in the language of the law, "at the time assessed with state tax against the owner residing in the town." This has not been shown, and cannot be shown, as no state tax has been so assessed on rail road stocks. It has been said that although no state tax on 391 such stocks *has been required by law, still if the state might impose the tax, so may the city council. It would be an idle labor in the general assembly to prescribe limits to powers of taxation, by referring to its own state laws for a designation of subjects, if the power is not to be measured by the law referred to, but to be coextensive with the sovereign power of taxation vested in the general assembly. To carry this pretension to its results, we must hold that the property included in the exempting clauses of the state tax laws, may still be taxed under city ordinances; for these exemption clauses may be repealed by the general assembly. In fine, we must hold that the sovereign power of taxation within the city is vested in the council; and, according to the argument of the counsel on another branch of the case, never to be resumed by the general assembly. This would be giving a construction far more liberal than has ever been applied to a grant of any kind by a superior to an inferior authority.

It has been said that, although the city council can impose a tax on such subjects only as may be assessed at the time with state tax, still the city tax need not necessarily be in the same form as the state tax; and in illustration of the position, it is said, as the state taxes rail road corporations (when not exempt) on property, or dividends, or on all passengers carried, at the rate of a mill per mile, therefore the city council may tax, not the rail roads (they not being in the city), but individual stockholders in the city. There is a wide difference, a total absence of identity between the individual property of the stockholder and that of the corporation. To infer the power to tax the one because the state taxes the other, would extend the power beyond all proper rules of construction.

I have thus adverted to all the rea-

392 sons relied on to *justify the assessment of the tax in question; finding them wholly insufficient, it is not necessary to consider what may be the effect (if any) of the clauses in the rail road charters exempting them from taxes or public charges, if it should be necessary to rely on those clauses.

I am of opinion to affirm the judgment.

LEE, J., was of opinion that the city council of Richmond had the power under the charter to tax stock held by her citizens in a rail road company wherever its works were constructed unless the same were specially exempted by its charter or some other valid legal provision. And he was of opinion that the stock of the Richmond and Petersburg rail road company was exempted by its charter from such taxation, as it was from taxation for state charges. But he was of opinion that the stock of the Seaboard and Roanoke rail road company was subject to taxation both for state and city charges, because he considered the exemption found in the charter of the Portsmouth and Roanoke rail road company as having been in effect repealed by the operation of the several acts subsequently passed in relation to that company, and the acceptance by the Seaboard and Roanoke rail road company of their provisions. And he was of opinion that the city council of Richmond might impose a tax upon stock held by her citizens in this company whether the general assembly had exercised the power of taxation which it possessed over the subject or otherwise.

He was therefore of opinion that the judgment should be reversed, and that in lieu thereof, judgment should be rendered in favor of the defendant in error for the sum of eighty-six dollars, that being the amount of the tax paid by him on his stock in the Richmond and Petersburg rail road, and the costs of the Circuit court.

393 *MONCURE, J. I concur in the opinion of Judge Samuels, except that I am not prepared to say that the word "property," as used in the charter of the city of Richmond, does not embrace rail road stock. The word in its proper sense, and I think in its ordinary acceptation, embraces that subject; but whether it does, in the sense in which it is used in the said charter, is a question which I have not fully considered, and upon which I express no opinion. It is unnecessary to do so, as the other grounds relied on by him fully sustain his conclusion.

DANIEL, J., whilst he concurred with Judge Samuels in most of the views on which he rested the conclusions of a majority of the court, thought with Judge Moncure that it was unnecessary to express any opinion as to whether the word "property" was employed in the charter of the city of Richmond, in a sense that would include rail road stocks.

ALLEN, P., concurred with Lee, J., in opinion as to the power of the city council to tax stock held by residents of the city in a rail road company, wherever its works were constructed, unless the same were exempted by its charter or by law. That under the law the power of the city council did not depend upon the exercise by the general assembly of the power of taxation over the same subject; but where the general assembly had authority to impose such tax, but had not exercised it, the city council could impose a tax. And he was further of opinion, that under the various laws in relation to both of said companies, the stock of each company was subject to taxation by the city council: and he was therefore of opinion that the judgment should be reversed with costs, and a judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff in error.

Judgment affirmed.

394 *Williamson & als. v. Coalter's Ex'ors & als.

April Term, 1858 Richmond.

Wills—Emancipation—Dependent on Slave's Election—Effect.*—Testatrix makes her will in August 1857, by which she emancipates one slave by name. By another clause she says, "I direct in regard to the balance of my negroes, that they shall be manumitted on the 1st day of January 1858." She then directs her executors to raise a fund out of her estate sufficient for the purpose, and use it in settling her said slaves in Liberia or any other free state or country in which they may elect to live: and then says, "And I further direct, that if any of my said servants shall prefer to remain in Virginia, instead of accepting the foregoing provisions, it is my desire that they shall be permitted by my executors to select among my relations their respective owners." HELD: The freedom of the slaves is made dependent on their election: and they having no legal capacity to elect, the will is ineffectual to emancipate them.

This was a bill filed in September 1857 in the Circuit court of Stafford county, by the executors of Hannah H. Coalter deceased, asking for the instruction of the court in the administration of their trust. The daughter, and other legatees of the testatrix, and her slaves were made parties. The only question considered by this court is, whether the slaves were emancipated. The will of Mrs. Coalter bore date the 4th of August 1857, and after making provision for her only daughter, and for the payment of her debts, provides for her slaves in the fourth and fifth clauses as follows:

"Fourth. I hereby manumit my faithful servant Charles, and direct my executors to provide him with a fund sufficient to take him to such state or country as he may elect to live in, and pay to him an annuity of one hundred dollars during his life."

"Fifth. I direct in regard to the balance of my negroes, that they shall be manumitted on the 1st day of *January 1858. And I authorize and request my said executors to ascertain what fund will be sufficient to provide the usual outfit for, and to remove, said negroes to Liberia. And I hereby direct my executors to raise said fund, or such an amount as in their judgment may be sufficient for that purpose from my said estate, and to use the said fund in removing and settling my said servants in Liberia, or any other free state or country in which they may elect to live, the adults selecting for themselves, and the parents for the infant children; and I further direct that if any of my said servants shall prefer to remain in Virginia, instead of accepting the foregoing provisions, it is my desire that they shall be permitted by my executors to select among my relations their respective owners; said election to be made by the adults and parents as aforesaid."

The slaves embraced in the fifth clause of the will were ninety-three in number. Some of these negroes were old; and many of them, consisting of families composed of a mother and six, seven or eight infant children, and one an orphan, were chargeable.

Mrs. Coalter's estate, exclusive of her slaves, was estimated to be worth from fifteen to twenty thousand dollars; and was ample to carry out the provisions of her will in regard to the removal and settlement of her negroes in Liberia or a free state.

The cause seems to have been heard at the same term at which the bill was filed: and the court directed enquiries to be made by a commissioner, as to the election of the negroes to be free, and if so, to what free state or country they would elect to go; and the cost of their outfit and removal to Liberia or such other free state as they might elect to go to. And the court held further that said negroes were emancipated by the will, unless they declined to accept its provisions, and chose to remain slaves: And 396 that this condition of freedom was independent altogether *of the removal of said negroes from Virginia, said removal being a condition subsequent to said emancipation. From this decree Mrs. Coalter's daughter and the other legatees applied to this court for an appeal; which was allowed.

The case was elaborately argued by John Howard and Patton, for the appellants, and by Little and Morson, for the appellees. The counsel for the appellants contended that the case could not be distinguished from Bailey v. Poindexter, lately decided by the court and reported supra 132. That the principle of that case was, that wherever a testator intended that the slaves should have the right to elect to be free or to remain in slavery, there the bequest was void. The counsel for the appellees contended that the case fell plainly within the principle of the case of Osborne v. Taylor's adm'r, 12 Gratt. 117; and was in fact a stronger case in favor of the emancipation of the slaves than that case. That here was a distinct clause positively emancipating the slaves, which distinguished it from Bailey v. Poindexter; and it was monstrous that a subsequent clause, which the court held was a mere nullity, should have the effect to render the previous clause, which if by itself no one denied or doubted would emancipate the slaves, also a nullity.

ALLEN, P. It was decided in the case of Bailey v. Poindexter, that slaves have no legal capacity to elect between freedom and slavery; and that where it appears to have been the intention of the testator that the manumission was to depend on the election of the slaves, the bequest was void. That case was twice argued and fully considered by the court. I entertained but little doubt from the first argument of the case, as to the correctness of the principle upon which it was determined. The supposed

397 effect of previous *decisions and the alleged general impression as to the law, created the principal difficulty with me in coming to the conclusion at which the court ultimately arrived. But notwithstanding the weight of all these considerations, it seemed to me that the determination of the majority of the court was the just result to be deduced from the law and our adjudications upon the relation of master and slave in Virginia. That to confer civil capacity on slaves to make such election, was in conflict with the principles affirmed in respect to the condition of slaves in Sawney v. Carter, 6 Rand. 173; Stevenson v. Singleton, 1 Leigh 72; Rucker's adm'r v. Gilbert, 3 Leigh 8; Winn v. Carrell, 2 Gratt. 227; Smith's adm'r v. Betty, 11 Gratt. 752; and in the cases decided in other states and the Supreme court, cited in the opinion of Judge Daniel: and that to carry out the exception attempted to be created in favor of such bequests, the courts were called upon by a species of judicial legislation, to enact a distinct code of laws to regulate and determine the rights growing out of it, and to prescribe the mode of procedure. What for instance was to be the condition of those under the age of discretion? Who was to elect for them? What was to be the effect of such election upon their rights when arriving at full age? If the right was given to the mother, and she while electing freedom for herself, chose to elect slavery for the child, so as to cast the burden of support on the estate, would such election bind the child on attaining full age? and what is the legal age of a slave? These and other difficulties in the practical application of the doctrine, satisfied me of the propriety of conforming in this respect to the general rule which treats the slave as a nonentity so far as respects civil capacities; that as there can be no intermediate condition between slavery and freedom in the status of 398 the negro, so *neither can there be an intermediate condition as to civil rights and capacities.

Adhering to the principle of Bailey v. Poindexter, and giving to it in all cases its legitimate effect, it becomes merely a question of construction, upon every will presenting this subject, to ascertain what in a given case was the intention of the testator. Though difficulties may arise in determining in a particular case whether it be an absolute bequest of freedom, or of an election between freedom and slavery, and different minds may come to different results, the principle is not affected thereby; that is fixed and no difficulty attends its application when the intention of the testator is ascertained. If he intended to manumit absolutely, and that intention can be fairly gathered from the terms he has used, construed with reference to the whole will, and with aid derived from the light of surrounding circumstances, so far as they can be lawfully regarded, the slaves are entitled to their freedom, unaffected by any repugnant conditions thereafter or by the same will attempted to be affixed to this absolute renunciation of property. If he did not so intend, but designed to refer the question of slavery or freedom to the choice of the slave, then he has, ignorantly perhaps, attempted to confer a capacity on the slave with which he cannot be endowed, and the bequest is void. It is not for the court to say that such a construction will defeat the benevolent intention of the testator. No one has the right to say, or can say, what would have been the disposition of the testator if he had known he could not submit the alternative to the choice of the slave.

Manumission, in the language of Stanard, Judge, in Crawford v. Moses, 10 Leigh 277, is an act by which property is renounced and extinguished. It is the exercise of a power conferred on the owner by the 399 law, *with which the slave has nothing to do. The moment the deed or will, the instruments alone by which slaves can be manumitted, takes effect, he is, in legal contemplation, transformed into a new being; no property in him can exist, and he occupies the same relation to the former owner that he does to every other person in the community. The intention of the owner to sever all connection between the slave and himself or his estate, must be apparent on the face of the will. If it appears that the will contemplates a continuance of that relation in a certain contingency; that the slave, notwithstanding the provision as to his manumission, is in a certain event to remain in the condition in which he was born, to continue without change a slave of his estate, subject to the control of the representative of the estate, such an intention is inconsistent with the idea of an intention to confer absolute manumission, and tends to throw light on that portion of the will which treats of manumission. Upon the subject of intention, the rule is very clearly stated by the judge giving the opinion of the court in Wootton v. Redd's ex'or, 12 Gratt. 196: "The traces of the testator's intention will be diligently sought out in every part of the instrument, and the whole carefully weighed together." And in the same connection, it may be well to bear in mind the familiar remark of Pendleton, Judge, in Shermer v. Shermer, 1 Wash. 266: "In disputes concerning wills, cases seldom elucidate the subject, which, depending on the intention of the testator, to be collected from the will, and from the relative situation of the parties, ought to be decided upon the state and circumstances of each case." In this case, all that we know of the relative situation of the parties, is to be gathered from the face of the will and the averments contained in the bill. It is alleged, that exclusive of the negroes, the estate of the testator is estimated to be worth from 400 fifteen thousand to *twenty thousand dollars; and that some of the negroes are old, and many of them, consisting of families composed of a mother and from six to eight infant children, and one an orphan, are actually chargeable.

By the first clause, the testatrix bequeathed to her daughter for life all her estate, exclusive of her negroes, after the payment of her debts, and the legacies and charges to which said estate was thereafter subjected.

No other clause of the will has any bearing upon the provisions contained in the fourth and fifth clauses, which respect the manumission of her slaves; and the first is only so far material, as it shows that the bequest to her daughter for life of all her estate, real and personal, was exclusive of her negroes.

By the fourth clause she manumits her faithful servant Charles, and directs her executors to provide him with a fund sufficient to take him to such state or country as he may elect to live in, and pay to him an annuity of one hundred dollars during his life.

Upon this clause no question has been raised; the slave is directly emancipated. As soon as the executors assented to the bequest, he was free.

The fifth clause, upon which this controversy arises, is in the following words:

Fifth. I direct in regard to the balance of my negroes that they shall be manumitted on the 1st day of January 1858. And I authorize and request my said executors, to ascertain what fund will be sufficient to provide the usual outfit for, and to remove said negroes to Liberia; and I hereby direct my executors to raise said fund, or such an amount as in their judgment may be sufficient for that purpose from my said estate, and to use the said fund in removing and settling my said servants in Liberia, or any other free state, or country, in which they may elect to live, the adults selecting for themselves, and the 401 parents for their infant *children; and I further direct, that if any of my said servants shall prefer to remain in Virginia, instead of accepting the foregoing provisions, it is my desire that they shall be permitted by my executors to select among my relations their respective owners; said election to be made by the adults and parents as aforesaid.

Are the slaves absolutely emancipated by this clause? or does it do more than tender to them an election to accept the provisions made for their manumission, or if they should prefer to remain in Virginia instead of accepting the foregoing provisions, to do so by remaining the slaves of her estate?

In the previous clause the testatrix had manumitted her faithful servant Charles, and provided for his support in the country he should elect to live in. From the terms in which he is mentioned, he was no doubt a confidential servant, and from being in immediate attendance upon her, she knew his wishes, that he desired to be free; and therefore no alternative of preferring to remain in Virginia, instead of accepting the provision in his favor, is presented to him. She knew that he could only remain in Virginia as a slave: and as she was apprised of his wishes, her will conforms to them. The only reference to an election is as to the country where as a freeman he might choose to reside. The others were not to be emancipated immediately, but at a future day, specified. In such a number, some were old, and as it appears from the bill, chargeable; others no doubt were approaching that period of life when they could not support themselves by their labor; others may have formed connections with persons of their own condition in the neighborhood. There was therefore strong reason why, with the most benevolent feelings towards her slaves, she should not, without consulting their wishes, renounce all property in them, sever the connection 402 between them and her *estate, and by the mere exercise of her legal power, banish them from the place of their birth, dissolve the ties connecting them with others in their own condition, and cast the old and helpless, who had labored all their past lives in her service, into a distant country, without any provision for their support. She had no doubt as to their legal capacity to choose between freedom and slavery; and from the considerations before adverted to, it is manifest to my mind she did not intend to coerce them; but to give them, after a fitting time for enquiry and consideration, the right to elect for themselves what should be their future condition. This difference of intention accounts for the difference in the terms between the clause emancipating Charles and the clause in regard to the rest of her negroes. The whole clause must be taken together to ascertain her intention. Two alternatives were presented; one necessarily preceded the other, and the order of their position in the clause cannot vary the effect of the whole. Neither conferred absolute freedom or continued in slavery independent of the election of the slaves: and until that choice, the clause was inoperative. If before the 1st of January 1858 or on that day, the slaves or any of them, had, in the language of the decree appealed from, declined to accept the provisions of the will, would the executor have been justified in discharging them? The court below considered they were manumitted, unless they declined to accept its provisions and remain slaves. But if manumitted, they could not, by merely declining to accept, remain slaves, for the manumission, if effectual, is not dependent on their act, and the condition of slavery instantly ceased, so that they could no longer remain slaves. It is argued that her intention to give absolute freedom is apparent, because there is no bequest over. In Winn v. Carrell, there was no bequest over; and the testator was 403 held *to die intestate as to the slave. In the present case, however, even if there be no bequest over, a question not presented for adjudication, and therefore one upon which no opinion is expressed, the testatrix did contemplate and provide for such refusal to accept the provisions of the will, by treating them as remaining the slaves of her estate under the control of her executors; for she desires that in that event they be permitted by her executors to select among her relations their respective owners.

The cases of Forward's adm'r v. Thamer, 9 Gratt. 537, and Osborne v. Taylor's adm'r, 12 Gratt. 117, are mainly relied on by the appellees, the last case especially, as being analogous to this case, and ruling it. The principle established by those cases is, that where the will actually emancipates, so that the status of the negro is changed from that of a slave to a freedman of color, all provisions imposing conditions and granting privileges, to take effect after that change of condition, are void.

In the first case the judge, in giving the opinion in which a majority concurred, remarks, "that the slave was entitled to her freedom for six months at least, the time allowed within which the slave was to leave the state. So if when the period of emancipation arrived the law did not require him to leave the state, he was to be free; or if the law did require it and he left the state, there was no forfeiture of freedom." And therefore it was held, that as the testator had emancipated the slave, he could annex no condition subsequent to the grant of freedom.

And in Osborne v. Taylor, the judge observes, "that it was a misapprehension of the will to construe it as directing that the slaves should remain such until they elect to become free; whereas the will in a substantive clause distinctly manumitted them, and afterwards in another clause gives 404 them the election to remain *in Virginia in a condition intermediate between slavery and freedom; an alternative against the policy of the law, and of no effect. Whether the interpretation was correct or not, does not change the principle of the decision. But I do not entertain any doubt as to the correctness of the construction placed upon the clause of the will then under consideration. It conferred absolute freedom, with a bequest of property to them: and then a provision was inserted, amounting in fact to no more than a suggestion of a mode by which the negroes, if they preferred remaining in the state, could do so, by choosing not owners, but masters to serve during life, and at the death of the master, they were to have the option of freedom or slavery, by making a second choice. The absolute property was vested in no one; it was not contemplated that the slaves preferring to remain should remain the property of the testator's estate. The masters to be successively chosen were to have but a limited interest. They could neither sell or bequeath them, but in consideration of service, were to support and protect them. This was a condition of qualified slavery, which the testator could not create, nor could the slaves do so by any election on their part. The testator intended to emancipate, to extinguish all property in them as slaves; but suggested an option, which was merely nugatory after freedom had attached.

In the present case there was no intention to emancipate without consulting the slave. The alternative of freedom or slavery was presented to the slave. Until acceptance, he remained a slave. If he declined he continued a slave, his status never having been changed.

The cases of Pleasants v. Pleasants, Elder v. Elder, and Dawson v. Dawson, have been cited on behalf of the appellees as bearing on the construction of this will.

The first two have been reviewed in 405 the case of *Bailey v. Poindexter, and it is unnecessary to add any thing to what was there said, except that as to the first case the suit was brought on behalf of the negroes; and one having arrived at thirty years of age, brought suit himself in forma pauperis. In Dawson v. Dawson's ex'or, 10 Leigh 602, the provisions of the will were almost identical with the clause of the will in the case under consideration; and if in the interpretation of that will it had been construed as conferring immediate freedom, irrespective of any election by the slave, it would have been difficult to have distinguished between the two cases. Upon the question of the capacity of slaves to elect between freedom and slavery, the case is of no authority. No such point was raised or considered. The question presented arose upon the codicil to the will, and whether the devise of the land thereby made for the support of the slaves thereon gave both land and slaves absolutely to the devisee, or created a trust for the slaves until they should be emancipated or sold. The capacity of the slaves to elect was not controverted in the pleadings or argument; but the case proceeded on the concession of such capacity and their right to freedom if they elected to take it. The court below held that the codicil did not amount to a devise of the land or bequest of the slaves thereon to the devisee as his absolute property, but created a trust for the benefit of the slaves during the period which might elapse between the testator's death and the election of the slaves, but that the slaves were not yet freedmen, and would not be until they so elected. This court affirmed the decree deciding that the codicil created a trust for the support and maintenance of the slaves for the year within which they were to be emancipated or sold. The case can scarcely be regarded as an authority upon any of the questions raised in this case. But it serves to show that in the construction of a will almost identical
406 *in its terms, the counsel, the court below and this court incidentally construed the will not as conferring direct emancipation, but the capacity to elect; the court below deciding expressly, that they were not and would not be freedmen until they so elected; and Judge Tucker referring to emancipation not as a thing accomplished, but to be accomplished within the year when they were to be emancipated or sold, as they might elect.

It has been argued, that as the will in this case was subsequent to the act providing for the voluntary enslavement of the free negroes of the commonwealth, passed February 18th, 1856, Sess. Acts 1855-6, p. 37, the will should be construed with reference to that act; and that the testatrix may have contemplated a voluntary enslavement under that act. I think that would be a forced construction. The right conferred by that act is restricted to females who have attained the age of eighteen, and to males who have attained twenty-one years of age. If she had intended to make her slaves freedmen absolutely, she would have known if the act in question was present to her mind; that any direction was idle; as free persons, if of the proper age, they could act for themselves. And she gives to the adults and parents of infants the same right to select among her relations their respective owners as she had just before given them the right to accept or reject the provisions for their emancipation and outfit. If she had made a bequest with reference to the act of February 18th, 1856, she must be presumed to have known something of its provisions, and could not have supposed that parents would be authorized to re-enslave their infant children, or that the permission of the executor was necessary to enable a freedman to choose his master under that law.

The testatrix, it is manifest, was actuated by the most benevolent feelings 407 towards her slaves, and the *intention apparent in the various provisions of the will was to make such disposition as the slaves desired. She therefore gives immediate freedom to the favored servant, because his wishes were no doubt well known to her. As to the others, not questioning their legal capacity to elect, she did not emancipate them directly. She no doubt supposed, perhaps hoped, that such as could by their labor maintain themselves, would choose freedom; and her intention was that such should be emancipated as desired to be free, and those should be slaves who preferred to remain in the state; and still looking to the welfare of her slaves, and anxious to render their condition as comfortable as she could, she desires her executors to permit such as preferred to continue in a state of slavery, to select their owners among her relations—Thus throughout consulting their wishes and intending to conform her bequest to their desires.

I think that the operation of this will as an instrument of emancipation, as in the case of Bailey v. Poindexter, is made to depend on the choice of the slaves, and therefore that the provisions of the will giving such option are void: and this is the only question necessary to be decided in the present case.

The bill was filed to get the aid and direction of the court in regard to the emancipation of the negroes. The only question decided by the court was that the slaves were emancipated by the will, unless they decline to accept its provisions and remain slaves; and as a consequence of such decision, a commissioner was directed to ascertain the election of said negroes under the provisions of the will. No question was raised by the pleadings or decided by the court as to the rights of those interested in the estate, should the fifth clause in regard to emancipation prove ineffectual. I think that the decree should be reversed, leaving open all questions respecting the 408 rights of the parties interested *in the estate, to be adjudicated when a proper case shall be made for that purpose. The slaves not being manumitted by the will, they cannot be entertained as suitors in court, and as to them the bill must be dismissed.

MONCURE, J. The slaves of the testatrix were among the chief, if not the chief, objects of her bounty. They constituted by far the most valuable portion of her estate. She emancipated them by her will, by words as plain as the English language affords: not precatory, but mandatory words. It was lawful for her to emancipate them. The statute declares, that "any person may emancipate any of his slaves by last will in writing" &c. She emancipated hers by her last will, executed according to law. Why then is the emancipation invalid? The counsel for the appellants contend that it is invalid, not because she has not emancipated her slaves in plain and mandatory terms, but because, in her anxiety to provide for their comfort and happiness, she has superadded other terms which in effect give to them an election between freedom and slavery, instead of freedom absolutely; that they are incapable of making such an election; and that therefore they must remain in slavery; according to the recent decision of this court in Bailey v. Poindexter, supra. In other words, the counsel for the appellants contend that this case is ruled by that; and so ruled, as that the slaves are neither entitled to their freedom absolutely nor to elect between freedom and slavery; while the counsel for the appellees contend that this case is like that of Osborne v. Taylor's adm'r, 12 Gratt. 117, according to which the slaves are entitled to their freedom absolutely.

I think the position of the counsel of the appellees is correct, and that this case is like that of Osborne v. Taylor. If there be any difference between the two 409 *cases, I think this is stronger than that in favor of the absolute emancipation of the slaves. Let us compare the two cases. By the second, third and fourth clauses of the will in that case the testator directs certain of his slaves to be liberated, or, at their option, to remain in the state and choose masters. By the eighth clause he gave the residue of his negroes to trustees for the use of Mrs. C. M. R. Johnson during her life; and then disposed of the subject as follows: "At the death of Mrs. C. M. R. Johnson it is my further will and direction that the slaves embraced in this item be emancipated, and one-fourth of the property which Mrs. J. may not dispose of at her death as required in item the sixth, be distributed amongst them as may be deemed most equitable by my executors. But should a part or the whole of the negroes prefer remaining in the state, they can do so by choosing masters to serve during the life of the person or persons chosen, at the death of whom they shall have the option of freedom or slavery by making a second choice." The slaves mentioned in the second, third and fourth clauses appear to have received their freedom soon after the testator's death. At the death of Mrs. J. a question arose as to the rights of the negroes who had been given to her for life by the eighth clause before recited. And the personal representative of the testator filed a bill to have that and other questions arising in the execution of his office determined by the court. The Circuit court held that the negroes bequeathed to Mrs. Johnson for life became entitled to their freedom at her death; and that the provision authorizing them to choose masters was void; and decreed accordingly. This court, composed of all the judges, unamimously affirmed that portion of the decree. Judge Samuels, in whose opinion on this branch of the case the other judges concurred (certainly all except Judge Daniel, who concurred in the decree of affirmance), 410 speaking *of the objection taken by the appellants, that the slaves in question were not emancipated by the will, says, "this objection is insisted on, because, as is alleged, the slaves were left by the will in the condition of slavery at the death of Mrs. Johnson, with the capacity to become free upon their election to become so; and until the election shall be made, they remain in the condition of slavery: and we are referred to the case of Elder v. Elder's ex'or, above cited. This part of the objection is founded on a misapprehension of the will. The counsel construe the will as directing that the slaves shall remain such until they elect to become free; whereas the will, in a substantive clause, distinctly manumits them; and afterwards, in another clause, gives them the election to remain in the state of Virginia, in a condition intermediate between slavery and freedom. The latter alternative is against the settled policy of the law, and has no effect. Forward's adm'r v. Thamer, 9 Gratt. 537. The bequest of freedom is in no wise impaired by the impracticable and repugnant alternative offered to the choice of the slaves." That is the case of Osborne v. Taylor. And now let us look at this case.

By the first clause or item of Mrs. Coalter's will she gave to her daughter for life all her estate, exclusive of her negroes, after the payment of her debts and the legacies and charges to which it was therein after subjected. By the second she gave the estate so given to her daughter for life, in remainder at her daughter's death to the children of her sister Mrs. Lacy. By the third she authorized her executors to sell any portion of her estate for the payment of said debts, legacies and charges, and also for the purpose of reinvestment. By the fourth she manumitted her servant Charles, and directed her executors to provide him with a sufficient fund to take him to such state or country as he might elect to live in, and pay to him an annuity 411 of *one hundred dollars during his life. The fifth is in those words:

"Fifth. I direct, in regard to the balance of my negroes, that they shall be manumitted on the 1st day of January 1858. And I authorize and request my said executors to ascertain what fund will be sufficient to provide the usual outfit for and to remove said negroes to Liberia; and I hereby direct my executors to raise said fund, or such an amount as in their judgment may be sufficient for that purpose, from my said estate, and to use the said fund in removing and settling my said servants in Liberia, or any other free state or country, in which they may elect to live, the adults selecting for themselves, and the parents for their infant children. And I further direct that if any of my said servants shall prefer to remain in Virginia, instead of accepting the foregoing provisions, it is my desire that they shall be permitted by my executors to select among my relations their respective owners; said election to be made by the adults and parents as aforesaid."

The remaining clauses are not material to be stated.

Now what is the essential difference between these two cases? The words of manumission are at least as strong and mandatory in this case as in that. The words in that case are, "At the death of Mrs. C. M. R. J. it is my further will and direction that the slaves embraced in this item be emancipated." The words in this case are, "I direct in regard to the balance of my negroes, that they shall be manumitted on the 1st day of January 1858." This express and absolute manumission is immediately followed in each case by a provision, in property or money, for the emancipated slaves. And then follows a similar provision in each case in regard to their preference to remain in the state, the said provision being contained in the same item with the manumitting clause in 412 each case; *to wit, the eighth item in that, and the fifth in this case. The words of the provision in that case are, "But should a part or the whole of the negroes prefer remaining in the state they can do so by choosing masters to serve during the life of the person or persons chosen, at the death of whom they shall have the option of freedom or slavery by making a second choice." The words in this case are, "And I further direct, that if any of my said servants shall prefer to remain in Virginia instead of accepting the foregoing provisions, it is my desire that they shall be permitted by my executors to select among my relations their respective owners; said election to be made by the adults and parents as aforesaid." Can the will in this case, any more than in that, be construed "as directing that the slaves shall remain such until they elect to become free." And may it not as well be said in this case as it was in that, "that the will, in a substantive clause, distinctly manumits them; and afterwards, in another clause, gives them the election to remain in the state, in a condition intermediate between slavery and freedom?" and that "the bequest of freedom is in no wise impaired by the impracticable and repugnant alternative offered to the choice of the slaves?" Is there any substantial difference between the nature of the alternatives offered to their choice in the two cases? If in the one case it was, "to remain in the state in a condition intermediate between slavery and freedom," was it not equally so in the other? The testator in that case obviously did not expect or intend that if they elected to remain in the state they would remain otherwise than as slaves—slaves of the person they might choose as their master during his life, and then to be free or slaves absolutely, at their election. The testator could lawfully have given his slaves to any person for life, and then to be free. And when that case was decided, it was 413 *generally supposed that the testator might lawfully have given them, at the death of the life tenant, their "option of freedom or slavery:" in other words, might have made them then free, on condition that they wished to be free. The "condition intermediate between slavery and freedom," to which the court referred, was a state of slavery, with a right to choose masters from time to time: a right incompatible with that state to which no civil rights are incident. So in this case, the testatrix probably did not expect or intend that, if the negroes preferred to remain in the state, they would remain otherwise than as slaves—slaves of those whom they might select from among her relations, as their respective owners; "said election to be made by the adults and parents as aforesaid." But that right of election is incompatible with the state of slavery, and would have placed the slaves in this case as much "in a condition intermediate between slavery and freedom," as the similar right attempted to be given to the slaves in that case would have placed them in a like condition. Certainly there is at least as much in the will in this case to indicate an intention that the emancipated slaves might remain in the state otherwise than as slaves, as there is in the will in that case. The word "masters" in that case is just as strong to indicate a state of slavery as the word "owners" in this. The express "option of freedom or slavery," given in that case, leaves no doubt of the testator's intention; and if confirmation were required, it would be found in similar expressions occurring elsewhere in the will. No such expressions occur in the will in this case. The testatrix obviously designed that if her negroes preferred to remain in the state, they should be permitted to enjoy as much freedom as might be consistent with their so remaining. She had their comfort and welfare alone in her view, in making the provision which she did on that subject. *She desired that they might be permitted to select their respective owners from among her relations: supposing no doubt that they would take better care of the slaves than any other owners. She probably did not intend that the selected relations should pay any thing for the slaves selecting them. To have required that, might have defeated her purpose to give to the slaves a choice of owners. The selected relations might be unwilling or unable to pay full value for the slaves selecting them. No disposition is made of the proceeds of any sale of the slaves in the event of their preferring to remain in the state, while the slaves themselves are expressly excluded in the residuary bequest.

If it were necessary, therefore, in order to bring this case within the principle of that of Osborne v. Taylor, to show that "the alternative offered to the choice of the slaves," is "a condition intermediate between slavery and freedom," I think that has been fully shown: at least as much as it was shown in the case of Osborne v. Taylor itself.

But it is not necessary to do so. The principle of that case, as I understand it, at least goes to this extent, that if the will, in a substantive clause, distinctly manumits the slaves, the bequest of freedom is in no wise impaired by any impracticable and repugnant alternative, afterwards, in another clause, offered to the choice of the slaves; and if that principle goes no farther, it goes full far enough to sustain the claim of the negroes in this case to their freedom. The will of Mrs. Coalter comes up, literally, to the requisitions of the principle thus laid down in its most restricted form. But I do not understand that case as restricting the principle to a set form of words, in which alone it can be conveyed. The form of words which occurred in that case was referred to in illustration of the substantive principle on which the case was decided; *which principle is, that if the will distinctly manumits the slaves, the intention to manumit thus plainly expressed, is not to be frustrated by the occurrence of other words in the will of equivocal import, or which, if they have any intelligible meaning at all, merely offer to the choice of the manumitted slaves some impracticable and repugnant alternative; whether it be "a condition intermediate between slavery and freedom," or a condition of unqualified slavery: either of which conditions is an "impracticable and repugnant alternative," and the latter more repugnant than the former. The intention to emancipate is considered, in such case, as the paramount intent, and will prevail though the subordinate intent be unlawful. The order in which the words of the will occur is immaterial, except so far as it may serve to throw light on the question of intention. The order used in Mrs. Coalter's will more plainly indicates a paramount intention to emancipate than any other which could be used, where the manumission is accompanied by an offer of such an alternative as is before mentioned; and being the precise order used in the will which was construed in Osborne v. Taylor, that case, it seems to me, must govern this. Otherwise, that case can have no effect at all in any other case, and has been virtually overruled by Bailey v. Poindexter. But the majority of the court in the latter case, who concurred in the decision of Osborne v. Taylor, expressly recognize it, not only in Bailey v. Poindexter, but in this case, as a still binding authority. I have therefore so regarded it in this opinion. An expression occurs in the will in this case which does not occur in the will in that, and upon which much stress was laid in the argument of the appellants' counsel. I mean the words, "instead of accepting the foregoing provisions." It was argued that the manumission of the slaves is one of the "provisions" referred to; and that these words indicate *an intention to give a mere election between freedom and slavery. Conceding, for the present, that the manumission of the slaves is one of the provisions referred to, the words in question are only an expression of what is implied in the will in Osborne v. Taylor. The testator did not any more expect in that case than did the testatrix in this, that the negroes could have the benefit of both alternatives. And when he said, "But should a part or the whole of the negroes prefer remaining in the state," the words, "instead of accepting the foregoing provisions," or others of like import, are plainly implied.

We have seen how much this case resembles that of Osborne v. Taylor. Now compare it with Bailey v. Poindexter. The words under which emancipation was claimed in that case were, "The negroes loaned my wife, at her death I wish to have their choice of being emancipated or sold publicly." There are other words in the will bearing upon the question, but they all confirm the plain meaning of those I have quoted; which do not distinctly manumit the slaves, but merely give them a "choice of being emancipated or sold publicly." There are expressions in the will in Osborne v. Taylor which bear some resemblance to these. The testator there speaks of his slaves having "the option of freedom or slavery." But no such expressions occur in Mrs. Coalter's will, nor any bearing the remotest resemblance to them. The principle of the case of Bailey v. Poindexter is, that where a mere election between freedom and slavery is given, as in that case, the slaves are incapable of making an election, and therefore must remain slaves. The principle of the case of Osborne v. Taylor is, that where the will in a substantive clause distinctly manumits the slaves, nothing remains to be done by them to complete their right to freedom, which will be in no wise impaired by any impracticable and 417 repugnant alternative offered *elsewhere in the will to the choice of the slaves. Under which of these two principles does this case fall? Plainly to my mind, under that of the case of Osborne v. Taylor.

A great deal has been said in the argument about the proper rules for the construction of wills: As that the intention of the testator if lawful must prevail; and that to ascertain the intention, we must look to the whole will, and may transpose sentences and strike out and supply words. And the argument was practically illustrated by transposing the sentences of Mrs. Coalter's will, striking out and supplying words, and thus showing what was supposed to be the intention of the testatrix. By far the best rule for construing a will is to place ourselves, as nearly as we can, in the situation of the testator when he wrote it, and then to read it precisely as it is written. Its meaning, if it have any, can almost always be thus ascertained. The application of that rule to Mrs. Coalter's will leaves no doubt as to its meaning. It is a plain will, expressed in language and in a form perhaps as well calculated to convey the meaning of the testatrix as any that could have been used. It was written in her last sickness and a few months only before her death. She had but one child to provide for, and that only for life; and had an ample estate, independently of her slaves, to enable her to make that provision. Her slaves, except her house servant Charles, were generally hired out for the year, and could not be emancipated before the end of the year. Under these circumstances the will was written. By the fourth clause she manumitted Charles presently; and by the fifth the balance of her negroes on the first day of the ensuing year. On that day they were to be absolutely free. The testatrix then, as she had a right to do, renounced all dominion over them. They then became free without the necessity of any act or acceptance on their 418 part. *Indeed, they could not refuse their freedom, supposing it to have been given to them absolutely. The testatrix, by plain and positive words, placed them in a state of freedom on that day; and then proceeded to direct her executors to provide the necessary funds and remove the negroes to Liberia or any other country in which they might elect to live. She further directed, it is true, that if any of them should prefer to remain in Virginia instead of accepting the foregoing provisions, it was her desire that they should be permitted by her executors to select among her relations their respective owners. But she surely did not intend, by this expression of what she desired in a certain event—this precatory bequest, if it may be so called—to convert an absolute, into a conditional emancipation—a positive bequest of freedom into a bequest of a mere choice between freedom and slavery. She certainly did not intend that the right of her negroes to freedom should depend on the expression of their acceptance of it, on or before the first of January 1858. They were to be absolutely free on that day, so far as she was concerned. She supposed, that though free on that day, they might thereafter lawfully remain in Virginia; and should they prefer doing so instead of accepting the provisions she had made for their removal to Liberia or some other country, she desired that they might be permitted to select owners from among her relations. She no doubt supposed that they might express their preference to remain in Virginia at any time before it became necessary for them as free negroes to remove therefrom.

It was argued that the words "instead of accepting the foregoing provisions," embrace manumission as one of the provisions referred to; and that thus, the previous positive bequest of freedom is converted into a bequest of a mere election between freedom and slavery. These words seem only to refer to the provisions 419 *which had, immediately before and in the same sentence, been made for removing and settling the negroes in Liberia or any other country in which they might elect to live. "If any of my said servants shall prefer to remain in Virginia instead of accepting the foregoing provisions" (that is, for their removal and settlement in some other country), "it is my desire that they shall be permitted by my executors to select," &c.; the selection, in either case, to be made by the adults and parents as aforesaid. She desires that they shall be permitted by her executors, not to elect between freedom and slavery, but to select among her relations their respective owners in case they should prefer to remain in Virginia. But if the manumission itself be one of the provisions referred to, the effect would not be as contended for. It would only show that the testatrix supposed that her servants could lawfully refuse the freedom she had previously given them; or, at most, supposed that she could give them a right, instead of accepting it, to remain in Virginia in the manner provided, if they preferred to do so.

It was admitted in the argument, that if the testatrix intended that her slaves should be absolutely free on the 1st of January 1858, they are entitled to their freedom, notwithstanding what is said in the will about their preferring to remain in Virginia. But it was said, that it would be absurd to suppose she intended any such thing; and that it is more reasonable to suppose she intended to give them a direct election to be free, and go out of the state, or slaves, and remain in it. The same supposed absurdity existed in the will in Osborne v. Taylor, and also in Forward's adm'r v. Thamer, 9 Gratt. 537. But that did not prevent this court from construing the wills in those cases to confer freedom, with conditions subsequent annexed, which were repugnant and void. Is it reasonable to suppose that the testatrix intended to give a mere right of elec-

420 tion *to her slaves, which, according to Bailey v. Poindexter, would simply be a void bequest? Is it not at least as reasonable to suppose that she intended to give them freedom, with a condition subsequent annexed? Which would she have been more likely to have done, had she been informed, when she made her will, of the law as it has been since adjudged in Bailey v. Poindexter, and of the act of February 18, 1856 (Sess. Acts, p. 37), providing for the voluntary enslavement of free negroes? To construe her will as giving a mere right of election, would, according to that case, render the bequest totally void. While to construe it as giving freedom to the slaves, with a condition subsequent annexed, would effectuate, in greater part at least, if not fully, the intention of the testatrix, not only in giving freedom to all, but in enabling such of them as prefer to remain in the state and are of the required age, to do so, by complying with the requisitions of the act aforesaid.

We ought to read the will as it is written, and give effect, as far as we can, to the intention thus ascertained. We ought not to be astute to find out some other intention, for the purpose, not of effectuating, but of disappointing it. We ought to apply to bequests of freedom the same rules of construction which we apply to bequests of property. "This power of emancipation (said Judge Carr in Mann v. Given & al., 7 Leigh 689, 701), we ought not to suppose that the legislature has dealt out grudgingly; nor ought we, when a man has resorted to the legislative means, to look with a jealous eye upon the proceeding, and hedge him round by rules and restrictions which we do not apply to other cases. The slave is his own property; the law gives him the right of emancipation; and when he has intended honestly to exercise it, without trenching upon the rights of others, we ought to extend to the instrument by which he attempted to effect 421 *his intention, as much liberality at least as is shown to others disposing of property."

I am therefore of opinion that the negroes in this case are entitled to their freedom, even conceding that the case of Bailey v. Poindexter was rightly decided. I must say, however, that for reasons assigned in my dissenting opinion in that case, I still think it was not rightly decided; and I would now be willing to overrule it, if it were like this case. Stare decisis, I know, is a rule of the first importance. But that case itself, in my judgment, does so much violence to the rule, that it would be more vindicated by overruling than by adhering to the case. I do not mean to say, however, that, confirmed as that case is by the opinion of the majority in this case, I may not feel myself bound by it hereafter.

Collateral Inheritance Tax—Constitutional.*—The act of March 2d, 1854, § 15, which imposes a tax upon collateral inheritances, is within the constitutional powers of the general assembly, and is still in force.

John Eyre, late of the county of Northampton departed this life the 19th of June 1857, leaving neither father, mother, wife, brother, sister, or lineal descendant. He left a will, which was duly admitted to probate in the county court of Northampton. By this will the testator made large devises and bequests to his niece, Mrs. Margaret A. Taylor, and to others, and he constituted his grand nephew Severn Eyre his residuary devisee and legatee, and appointed him one of his executors. The whole personal estate of the deceased was assessed by the sheriff of the county at one hundred and five thousand three hundred and fifty-four dollars, and the value of his real estate in Northampton county was

*Collateral Inheritance Tax—Constitutional.—In Schoolfield v. City of Lynchburg, 78 Va. 371, it was said: "In the cases of Miller v. The Commonwealth and Barrett v. The Commonwealth, reported in 27th Gratt. (110), all the successive statutes upon the subject of this (collateral inheritance) tax are collated and reviewed by JUDGE CHRISTIAN, who cites and approves Eyre v. Jacob, JUDGE MONCURE concurring, who had dissented in Eyre v. Jacob, and while the court in this case was not unanimous, yet the question as to the state tax upon collateral inheritances may be said to be settled. And in a later case—Peters v. The City of Lynchburg (76 Va. 927),—JUDGE STAPLES concedes the complete power of the legislature of the state to tax collateral inheritances."

In Magoun v. Illinois, etc., Bank, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 596, 170 U. S. 283, MR. JUSTICE MCKENNA cited many cases as declaring the constitutionality of legacy and inheritance taxes, and as explaining the principle upon which they are based. Among others he cites the principal case; Schoolfield v. City of Lynchburg, 78 Va. 366; U. S. v. Perkins, 163 U. S. 625, 628, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1073; Clapp v. Mason, 94 U. S. 587; Scholey v. Rew, 23 Wall. 331.

The legality of an inheritance tax seems to be based on the grounds that it is not in the proper sense a tax on property, but is a tax on a privilege, granted by the state, of acquiring property by inheritance. See Miller v. Com., 27 Gratt. 117, and foot-note; U. S. v. Perkins, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1075, 163 U. S. 625; Knowlton v. Moore, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 753, 178 U. S. 41; Plummer v. Coler, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 831, 835, 178 U. S. 115; Wallace v. Myers, 38 Fed. Rep. 186, all citing the principal case as authority on the subject.

eighteen thousand and eighty-nine dollars; and he owned a tract of land in Accomack county, which he devised by his will, and which did not come into the hands of the executors.

The sheriff of the county of Northampton claiming that the estate of John Eyre was liable to pay the tax assessed by the act of March 2d, 1854, on collateral inheritances, and assessing the property at the above valuation, levied on property of the testator which he had bequeathed to Severn Eyre, and which was then in his possession. And thereupon Eyre applied to the judge of the Circuit court of Northampton for an injunction to restrain the sheriff from 423 selling the property *of the plaintiff so levied on by him, on the ground that the act was unconstitutional; which was granted.

The only party to the bill was Jacob the sheriff; but an amended bill was afterwards filed, making the auditor of public accounts a party; and then the cause was transferred to the Circuit court for the city of Richmond.

In March 1858 the defendant moved the court to dissolve the injunction, which had been awarded the plaintiff; which motion the court sustained; and thereupon Severn Eyre applied to this court for an appeal; which was allowed.

The case was argued by Morson, for the appellant, and the Attorney General, for the appellee, upon, 1st. The constitutionality of the law; and, 2d. Whether the law was in force when this tax was assessable?

The questions were, Whether the provisions in the constitution, which provide that taxes shall be equal and uniform, apply to this tax? Mr. Morson insisted that the provision for uniformity and equality of taxation applied to every species of tax. And he insisted further, that this tax on collateral inheritances was a tax on property, and therefore indisputably came within the constitutional provision. The attorney general contended that the constitutional provision relied on by the appellant only applied to taxes on property; and that this was not a tax on property, but on the transitus of property; a distinction which defined the boundaries between federal and state taxation.

LEE, J. The regularity of the proceeding by injunction in this case although discussed by the counsel for the appellant in his opening argument, was not controverted by the attorney general. He 424 was understood *to concede that it is a proper mode by which to test the legality of a levy made by an officer under the supposed authority of a law the constitutionality of which is denied. Upon this point therefore I shall content myself with referring to the cases of Goddin v. Crump, 8 Leigh 120; and Bull, &c. v. Read, 13 Gratt. 78, and authorities there cited. It might perhaps admit of more question whether a court of equity would as a matter of course in such a case as this inter-

In 6 Va. Law Reg. 186, the editor, while admitting that the principle above laid down is established by authority, ventures the remark that the distinction between a tax on specific property, and a tax on the privilege of acquiring, holding, and enjoying the same property, is scarcely broader than that between tweedledum and tweedledee.

Constitutional Law—Taxation—"Equal and Uniform."—In American Harrow Co. v. Shaffer, 68 Fed. Rep. 753, it was said: "It is settled by unquestioned authorities that the terms 'equal and uniform' apply only to a direct tax on property, and that the clause by which equality and uniformity are prescribed does not limit the power of the legislature as to the subjects of taxation, but is only intended to prevent an arbitrary taxation of property according to kind or quality, without regard to value. Com. v. Moore, 25 Gratt. 951; Eyre v. Jacob, 14 Gratt. 422; Cooley, Const. Lim. (5th Ed.) 616, 617; Sedg. St. & Const. Law (2d Ed.) 504." Justice and equality are of the essence of constitutional taxation, but exact justice and equality are not attainable, and consequently not required. Danville v. Shelton, 76 Va. 329; Ould v. Richmond, 23 Gratt. 473; Helfrick v. Com., 29 Gratt. 850, all citing the principal case. See also, Slaughter's Case, 13 Gratt. 769; Gilkeson v. Frederick Justices, 13 Gratt. 577. The most that can be done is to approximate them as near as possible. Helfrick v. Com., 29 Gratt. 850; Com. v. Moore, 25 Gratt. 958. In Helfrick v. Com., 29 Gratt. 850, the court said: "It has been repeatedly held by this court that the provisions in the constitution requiring equality and uniformity of taxation, apply only to a direct tax on property, and not to license tax, which do not admit of a tax strictly equal and uniform in the sense contended for. But, if it be conceded that the rule must apply to all subjects, yet it can only be applied as far as practicable. If a given subject be only susceptible of a modified application of the principle, it must receive this, and not be rejected, because the rule cannot be applied with perfect precision to its whole extent and in all its results. See Eyre v. Jacob, Sheriff, 14 Gratt. 422, and the laws there cited. See also, Ould & Carrington v. The City of Richmond, 23 Gratt. 464; which last case is a strong illustration of this doctrine." Legislative Enactment—When Declared Void.—In Helfrick v. Com., 29 Gratt. 847, it is said: "It is universally conceded that to declare a legislative enactment void is the exercise of a judicial function of a most delicate character, never to be done except upon the clearest conviction of the unconstitutionality of the law. Nowhere has this doctrine received a more unqualified sanction than has been given to it by this court. See the cases of Eyre v. Jacob, Sheriff, 14 Gratt. 422, and cases there cited; Homestead Cases, 22 Gratt. 266; Roberts' Adm'r v. Cocke, etc., 28 Gratt. 207; Reed v. Union Bank of Winchester, supra (29 Gratt. 719)."

fere by way of injunction to restrain the act of an officer, not because the constitutionality of the law under which he is proceeding is called in question, but because the existence of any such law is absolutely denied. Upon this question however I think it may be unnecessary to express any opinion.

The commonwealth being the party substantially interested in the subject matter of controversy, it might have been more regular under the provisions of the act entitled an act regulating the jurisdiction of the Circuit courts, passed May 22, 1852 (Sess. Acts 1852, p. 58, § 3), that this suit should have been originally instituted in the Circuit court of the city of Richmond in order that the commonwealth might be duly represented by the proper officer, and such officer should of course have been made a party defendant. As however the suit was subsequently removed to that court in conformity to the provisions of § 8 of ch. 46 of the Code, p. 239, and the auditor of public accounts who had been made a party by an amended bill, duly appeared and filed an answer, all difficulties as to parties and the regularity of the hearing before the Circuit court of Richmond city, may be considered as overcome, and we may proceed to consider the case upon its merits.

The object of the bill was to test the legality of the levy made by the sheriff of Northampton upon the property of the appellant to enforce payment of the 425 *tax claimed to be due to the commonwealth under the several provisions of law imposing a tax upon the transmission of estates by devise or descent to any other person or use than those specified, and prescribing also the rate of the same. The provisions under which the tax was claimed to be due are those of ch. 35 of the Code, § 10 and § 42, p. 179, 184, and of ch. 39, from § 6 to § 12, inclusive, p. 214, 215, and the act entitled an act imposing taxes for the support of government, passed March 2, 1854, § 15; and the legality of the sheriff's proceeding was denied because as it was alleged, the several provisions of law above cited including the fifteenth section of the last named act, were unconstitutional, inoperative and void. And in the argument here, the further ground was taken by the counsel for the appellant, that in point of fact when this levy was made, there was no law upon the statute book authorizing or requiring such a levy to be made, the act of March 2, 1854, having expired or been replaced by the act of March 18, 1856, which contained no provision for a tax upon a subject of this character.

It has always been considered to be a most delicate office for a judge to undertake to pronounce an act of the legislature to be unconstitutional and void. It is substantially to repeal the obnoxious law and thus in effect to exercise a power properly belonging to another department of the government. "The question (says Judge Marshall) whether a law be void for its repugnancy to the constitution is at all times a question of much delicacy, which ought seldom if ever, to be decided in the affirmative, in a doubtful case." "It is not on slight implication and vague conjecture that the legislature is to be pronounced to have transcended its powers and its acts to be considered as void. The opposition between the constitution and the law must be such that the judge feels a 426 clear and *strong conviction of their incompatibility with each other." Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch's R. 87. "The question whether a law is in accordance with the constitution (says Judge Brooke) is at all times a very delicate and important question." "It should not be in a doubtful case that the acts of that body (the legislature) should be decided by the courts to be unconstitutional." Sharpe v. Robertson, 5 Gratt. 518, 642. "The duty of enquiring into and deciding upon the legal validity of an act of the legislature has always been regarded by this court, and justly, as one of the most delicate it can be called upon to discharge." Per Daniel, J., in S. C. p. 574. Where a plain and palpable infraction of constitutional provision is shown in a law upon the validity of which it is called upon to decide, it is of course one of the highest and most solemn duties of the court to declare such law to be inoperative and void. If however it be only upon slight implication or inconclusive reasoning that the supposed infraction can be made out, the court should never undertake to rescind and annul the solemn and deliberate act of the legislative department of the government. To doubt in such a case should be to affirm.

There is certainly one proposition which will not be questioned, and that is that the legislature possesses the full, absolute, sovereign power of taxation, excepting so far as it may have been surrendered to the general government or may be interdicted by the constitution of the United States, or as it may be controlled by the restrictions and mandates of the constitution of the state. See City of Richmond v. Daniel, not —It is proper to proceed by injunction in order to test the validity of a levy made by an officer under the supposed authority of a law the constitutionality of which is denied.

This proposition in the principal case was approved in the City of Richmond v. Crenshaw, 76 Va. 940; Blanton v. Southern Fertilizer Co., 77 Va. 335; S. V. R. R. Co. v. Supervisors, 78 Va. 276; Lynchburg, etc., Ry. Co. v. Dameron, 95 Va. 546, 28 S. E. Rep. 951. The rule seems to be established by a long line of decisions. See Goddin v. Crump, 8 Leigh 121; Bull v. yet reported, opinion of Samuels, J. And this power it is most important should be sustained and upheld as essential to the very existence of the government of the state, and as providing the means for vindicating her sovereign authority.

427 See Providence Bank v. Billings, *&c., 4 Peters' R. 514; Weston v. City Council of Charleston, 2 Peters 449. We do not go to our constitution to see what powers of taxation are given to the legislature but to ascertain what restrictions and limitations upon its general sovereign power are imposed by its provisions. If therefore the power to tax any subject whatever is not excluded by the terms of the constitution or by necessary and inevitable implication, it must exist in the general assembly to be exercised at the discretion of that body as wisdom and a proper sense of justice shall direct.

The counsel for the appellant does not controvert this position, but he insists that the particular tax in question though not expressly and in terms prohibited by the constitution, is yet as effectually prohibited by the most necessary implication from its provisions as if the power to impose it had been expressly denied. He insists that it is in effect purely a tax on property, or if it is not to be regarded as a tax on property but on a benefit or privilege to the citizen, that the power to impose it is excluded because it is not enumerated amongst those authorized to be imposed by the twenty-fifth section; and whether a tax on property or privilege it is equally violative of the twenty-second section of the fourth article of the constitution which declares that taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the commonwealth. He also maintains that if it is to be considered a tax on property, it conflicts with the provision of the twenty-second section which declares that all property other than slaves shall be taxed in proportion to its value and with the twenty-third section of the same article regulating the taxation of slaves.

If this tax were properly to be considered as a tax on property, there would be great force in the argument of the counsel. As the ordinary annual tax had been assessed upon the decedent, this would then 428 appear *to be a second taxation of the same subject, with the additional assessment upon all the slaves of whatever age and at their real value. But such, I think is not its true character. It cannot be regarded in a proper legal sense as a tax upon property. The property tax which the framers of the constitution were contemplating in the twenty-second section was the ordinary annually recurring tax for the support of government laid upon all property whatsoever. They had no reference to casual subjects of taxation occurring irregularly and occasionally which though connected with property were yet readily to be distinguished in their essential character and features. If the tax imposed had been a fixed and arbitrary sum, it would scarcely have been said to be a tax on property although every tax for which the property of the tax payer is liable might be called a tax on property in a certain sense. But the argument is that as the tax is a certain per centum of the value of the estate and the property pays it, it is therefore a tax on the property itself. But this is by no means a necessary logical conclusion. The intention of the legislature was plainly to tax the transmission of property by devise or descent to collateral kindred; to require that a party thus taking the benefit of a civil right secured to him under the law should pay a certain premium for its enjoyment; and as it was thought just and reasonable that the amount of the premium should bear a certain proportion to the value of the subject enjoyed, it is fixed at a certain per centum upon the value of the whole estate transmitted. And of this surely there can be no just complaint; on the contrary it would have been unequal and unjust to require that a party receiving an inconsiderable property should pay as high a premium as one who takes a large and valuable estate. It is perfectly in accordance with the principles of natural justice and the spirit of the consti-

429 tution that *the tax upon such a subject should be regulated in strict proportion to the value of the benefit which it secures.

The case of Brown, &c. v. The State of Maryland, 12 Wheat. R. 419, was cited by the counsel. In that case it was held that the prohibition in the constitution of the United States to the states to lay duties or imposts on imports or exports, prevented them from requiring the importer to take out a license and pay a tax before he could be permitted to sell the articles by the bale or package; and that the requirement of such a license and tax before the importer could sell also conflicted with that provision of the constitution which declared that congress should have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states and with the Indian tribes. The court considered that as the importer had paid the duty imposed by the act of congress, he thereby acquired the right not only to bring the articles into the country but also to dispose of them afterwards, that being the essential object of the importation and the motive for paying the duty. But I do not perceive how this touches the question in our case. It was not decided that a tax on the transitus of property and on the property itself, were one and the same; but it was held that both the right to import and the right to sell the merchandise after it was imported were secured to the importer by the payment of the duty imposed by the act of congress, the power of conferring both these rights having been appropriated to the general government by the constitution and necessarily therefore denied to the states.

The objection that the tax is not levied upon the heir or legatee but is to be paid out of the estate of the decedent, and that therefore it cannot be considered a tax upon the privilege of succeeding to the property, is I think more specious than real.

430 Whether *the tax is paid by the personal representative before he turns over the estate to the party entitled or by the latter after he receives it, the effect is the same. It is in either case a premium paid for the right enjoyed and the value of the estate is exactly diminished by the amount of the premium. Nor does the manner in which the tax is spoken of in the Code and subsequent acts at all change its real character. It is spoken of as a tax on "decedents' estates," but in immediate connection with their transmission under the statute of wills or the laws regulating descents and distributions; and the character of the tax is not to be fixed by any isolated words that may be employed, but they must be taken in the connection in which they are used and the true character is to be deduced from the nature and essence of the subject.

That the general assembly of Virginia in the absence of a constitutional prohibition does possess the power to tax a civil right or privilege like this is beyond all question. This is fully embraced within its general and comprehensive power upon the subject to which allusion has already been made. But it may be deduced from the very nature of the subject itself. The right to take property by devise or descent is the creature of the law and secured and protected by its authority. The legislature might if it saw proper, restrict the succession to a decedent's estate, either by devise or descent to a particular class of his kindred, say to his lineal descendants and ascendants; it might impose terms and conditions upon which collateral relations may be permitted to take it; or it may tomorrow, if it pleases, absolutely repeal the statute of wills and that of descents and distributions and declare that upon the death of a party, his property shall be applied to the payment of his debts, and the residue appropriated to public uses. Possessing this sweeping power over the whole subject, it is difficult to see upon what 431 *ground its right to appropriate a modicum of the estate, call it a tax or what you will, as the condition upon which those who take the estate shall be permitted to enjoy it, can be successfully questioned. That the tax is confined to collateral inheritances and devises to others than those specified, presents no difficulty. It is the will of the legislature to make this discrimination and its discretion upon the subject must be regarded as having been duly and properly exercised.

Assuming then that this is a tax upon a civil right or privilege, which the legislature may impose if there be no prohibition in the constitution, we are to enquire whether there be any such prohibition. None certainly in terms is to be found in that instrument, but it has been argued that as it is not one of the subjects named in the twenty-fifth section, the power to impose it is excluded by necessary implication, upon the principle expressio unius exclusio est alterius. But this argument would prove too much, for it would sweep away the taxes on deeds, suits, notarial seals and that class of subjects, the constitutionality of which has never been questioned by any one. It would restrict the whole power of taxation to the particular subjects named in the twenty-second and three following sections. But this surely could not have been designed by the framers of the constitution. If those four sections had been entirely omitted no one can doubt that the legislature would have had full power to tax all the subjects to which they relate. The three first of these were plainly not intended to confer a power of taxation; they prescribe rules by which the power already supposed to be possessed by the legislature shall be exercised. The language of the twenty-fifth section is somewhat different and might seem to be permissive in its character; but the section seems 432 *rather to be introduced for the purpose of imposing a restriction than of conferring a power. All property was to be taxed ad valorem, and taxation was to be equal and uniform; but if it should be deemed expedient to tax incomes and licenses, the property from which the income was derived and the capital invested in the business for which the license was required, were to be exempted. Or it may have been thought that as all property was to be taxed a doubt might arise whether a tax on incomes and licenses could be substituted for one on the property or capital, and therefore the particular language was used to remove such doubt and show that the legislature had an election as to which of the subjects should be made to bear the tax. Why "salaries" was also named may not be so apparent. It may be that it was intended by just implication to exclude the power to tax the office or employment from which the salary proceeded and the salary itself. Or it may be that as "incomes" had been mentioned, it was thought the kindred subject of "salaries" should also be made to exclude any conclusion from its omission that the power to tax them was not intended to be exercised by the legislature. And thus that the section was intended to make a qualification and to remove doubts, but not to tie up the hands of the legislature so as to restrict the power of taxation to the property tax, capitation tax, and tax on incomes, salaries and licenses. But however this may be it seems to me that where a general sovereign power exists to be exercised at the pleasure of the legislature over numerous different subjects, it would be very unwise and unsafe to hold that because a few of those subjects may have chanced to be named for some particular purpose or in some particular connection in the instrument which is intended not to confer but to restrict its powers, therefore all others were im-

433 pliedly *excluded. To my mind there is not that necesaary and inevitable implication which alone can supply the place of an express and positive prohibition.

If the power of taxation then was intended to be exercised over other subjects than those named in these sections, it is not surprising that in their number this tax should have a place. It is a tax of great antiquity having been imposed upon the Romans as early as the days of the Emperor Augustus. It was adopted by various nations of Europe, and together with the tax on transfers of property among the living, constituted in ancient times according to a learned writer, one of the principal branches of the revenue of the federal crown. See Smith's Wealth of Nations, p. 387, et seq. In modern times, it is in some shape or other a tax of frequent imposition, and that it was not introduced into our system at an earlier day was perhaps only owing to the fact that the exigencies of the treasury had not sooner required a resort to other subjects of taxation than those previously adopted. It was first imposed, I believe, by the act of 1843-4, and at the late revisal of 1849 was re-enacted as a regular and permanent tax. And at the first session of the general assembly after the new constitution was adopted and when the cotemporaneous history of that instrument must be supposed to have been fresh in the memory of the law makers, it was recognized as a valid existing subject of taxation and the rate fixed at which it was to be levied.

If this tax is not to be regarded as a property tax, the counsel concedes that the ad valorem principle cannot be applied to it, and therefore that it is not within that provision of the twenty-second section nor those of the twenty-third section; but he argues that every tax of what nature soever is within the principle of equality and 434 uniformity prescribed in the *twenty-second section, and that this tax is violative of that provision.

I think it may well be questioned whether all the provisions of the twenty-second section are not to be confined to taxes on property. The argument to show that the principle of equality and uniformity was intended to apply to them alone is at least strong and persuasive. The cotemporaneous history of the constitution proves that this section grew out of the supposed antagonism between the eastern and western portions of the state in respect of the slave property so predominant in the former. Had the interests of all portions of the state been uniform and homogeneous, the principle of representation would have afforded adequate protection to the tax payer against injustice and oppression, and no such provision would have been introduced. As they were deemed otherwise, a guarantee was demanded, and the controversy was adjusted by the concession of the provisions of the twenty-second and twenty-third sections. See Gilkeson v. Frederick Justices, 13 Gratt. 577, opinion of Samuels, J.; Slaughter's Case, Id. 767, 775, opinion of same judge. Now the reason of these sections cannot extend to subjects as to which no discrepancy of interests exists. This discrepancy is in the matter of property alone, and there can be no sectional difference in respect of devises or descents to collaterals any more than there can be in respect of incomes, salaries, notarial seals, and the like.

A similar provision is to be found in the constitutions of several others of the states, and the same terms "equal and uniform" are employed in most of them. In the constitutions of Tennessee, Louisiana, Arkansas, Massachusetts, Illinois, Texas, Wisconsin, Michigan and California, the rule of equality and uniformity is enjoined 435 either in terms or by equivalent *expressions, and in giving them construction, it has been held in several of the states, that the terms "equal and uniform" apply only to a direct tax on property, and that the clause by which such equality and uniformity is prescribed does not limit the power of the legislature as to the objects of taxation, but is only intended to prevent an arbitrary taxation of property according to kind or quality without regard to value. Hence specific taxes have been sustained as a valid exercise of the legislative power. Portland Bank v. Apthorp, 12 Mass. R. 252; Sawyer v. City of Alton, 3 Scamm. R. 127; People v. Dorr, Same v. Hussey, cited in Sedgwick on Stat. & Constit. Law, 558, n; Aulanier v. The Governor, 1 Texas R. 653; Sedgwick 554, et seq.

In view then of the construction of these terms which has prevailed elsewhere, and bearing in mind the particular reason which led to the adoption of the twenty-second and twenty-third sections, the inference is strong that property only was in the mind of the framers of the constitution; and it is further strengthened by the fact that although incomes and salaries as well as property of assessable value may be brought under the rule, yet there is a large class of subjects, such for example as licenses, which do not admit of a tax strictly equal and uniform in the sense contended for; and thus the constitution is to be made to conflict with itself, and a large and important branch of the revenue is to be cut off, because it cannot be brought within the rule of exact equality and uniformity. It is true the language used is broad enough to cover every thing, and if it be conceded that the rule must apply to all subjects, yet as remarked by Judge Samuels in Slaughter's Case, 13 Gratt. 767, it can only be so applied so far as practicable. If a given subject be only susceptible of a modified application of the principle, it must receive this, and not be rejected because the 436 rule cannot be *applied with perfect precision to its whole extent and in all its results. See Aulanier v. The Governor, above cited, p. 660.

In this view I do not perceive wherein the inequality and want of uniformity complained of can be said to consist. To say that the decedent's estate is charged with the regular annual tax and then with the additional tax on the transmission to his collateral heirs or devisees, and thus charged with taxes greater than those imposed on other citizens, is but to repeat the argument that it is a property tax which I have already considered. The tax is equal and uniform, throughout the state as far as it is susceptible of the application of the rule. It is the same every where upon the succession to estates of equal value of whatever subjects they may consist. Every person, every where, who takes by this succession, pays a tax for the privilege, and this tax is proportioned to the value of the interest which he acquires. But in this, it is said, there is a want of uniformity; that unlike the tax on deeds, seals and the like, it is not fixed at a sum certain, the same to all, but varies according to the value of the estate taken. In other words that the legislature in seeking to carry out the principle of equality as far as practicable have destroyed that of uniformity. I think there is no force in the objection. To such subjects as deeds, seals, &c. it may be that the principle of equality cannot be applied. The legislature have thought so; certainly they have not attempted to apply it. But to the succession to property, as between those who constitute the class of such beneficiaries, the application is easy and simple, and the legislature have sought to make it by fixing the tax at a certain per centum upon the property acquired; and have in this mode as far as practicable carried out the rule of equality and uniformity. Nor does the exemption where 437 the estate is of less value than two hundred *and fifty dollars constitute a necessary departure from it. The legislature may define the class to which this tax shall be restricted as they in their discretion may think just and proper, taking care to render it uniform with all those who constitute the class; or as they are authorized to exempt any particular subject from taxation, it may be regarded as an exemption in favor of those entitled to inconsiderable estates of less value than the sum named: and we must take it that the adoption of the tax as it stood in the Code, after the new constitution, amounted to an exemption by the constitutional majority of all those falling under the minimum prescribed.

But it is said that the principle of taxation in cases like this is of dangerous tendency and inadmissible, because, if allowed, the legislature may under the form of taxing transfers and sales of slaves between the living, impose taxes to any amount whatever upon that species of property, and thus break down the guaranty which it was the intention by the compromises of the constitution to afford to the eastern people against injustice and oppression. It is the argument oft repeated of the possible abuse of power, and may be urged with equal truth of any power whatever possessed by the legislature, however indisputable or how indispensable soever its exercise may be for the public welfare. Any power wielded by mere human will may be abused. For myself, I do not question the power of the legislature, by requiring a license or otherwise, to impose a tax upon the sale of slaves, any more than I do that of imposing a tax upon the sale of cattle or any other property or a tax on stamps, if the exigencies of the public finances should be such as in their opinion to render a resort to such a source of revenue necessary, whatever might be my opinion as to the wisdom and policy of imposing burdens of this character. But the power to impose such a tax
438 *is one thing; the expediency and propriety of its exercise is another and a very different thing. The legislature has seen proper to lay a tax upon the alienation of real estate, for such in effect is the tax upon deeds, and I have never heard its constitutionality called in question. The possibility that the general assembly may be influenced by sinister, improper or unworthy motives in the passage of any law, is, I think, utterly inadmissible as a correct basis of judicial action. When we speak of their power we are to do so, as said by Ch. J. Parker, "presuming that it will never be exercised but for wise or necessary purposes." Portland Bank v. Apthorp, 12 Mass. R. 252. We do not sit here to review the manner in which the legislature has exercised its discretion, but to declare when it has plainly transcended its constitutional powers. The guarantee for just, wise and wholesome legislation is to be sought in the intelligence and integrity of the members composing the legislative body and in their immediate responsibility to their constituents.

It remains to consider the ground taken for the first time in the argument here, that in point of fact there was no law in existence at the time of the levy of this tax which authorized or required it to be made. There is no suggestion of this kind in the bill, and if it were true, the sheriff in thus acting without any authority would be a trespasser and liable to the action of the aggrieved party for damages. As however the case has been bona fide instituted and brought up to this court upon the constitutional question, it may not be improper to decide this question also and thus put an end to the litigation between these parties.

This tax was declared by the Code (ch. 35) and made a part of the permanent system of taxation. By chap. 40, the rates of assessment on the different subjects of taxation are fixed and prescribed. The Code took effect on the 1st of July 1850
439 and at the following session of *the legislature no tax bill was passed and that of the Code remained in full operation. At the session in 1852 a temporary bill was passed fixing the rates of taxation for one year and this tax was rated at two per centum of the estate transmitted. By this act ch. 40 and § 1 of ch. 39 of the Code were repealed. At the session of 1852-3 a general tax bill was passed which unlike that of the session of 1852 was not limited in its operation to any year or years. By this act the tax upon this subject was fixed at the same rate of two per centum of the value of the estate, and the 40th chapter of the Code was again repealed, as was also the 1st section of the 39th chapter. At the session of 1853-4, the same tax was repeated and the same chapter and section of the Code were again repealed. In the act passed at the session of 1855-6, no rate is fixed for this tax. Why it was omitted whether by inadvertence or design we are not informed. But although by the act entitled an act concerning the assessment and collection of the public revenue, passed April 7, 1853, and by the several acts above recited, various chapters and sections of the Code on the subject of taxation are expressly repealed, yet no where is there found any clause repealing the 10th and 42d sections of chapter 35, or either of the sections from the 6th to the 12th, inclusive of chapter 39, which are the sections imposing the tax in question. And the act of the 7th of April 1853 distinctly recognizes those sections as permanent provisions of the revenue laws of the commonwealth.

Now the testator died in June 1855 and the tax immediately thereon accrued to the commonwealth although the collection could not be enforced until the following year, and it was the duty of the sheriff to proceed to collect it in 1856 according to the rate prescribed by the act of March 2, 1854, notwithstanding the legislature had 440 omitted to fix any rate in the tax *law of March 18, 1856. The failure of the legislature to fix a rate in 1856 without any repeal of the previous laws prescribing the tax and fixing its rate could not operate as a release of the tax accrued in 1855. The provisions of the Code and of the act of March 2, 1854, are permanent provisions and must remain in force until they are expressly repealed or replaced by other provisions plainly intended to be substituted in their stead. The mere omission to fix a rate upon a particular subject will not operate as a repeal of previous laws prescribing the tax, but it will be left still in force at the rate prescribed by the previous laws, if there are no expressions showing clearly that the legislature intended the tax to be discontinued. And if the testator had died in 1856 instead of 1855, I incline to think that the tax would have accrued and should be collected according to the rate prescribed by the act of 1854; though upon this point it is perhaps unnecessary to express an opinion.

I think the Circuit court did not err in dissolving the injunction and am of opinion that the order be affirmed.

1. Husband and Wife—Legacy to Wife—Presumption of Executor's Assent—Case at Bar.—A slave having been lent to a husband and wife on their marriage, by the wife's father, he by his will gives the slave and her increase to his daughter for life, with remainder to her children. The husband having died a few months after the father, leaving his wife surviving him; in the absence of all proof, the court will not presume the assent of the father's executors to the legacy, so as to vest the life estate of the wife in the husband; but it will be held to survive to the wife.

2. Administrators—Statute of Limitations—Case at Bar.†—A widow qualifies as administratrix of her husband, and takes possession of and holds certain slaves, in which she claims a life estate, as having been given to her by her father's will. She is afterwards removed from her office of administratrix; but she continues to hold the slaves, claiming them as her own for life; and she holds them for more than five years after she ceased to be administratrix. HELD: The statute of limitations will protect her against any claim by the administrator de bonis non and next of kin of her husband. And the fact that one of the next of kin had been a married woman during the whole period, will not prevent the running of the statute against her.

This was a bill filed in the Circuit court of Floyd county, by John Helms and Sarah his wife who was Sarah Livesay, against Susannah Livesay and others, the object of which was to recover certain slaves held and claimed by Susannah Livesay; but which the plaintiffs insisted were a part of the estate of her deceased husband Peter

Livesay. The court below held that the slaves did belong to the estate of Peter Livesay, and directed them to be delivered to his administrator de bonis non; and ordered an account of their hires and profits whilst in the possession of Susannah 442 *Livesay. And from this decree she obtained an appeal to this court. The facts are stated in the opinion of Judge Samuels.

Baldwin, for the appellant.
Staples and B. Johnston, for the appellees.

SAMUELS, J. This cause is brought here by appeal from a decree of the Circuit court of Floyd county, in a suit wherein John Helms and wife (in right of the wife) were complainants, and Susannah Livesay and others were defendants, brought for an account and distribution of Peter Livesay's estate; he being dead intestate, and the parties being his next of kin and his administrator de bonis non. The principal subject of controversy was the issue of a slave named Julia. On behalf of the administrator de bonis non, and the next of kin other than Susannah Livesay the widow, it was insisted that the slave Julia had been given to Peter Livesay by John McGehee about the year 1800, on Livesay's marriage with the defendant Susannah, the daughter of McGehee. That on Livesay's death in 1828, his widow and son George W. Livesay were appointed administratrix and administrator of his estate, and as such took into their possession the slaves in controversy. That they had failed to make distribution or to account for hires; and that the appellant had appropriated to herself exclusively the services of the slaves.

The defendant Susannah Livesay denied the alleged gift by her father John McGehee. She averred that the slave was only loaned to her husband and herself by her father, on their promise to return her if required to do so. That her father (who died a few months before the death of Livesay), by his last will and testament, a copy of which is filed as an exhibit, bequeathed Julia and her increase to her 443 for life, with *remainder to her children. That immediately after the death of her husband she took the slaves into her own exclusive possession, claiming them as her own for life, under the will of her father. That her co-administrator George W. Livesay, who attended exclusively to the administration of the estate, acquiesced in her claim of title and possession. That her possession and claim of title continued from Livesay's death in 1828 until the month of August 1834, when the grant of administration to herself and George W. Livesay was duly revoked, and John Helms (one of the complainants) was on the same day appointed administrator de bonis non of Peter Livesay's estate. That her possession was not interrupted by the revocation of her powers; but continued as before until the bringing of this suit in 1848. She relies upon the statute of limitations as a bar to the relief sought.

On behalf of the complainants it is alleged in an amended bill, that the female complainant was a married woman at the time her rights accrued, and has so continued ever since; and that thus her rights were within the saving of the statute of limitations.

The case turns upon the questions whether Peter Livesay had any property in the slaves either absolute or for the life of his wife. If he had such property, then whether the claims of his administrator de bonis non and of his next of kin are barred by the statute of limitations.

The evidence is not very clear to show whether Livesay had the absolute right of property in the subject of controversy. It seems, however, that the weight of direct testimony is against such right. In regard to the estate for life of his wife, it must be said, that he could have no such right without the assent of McGehee's executors to the bequest to Mrs. Livesay; and it is not shown, by direct proof, that such assent was given; nor can it be pre-444 sumed from *the short interval of time between McGehee's death and the death of Livesay. The long continued and exclusive possession of Mrs. Livesay, apart from any effect under the statute of limitations, affords a strong presumption of right to the subject in her. Some of the parties now claiming against her were sui juris, and their acquiescence and that of his co-administrator, should be construed into an acknowledgment of her right.

It remains to consider whether the appellant is protected by the statute of limitations, if the slaves belonged to the estate of her intestate. After her removal from the office as administratrix, and after the appointment of John Helms to the office of administrator de bonis non, her relations to the estate itself and to the next of kin, were greatly changed. She was no longer a trustee having title to and holding the unadministered assets in trust for the next of kin: the title, by operation of law, was vested in the administrator de bonis non. See Wernick v. McMurdo, 5 Rand. 51. He might, by action of detinue, have recovered of her the slaves, and damages for detention. The next of kin could bring no available suit in equity against her without having the administrator de bonis non before the court. Samuel v. Marshall, 3 principle of analogy to them, but proceeds on doctrines peculiar to and inherent in itself." The principal case is cited as an instance of the first class.

The principal case was distinguished in Rowe v. Bentley, 29 Gratt. 762, the court saying that, in the principal case, no fraud, collusion, or other thing (as in the case at bar) was shown to deprive the plea of the act of limitations of any part of its efficacy; but that if such proof had been made, the decision must have been different.

Leigh 567; 2 Lomax Ex'ors 514. In him was vested the legal title which a court of equity, on showing a proper case, would cause to be conveyed to those having the right. The next of kin could bring no suit at law against a party holding assets of the estate; their right and remedy is through the personal representative. See authorities above cited. The possession of Mrs. Livesay from 1834 to 1848, was adverse to the administrator de bonis non, and was of sufficient length of time to bar his action against her. No fraud, collusion or other thing is shown to deprive her plea of the statute of limitations of any part 445 of its efficacy. *The coverture of the female complainant, if proved, would not avail to prevent the operation of the plea in this case, seeing that her rights are represented by the administrator de bonis non, and by her husband, who are sui juris and barred by the statute.

It is not necessary for any purpose in this case to consider whether the possession of Mrs. Livesay, during her continuance in office, adverse in fact, was also adverse in law so as to bar the next of kin.

On the whole case, I am of opinion, that Peter Livesay had no title at all to the slaves in controversy. And if this fact were otherwise, I am further of opinion, that any right derived from Livesay is barred by the statute of limitations; and thus there was no cause of action existing against Susannah Livesay at the time this suit was brought. I am of opinion to reverse the decree of the Circuit court, so far as it directs the surrender of the slaves, and an account of their hires, and to dismiss so much of the bill as prays for the slaves and their hires, but without prejudice to the right of any party to his or her rights in remainder to the slaves after the death of Mrs. Livesay, and to remand the cause for further proceedings as to other subjects passed on by the decrees.

DANIEL and LEE, Js., concurred in the opinion of Samuels, J.

MONCURE, J., concurred in the results, on the first ground stated in the opinion.

The decree is as follows:

The court is of opinion, for reasons stated in writing, and filed with the record, that said decrees are erroneous in so far as they adjudge the question of title to the slaves in controversy against the appellant, and direct a surrender of said slaves, and 446 an account of *their hires. It is therefore adjudged, ordered and decreed, that said decrees, so far as they are herein declared to be erroneous, be reversed and annulled; and that the appellee John Helms, administrator de bonis non of Peter Livesay deceased, out of the assets in his hands to be administered, and the other appellees, out of their own proper estates, do pay to the appellant her costs in this court expended. And the court, proceeding to render such decree as the Circuit court should have rendered, instead of so much of said decrees as is herein declared to be erroneous, it is further decreed and ordered, that so much of the original and amended bills as seeks to recover the slaves, Julia and her increase, and hires of the slaves, be dismissed; but without prejudice to the rights in remainder after the death of the life tenant. And the court being of opinion there is no other error in said decrees, it is further adjudged, ordered and decreed, that the residue thereof be affirmed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings to be had therein in conformity with this decree.

447 *Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co. v. Polly, Woods & Co.

July Term, 1858, Lewisburg.

1. Pleading and Practice — Special Pleas — General Issue.—In assumpsit, upon the common count for work and labor, &c., defendant offers a special plea setting out a special contract, and averring that the work, &c., sued for was done under it, and the acts to be done by defendant were done. The special plea, if it contains a defence to the action, only amounts to the general issue; and should be rejected.

Pleading and Practice—Special Pleas Amounting to General Issue.—It seems well settled that special pleas amounting to the general issue if objected to, should be rejected. B. & O. R. R. Co. v. Laffertys, 14 Gratt. 478; Travis v. Ins. Co., 28 W. Va. 583, 595; Van Winkle v. Blackford, 28 W. Va. 671, 681; M. & M. Bank v. Evans, 9 W. Va. 382.

In an editorial to 4 Va. Law Reg. 769, Campbell Co. v. Angus Co., 91 Va. 438, 444-5, 22 S. E. Rep. 167; B. & O. R. Co. v. Whittington, 30 Gratt. 805, 811, were cited in support of this proposition; and it was said that, while these cases held that the special pleas were properly rejected because "the same matters could be shown under the general issue," in reality, the pleas were objectionable because they "amounted to the general issue." This article draws a clear cut distinction between pleas "provable under the general issue" and "pleas amounting to the general issue," and lays down the true rule governing the latter case to be "whatever amounts to the general issue, must be shown in evidence under it and cannot be special pleaded." The principal case is cited as correctly stating the rule by which to decide whether a plea amounts to the general issue or not: the rule being, that "all matter of defence which give color to the action of the plaintiff, may be pleaded specially; and all matters of defense which do not give such color of action, amount to the general issue, and must be given in evidence under it."

Same—Special Pleas Provable under the General Issue.—The converse of the rule that what amounts to the general issue cannot be special pleaded—that is, that defences which do not amount to the general issue may be special pleaded—is not of universal application, or rather is subject to be controlled by the trial court. 4 Va. Law Reg. 772. For, it is well established that where the general issue is pleaded, it is not error to reject special pleas setting up matters of defence provable thereunder. The principal case was cited as authorizing this proposition in Fire Assoc. v. Hogwood, 82 Va. 344, 4 S. E. Rep. 617; Hale v. W. Va., etc., Co., 11 W. Va. 236; Moore v. Wetzel Co., 18 W. 2. Same—Assumpsit—Evidence—Case at Bar.—In indebitatus assumpsit for work and labor, on the trial the plaintiffs having offered evidence tending to prove that they had done certain work for the defendant, and the price and value thereof, thereupon in the same connection offered evidence to prove independently of any special contract, the quantity, quality and kind of said work. Thereupon the defendants moved to exclude it, and with a view to its exclusion moved the court to suspend the reception of the plaintiffs' evidence, and offered to prove that the work was done under a special contract, and that the same was not complied with in certain particulars. HELD:

1. Same—Same—Same—Special Contract.†—Defendant has no right to arrest the plaintiffs in the course of making out their case, by an offer to show that the work was done under a special contract, it not having appeared from the plaintiffs' evidence that there was any such contract.

2. Same—Same—Evidence by Plaintiff of Special Contract—Effect.—If it appears in the course of the plaintiffs' evidence, that the work was done under a special contract which remains in full force and ascertains the price; they have no right to prove the value of the work, and can only recover the contract price, upon proving the contract fully executed on their part.

3. Same—Same—Evidence by Plaintiff of Special Written Contract—Contents Must Be Proved.—If it appears from the plaintiffs' evidence, that the work was done under a written contract, they must, before they go any further, produce it, or duly account for its non-production, and prove its contents.

4. Same—Same—Evidence by Defendant of Special Contract—Effect.—If it appear, for the first time, on the cross-examination of the plaintiffs' witnesses, or from the defendants' evidence, that the work was done under a special contract, or that the contract was in writing, the plaintiffs will then be *required to proceed in the same way as if the fact had appeared in the course of their own evidence in chief.

3. Instructions—When to Be Given.—It is for the judge who tries a cause to determine whether he will give or refuse an instruction asked for, before the argument is commenced or after it is concluded.

4. Contracts—Construction of Railroads—Engineer's Estimates—Fraud.‡—In an action for work and labor by a contractor on a rail road, against the company, under a special contract which provides that the final estimate of the engineer shall be conclusive upon the parties, if the plaintiff proves that the final estimate made by the engineer was fraudulently made, he may recover without proving further that he was unable to procure such final estimate as is required by the contract after demand on the company, or other proper exertions on his part.

5. Same—Same—Same—Same.§—In an action for work and labor by a contractor on a rail road against the company, under a special contract, which provides that upon receiving the full amount of the final estimate, made out agreeably to the terms of said contract, he shall give a release under seal from all claims or demands whatsoever, growing out of said contract; the giving such release is a condition precedent to his recovery, if the final estimate has been properly made out; but not if the final estimate was fraudulently made.

6. Same—Same—Same—Same.‖—If the rail road company has paid to the contractor the whole amount of the final estimates, the contractor cannot maintain an action for the work done under the contract, unless he can prove that there was fraud or intentional misconduct on the part of the engineer making the final estimate.

7. Instructions—Equivocal.¶—Where an instruction to the jury is asked which is equivocal in its meaning; which upon one construction is correct, but upon another construction is incorrect, it should not be refused, if by so doing the jury may be misled; but should be given with an explanation giving it the meaning which will make it proper.

8. Same—If Correct, Should Be Given as Asked.*—Where a party asks for an instruction which is itself proper to be given, it is error to refuse to give it as asked; though it is given with an addition which it does not appear is based upon any evidence given on the trial.

ing to show the contrary; the defendant moved the court to have the jury taken to view the premises, they being about thirty miles off on the line of the road, and offered to send the jury on the train of the company, and to defray the expenses.

As the question before the court was, whether the verdict delivered by the jury to the clerk should be made their verdict by their assent in open court, it was proper to hear all that the jurors had to say upon the subject, and be well satisfied whether they understood and fully concurred in the verdict. And under the circumstances the court should have ordered a new trial, or have sent the jury to their room to consider further of the verdict.

This was an action of assumpsit in the Circuit court of Marshall county brought by Polly, Woods & Co. against the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company. The facts of the case and the points involved in it, are fully stated by Judge Moncure in his opinion. There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiffs; and thereupon the company applied to this court for a supersedeas; which was allowed.

MONCURE, J. By articles of agreement, in writing but not under seal, entered into between the appellees Polly, Woods & Co. and the appellant, the Baltimore 450 *and Ohio Rail Road Company, on the 1st day of February 1851, the appellees agreed, in consideration of the payments therein mentioned, to graduate and prepare for the laying down of the railway tracks thereon, the 172d section of said road, according to the manner and conditions set forth in the agreement. The work was to be completed on or before the 1st of October 1852; and for doing it certain prices were agreed to be paid for the different kinds of work, as classified in the agreement. Then follows a clause in the agreement in these words: "The above payments shall be made in the following manner; that is to say, during the progress of the work, and until it is completed, there shall be a monthly estimate made by the aforesaid engineer (meaning the local or resident engineer having charge of the particular work for the time being), of the quantity, character and value of the work done during the month, or since the last monthly estimate, four-fifths of which value shall be paid to the said parties of the first part, at such places as the chief engineer may appoint; and when the said work is completed and so accepted by the said chief engineer, there shall be a final estimate made by the (local or resident) engineer of the quantity, character and value of said work, agreeably to the terms of this agreement, when the balance appearing to be due to the said parties of the first part, shall be paid to them, upon their giving a release under seal to the said company, from all claims or demands whatsoever growing in any manner out of this agreement. And it is expressly understood, that the monthly and final estimates of said engineer, as to the quantity, character and value of the work done during the month, or since the last monthly estimate, and at the completion of the work, shall be conclusive between the parties to this contract; unless the chief engineer may deem it proper at any time to revise and al-
451 ter, in such manner *as he may see fit; the monthly or final estimates of said engineer, in which event the estimate of the chief engineer shall be substituted to all intents and purposes in place of the estimate of said engineer; it being, however, wholly optional with the said chief engineer to exercise such power of revision or not." Then follow other provisions, which, for the present at least, it is unnecessary to notice.

A similar agreement was entered into between the same parties on the same day in regard to the 182d section of the said road; except that the prices agreed to be paid for the different kinds of work were generally different in the two agreements, and the appellees used the style of Woods, Polly & Bro. in regard to the latter agreement, while they used that of Polly, Woods & Co. in regard to the former.

The work on the 172d section was finished on the 4th of December 1852, and that on the 182d section on the 5th of September 1852. The monthly and final estimates were made of the quantity, character and value of the work done on each section, as provided for in the said agreements.

‡‡Verdicts—Rendered in the Absence of Judge—Effect.—See generally, monographic note on "Juries" appended to Chahoon v. Com., 20 Gratt. 733.

In August 1853 the appellees instituted an action of assumpsit against the appellant. The declaration contained but two counts, which were the common counts for work and labor, &c., and on an account stated. The bill of particulars filed with the declaration was for the work done on the said two sections of the said road. After various proceedings were had in the action, a verdict was found for the appellees on the general issue, for fifteen thousand six hundred and thirty-two dollars and seventy-six cents, with interest on fifteen thousand one hundred and sixty-one dollars and fifty-four cents from the 4th day of December 1852 until paid; and judgment was rendered accordingly on the 18th of November 1854. The appellant obtained a supersedeas to the judgment.

452 *The first error assigned in the petition for the supersedeas, is founded on the first and second bills of exception, taken by the appellant to opinions of the court rejecting three special pleas which were offered on the 23d of June 1854, and again on the 10th of November 1854.

In each of these three special pleas, it is averred that the work, &c., mentioned in the first count of the declaration, so far as the same had been done, &c., by the appellees, was so done, &c., under and by virtue of the two written agreements of the 1st of February 1851.

In the first special plea it is further averred, that a final estimate was made of said work, &c., according to said agreements, amounting to a certain aggregate sum; the whole of which had been paid, except five thousand three hundred and fifty dollars and ninety-nine cents, which the appellant offered to pay into court on account of what is claimed by the appellees in the action, upon receiving their release under seal from all claims or demands growing out of said agreements; and that the appellant is not indebted to the appellees in a greater amount than the sum last mentioned.

In the second plea it is further averred, that the appellees did not complete the work on or before the day of : meaning no doubt the day fixed for its completion in the agreements.

In the third plea it is further averred, that at the completion of the work and the acceptance thereof by the chief engineer, as in said agreements provided, a final estimate under each of them was made by the chief engineer, of which the appellees had notice; yet that they would not give to the appellant a release under their seals from all claims or demands growing out of said agreements, though specially requested by the appellant so to do.

453 *Without expressing any opinion upon the question as to the time of offering these pleas, I think, if they present any defences at all, they amount to the general issue, and were therefore properly rejected. A plea amounts to the general issue when it traverses matter which the plaintiff avers, or must prove, to sustain his action; whether such traverse be direct or argumentative. Indebitatus assumpsit will lie to recover the value of work done under a special contract, if it be fully executed on the part of the plaintiff, and nothing remain to be done under it but the payment of a sum of money by the defendant. The existence of this state of facts raises an implied promise to pay the money. The plaintiff must prove the facts to sustain his action; and a plea traversing any of them or averring facts inconsistent therewith, must therefore amount to the general issue. If the plaintiff in such case should declare specially on the contract, expressly averring the performance of all conditions precedent; a plea denying such performance would of course amount to the general issue. The effect is the same under an indebitatus count, which is allowed in such cases to avoid prolixity in pleading, and which implies an averment of the performance of all conditions precedent, the performance of which is necessary to entitle the plaintiff to maintain his action. Matter which amounts to the general issue cannot be pleaded specially. "But there are instances (says Bayly, J., in Carr v. Hinchliff, 10 Eng. C. L. R. 408), in which the defendant has the option to giving his defence in evidence under the general issue, or of putting it on the record. One of them is when the plaintiff's right of action is confessed and avoided by matter ex post facto; e. g. by a plea of payment, or accord and satisfaction. The other is when the plea does not deny the declaration, but answers it by matter of law;" as for instance, gaming. See also Hayselden v. Staff, 454 31 Id. 307; Morgan, &c., v. *Pebrer, 32 Id. 202; Cousins v. Padden, 2 Cromp. Mees. & Ros. 547; Jones v. Manney, 1 Mees. & Welsb. 33; Grounsell v. Lamb, Id. 352; 1 Chit. Pl. 477-479, 526-528, 714, 738 and 742. The defence presented by each of the special pleas in this case is, that the action, though indebitatus assumpsit, is founded on a special contract subject to a condition precedent which has not been performed by the plaintiffs.

But it is contended that the pleas were good, because they set forth matter of law proper for the consideration of the court and not of the jury; and that in every such case the matter may be specially pleaded. I do not understand that any thing can be pleaded specially which amounts to the general issue, whether it be matter of law or not. Infancy, coverture, usury and gaming, are matters of law which may be pleaded specially or given in evidence under the general issue, at the option of the defendant. But they do not amount to the general issue; because they do not traverse any matter which the plaintiff must prove to sustain his action. They give color of action to the plaintiff, as every good special plea must, although they show that in law he never had a good cause of action. In this respect only they differ from matters in confession and avoidance; which admit that the plaintiff once had a good cause of action, but show that it has since been discharged. All matters of defence which give color of action to the plaintiff, may be pleaded specially; and all matters of defence which do not give such color of action, amount to the general issue, and must be given in evidence under it. 1 Chit. Pl. 526, 530.

That a plea amounts to the general issue, is a sufficient reason for rejecting it, especially when offered out of time and as an additional plea to that of the general issue already pleaded. Warner v. Wainsfort, Hob. R. 127; Gardner v. Webber, 17 Pick. R. 407.

455 *The second error assigned in the petition is presented in the third bill of exceptions. Upon the trial of the cause, the plaintiffs, in opening the case, having offered testimony tending to prove that they had done and performed for the defendant work and labor upon sections 171 and 182 of said rail road, and the price or value thereof; thereupon, in the same connection, offered further testimony to prove, independently of any special contract, the quantity, quality and kind, in proper classification of said work. To the introduction of which testimony the defendant objected, and with a view to its exclusion, moved the court to suspend the reception of the plaintiffs' opening testimony, and offered to prove the execution of said contract, that said work was done under it, and that the same was not complied with in certain particulars. But the court overruled the objection, and admitted said testimony as offered by the plaintiffs. To which opinion and action of the court the defendant excepted.

In an action of indebitatus assumpsit, the plaintiff may approve that work was done at defendant's request, and the value of it. If it appear, in the course of his evidence, that the work was done under a special contract, which remains in full force and which ascertains the price, he has no right to prove the value of the work, and can only recover the price of it, as ascertained by the contract, upon proving that the conditions of the contract have been complied with, and that nothing remains to be done in execution of it, but the payment of the price by the defendant. So, if it appear from the plaintiff's evidence, that the work was done under a written contract, he will be required, before he goes any further, to produce the contract, or duly account for its non-production, and prove its contents by secondary evidence. Or, if it appear, for the first time, in the cross-examination of the plaintiffs'

456 *evidence, or by the defendant's evidence, that the work was done under a special contract, or that the contract was in writing, the plaintiff will then be required to proceed in the same way as if the fact had appeared in the course of his own evidence in chief.

But a defendant has no right to arrest the plaintiff in the course of making out his case, by an offer to show that the work was done under a special contract, it not having appeared from any thing proved by the plaintiff, that there was any such contract. It devolves on the plaintiff to make out his case, and then on the defendant to make out his defence. Until the plaintiff has ended, the defendant has no right to begin.

Whether evidence is admissible or not, is certainly a question for the court and not the jury to decide. The court must, therefore, decide all questions of fact necessary to enable it to decide the question of admissibility. When a witness is offered by the plaintiff, the defendant may object to him as incompetent before he is examined, and, if need be, offer evidence of his incompetency. This is naturally, if not necessarily, a preliminary enquiry to be made before the witness is examined.

So, also, upon the same principle, if the defendant object to evidence as inadmissible for any other cause, the question of admissibility seems, naturally, to be a preliminary question, to be disposed of before the evidence is heard. It is desirable, as far as possible, that irrelevant and improper evidence shall not be heard by the jury, as it may not be possible entirely to remove the effect of it by its subsequent exclusion.

But it is impossible always to determine, a priori, whether evidence is admissible or not. It very often consists of many links, forming together one connected chain. These links must be offered separately; and until the case is closed, it cannot 457 generally be determined *whether the chain will be perfect or not. If it be not, then all the links which have been received may be thrown out.

It follows that a great deal must be left to the discretion of the court in this matter. It is desirable, as before stated, that the jury should not hear illegal evidence; but it is often convenient, if not necessary, that they should first hear it, and that it should be excluded afterwards. If the court does right in excluding it afterwards (on motion made for that purpose), the judgment will not be reversed because it might or ought not to have been heard at all. I therefore think the court did not err in overruling the objection of the defendant, and admitting the testimony offered by the plaintiffs, as mentioned in the third bill of exceptions.

The next assignment of error which will be noticed, is the fifth; which, though not next in order of numbers, appears to be next in chronological order, and to be governed by somewhat the same principle which governs the one last considered. It is founded on the sixth bill of exceptions which was taken to the opinion and action of the court in overruling the motion of the defendant to act upon the five instructions asked for by him, or to give such other as the court might deem proper, before the argument of the cause was entered upon, and in declining to act upon said instructions or to give any other until the argument was closed.

As it is desirable that no illegal evidence should be heard by the jury, even though it be excluded afterwards, so it is also desirable that the case should not be argued on such evidence before them, even though they be properly instructed in regard to it afterwards. The effect of it, to some extent, is to excite their prejudice and draw away their minds from the matter in issue. But human institutions cannot be perfectly *free from exception, and we must be content to make the nearest approach to it which the nature of things will permit. We must give the court and the jury credit for intelligence and fidelity in the discharge of their respective functions. It is the duty of the court to decide all questions of law which may be pertinent to the case and be referred to its decision by any party. But it may exercise its discretion as to the time of deciding them: And if it can better decide them after the argument of the case than before, it has a right to postpone the decision until after the argument. We must presume in this case that the court properly exercised its discretion in declining to act upon the instructions asked for by the defendant, or to give any other, until the argument was closed; and I am therefore of opinion it did not err in doing so.

458

The next question in order is, Did the court err in refusing to give the five instructions asked for by the defendant, and in giving the third and fourth of them in a modified form? This is the appellant's third assignment of error, and is founded on his fourth bill of exceptions. That bill states that the defendant having introduced evidence tending to prove that the work and labor declared for in the first count of the declaration, was done by the plaintiffs, under the two written contracts of the 1st of February 1851, before mentioned; that during the progress of said work, regular monthly estimates of the work done were made out and paid by the defendant to the plaintiffs; and that at the completion of said work a final estimate was made out, and the amount thereof communicated to the plaintiffs; and the plaintiffs having offered evidence tending to prove unfairness and fraud on the part of the engineer who made out said estimates; and that during the progress of said work on section No. 182, one of the plaintiffs, to wit, Charles Polly, assigned his interest in the contract referring to *the work on said section, to a third person. The defendant thereupon moved the court to give to the jury the five instructions aforesaid.

First; the court was asked to instruct the jury that if they believed from the testimony that the work, &c., set out in the first count of the declaration, and charged in the bill of particulars, was done by the plaintiffs under the said two written contracts, then, although they may believe that no sufficient final estimates have been made in pursuance of the terms of said contracts, yet the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover in their action, so far as said count for work, &c., is concerned, unless they further find that the plaintiffs, after demand of the defendant, or other proper exertions on their part, have been unable to procure such a final estimate as is required by said contracts.

Parties competent to enter into a contract are always bound by their contract, if it be not repugnant to any rule or policy of the law. Contracts for the construction of railroads usually contain similar provisions to those which are contained in the contracts in this case in regard to monthly and final estimates of the quantity, character and value of the work, to be made by the engineer having charge of the work. Such provisions are dictated by convenience if not by necessity, and tend to do justice to both parties. An engineer is an indispensable agent and officer in the construction of a rail road, and it is the duty as well as the interest of the proprietors of the road to employ honest and competent persons as engineers. An honest and competent engineer having charge of the work, is certainly the most suitable person to estimate its quantity, character and value. Indeed, he can do it with almost perfect accuracy. He is well acquainted, from his pursuits, with the character and value of such work. He superintends it in its entire progress. He sees and can properly, classify and accurately *measure all the variety of material encountered in the progress of the work. After the work is done and the excavated material or most of it covered up, it is impossible for any other person, even the most competent engineer, to estimate the quantity, character and value of the work with any thing like accuracy. These provisions should therefore be upheld and encouraged, if they be not unlawful. It was at one time supposed that they might be unlawful, as tending to oust the courts of law and equity of their jurisdiction, according to the principle of the cases of Kill v. Hollister, 1 Wils. R. 129; Thompson v. Charnock, 8 T. R. 139; and others of that class. That principle is that an agreement to refer to arbitration, until it is executed by the making of an award, is not a good bar to an action or suit upon the matter agreed to be referred. But it is now well settled, that provisions of the kind in question do not contravene that principle and are lawful and binding provisions. This subject has recently undergone very full consideration in England in the case of Scott v. Avery, decided first by the Court of exchequer, 8 Welsb. Hurl. & Gord. 487; then by the Court of exchequer chamber, Id. 496; and lastly by the House of lords, 36 Eng. L. & E. 1. It has also been recently considered by this court in the case of Condon v. The South Side Rail Road Company, ante, p. 302. The provisions for the final estimates in this case then created a valid condition precedent to the payment of the balance appearing to be due to the plaintiffs. And now let us recur to the question presented by the first instruction asked for by the plaintiffs.

A condition precedent, if it be possible

and lawful, however unreasonable it may be, must generally be strictly performed, to give the right of action which depends upon it. We have an instance of this kind in Dorsley v. Wood, 6 T. R. 710; an in-461 surance case, *in which it had been stipulated that "persons insured should give notice of the loss forthwith, deliver in an account, and procure a certificate of the minister, &c., of the parish, importing that they knew the character, &c., of the assured, and believed that he really sustained the loss, and without fraud." It was held that the procuring of such a certificate was a condition precedent to the right of the assured to recover, and that it was immaterial that the minister, &c., wrongfully refused to sign the certificate. "It is perfectly immaterial (said Ashurst, J.) whether they have entered into an improvident contract; if they choose to take the burden upon themselves, they cannot call on the insurance office until they have complied with the condition." "The cases (said Grose, J.) are strong to show that if a person engage for the act of a stranger, he must procure that act to be done." See also Morgan v. Birnie, 23 Eng. C. L. R. 414; and Grafton, &c., v. The Eastern Counties Railway Company, 8 Welsb. Hurl. & Gord. 699, 22 Eng. L. & E. 557; Glenn v. Leith, Id. 489.

But there are cases in which the performance of a condition precedent may be dispensed with; when the party seeking the enforcement of the contract has done every thing that could be done on his part to carry it into effect. In the United States v. Robeson, 9 Peters' R. 319, payment had been contracted to be made on "producing duplicate certificates of the commanding officer." The court said, "Where the parties in their contract fix on a certain mode by which the amount to be paid shall be ascertained, as in the present case, the party that seeks an enforcement of the agreement must show that he has done every thing on his part which could be done to carry it into effect. He cannot compel the payment of the amount claimed, unless he shall procure the kind of evidence required by the contract, or show that 462 by time or accident he *is unable to do so. And as this was not done by the defendant in the District court, no evidence to prove the service other than the certificates should have been admitted by the court. Had the defendant proved that application had been made to the commanding officer for the proper certificates, and that he refused to give them, it would have been proper to receive other evidence to establish the claim." In Wilson v. York and Maryland Line Rail Road Company, 11 Gill & John. 58, Stephen, J., said, "It cannot be left to the jury to make the estimate upon other evidence than that stipulated by the parties, without the plaintiff's showing that the proper evidence was not attainable after he had used proper and reasonable endeavors to obtain the same without effect." Wherever the defendant by his own act or neglect prevents the performance of the condition precedent, he thereby excuses it, and the plaintiff may recover as if he had performed the condition. 1 Chit. Pl. 326.

In this case the final estimate could only be made by the engineer of the defendant, and the duty of appointing one therefore devolved on it: and when appointed he was its agent and officer. If the plaintiffs had been unable to obtain a final estimate by reason of the failure of the defendant to appoint an engineer, or the refusal of the engineer to make an estimate, proof of that fact would have excused the performance of the condition precedent, and they would have been entitled to recover without a final estimate. Herrick v. Belknap's est. & Vermont Central R. R. Co., 27 Verm. R. 673; Redfield on Railways 214, note. So also, upon the same principle, if the plaintiffs had been unable to obtain a sufficient final estimate by reason of unfairness and fraud on the part of the engineer, they would have been entitled to recover. The first instruction as asked for by the defendant, seems to concede this, but exacts of the plaintiffs, in case of an insufficient 463 *final estimate having been made, the necessity of proving that they demanded of the defendant, or used other proper exertions to procure such a final estimate as is required by the contracts, but without effect. Two questions seem to be involved in the instruction. First, whether fraud on the part of the engineer in making the final estimate, renders it legally insufficient; and if it does, secondly, whether it is incumbent on the plaintiffs to demand of the defendant, or use other proper exertions to procure a sufficient final estimate. The importance of having an estimate made by a competent engineer in charge of the execution of the work, and the fact that the contract expressly requires it, render it improper to deprive the defendant of the benefit of such an estimate, unless it be very clear that it has been forfeited by the defendant's own act or default. It is not likely that an engineer would be guilty of fraud in making an estimate. But he possibly may be. And if he is, there can be no doubt the fraudulent estimate would be invalid in equity; but whether at law or not, may admit of question. If the final estimate be considered as an award, it cannot be avoided at law by proof of fraud or corruption on the part of the engineer in making it: the only mode of obtaining relief against an award on the ground of fraud or corruption on the part of the arbitrators, being by bill in equity; unless the reference was by order of court in a pending suit or under the statute; in which case the award may be set aside on that ground in a court of law. A final estimate certainly does bear some analogy to an award. But the analogy is not complete. The engineer is not an indifferent person, but the officer and agent of the defendant. He may be a stockholder in the company which employs him, and be thus interested in the work which he estimates, and yet is legally competent to discharge the duty con-464 fided to him. Ranger v. The *Great Western Railway Company, 27 Eng. L. & E. 35; Monongahela Navigation Company v. Fenlon, 4 Watts & Serg. 205. The principle discussed in the case of Dims v. The Grand Junction Canal Company, 16 Eng. L. & E. R. 63, that a person cannot be a judge in his own cause, does not apply to this case. 27 Id. 45. By the express contract of the parties, the final estimate of the defendant's engineer is made the condition precedent of the defendant's obligation to pay for the work; and there is nothing unlawful in the contract. But while the defendant is bound only to pay the amount of the final estimate of its own engineer, that estimate must be valid in equity as well as at law. If it be a fraudulent estimate, the defendant cannot take advantage of it. To do so would be, in a manner, taking advantage of the defendant's own wrong. A principal cannot take advantage of the fraud of his agent, even though he did not actually participate in the perpetration of the fraud. The difference between an ordinary award and such a final estimate as was stipulated for in this case is, that in the former case a cause of action is supposed already to exist, which is referred to the decision of arbitrators instead of a court, and the award of the arbitrators is like the judgment of a court; whereas, in the latter case, the final estimate is itself a part of the cause of action and a condition precedent, the performance, or a sufficient excuse for the non-performance, of which must be proved by the plaintiff to maintain the action. The performance of the condition in this case devolved on the defendant, not on the plaintiffs; although the obligation of the defendant to the plaintiffs was dependent thereon. If the defendant's engineer has made a fraudulent final estimate, it is not a good performance, and is therefore legally insufficient. We cannot know, and it is not for us to know, whether the estimate was in fact fraudulent or not. It was the province of the jury to decide

465 *that question upon the evidence before them; though they ought certainly to have been well satisfied of the fraud to have been justified in disregarding the final estimate. The bill of exceptions states that the plaintiffs offered evidence tending to prove unfairness and fraud on the part of the engineer who made out the estimate, and we must consider the case as if the fraud were fully proved. Considering the fraud as proved and the estimate as insufficient, the remaining question is, Was it incumbent on the plaintiffs to show that they had, without effect, demanded of the defendant or used other proper exertions to procure a sufficient final estimate, in order to complete their excuse for the non-performance of the condition precedent, and to enable them to maintain the action? In my opinion, it was not. The final estimate required by the contract could only be made by the engineer having charge of the work. If the final estimate made by him was fraudulent, he was wholly unfit to make another; and it would not be right to subject the plaintiffs to another made by him, which might be as little reliable as the first. It was the fault or the misfortune of the defendant to have a fraudulent engineer. The chief engineer had power under the contracts to revise and alter the estimates of the local or resident engineer, but it was wholly optional with him to exercise such power or not; and I do not think it was incumbent on the plaintiffs to invoke the exercise of that power in regard to a fraudulent estimate. In my opinion, therefore, the court did not err in refusing to give the first instruction asked for by the defendant.

In Milner v. Field, 5 Welsb. Hurl. & Gord. 829, 1 Eng. L. & E. 531, cited in 2 Rob. Pr. (new) 411, a building contract between A and B contained a proviso, that the payments thereby agreed to be made by B, should only be due provided the certificate of the surveyor of B, for the time 466 being, should first be obtained. *A having sued in indebitatus assumpsit for the balance alleged to be due, it was held, that under the general issue, the absence of the certificate was a good answer to the action, and that the plaintiff was not at liberty to show that it was withheld fraudulently and in collusion with the defendant. Pollock, C. B., in delivering the judgment of the Court of exchequer, said, Even if the certificate "is withheld by fraud, that is only the subject of a cross-action." This is the only case I have seen which goes to that extent, and is contrary to what I think is the more reasonable and convenient rule laid down or recognized in the cases already cited from 9 Peters 319, 11 Gill & John. 58, and 27 Verm. 673.

Second; the court was asked to instruct the jury that if they believed from the testimony that the said work, &c., was done, &c., under the said two written contracts, then the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover in this action for such work, &c., unless the jury further believed from the evidence that the plaintiffs had given or offered to give to the defendants, upon their receiving the full amount of final estimates, properly made out, under the terms of said contracts, a release under seal from all claims or demands whatsoever growing in any manner out of said contracts.

I think the meaning of this instruction is somewhat equivocal. It may mean that the giving or offering to give a release was a condition precedent, whether the final estimates which the defendant's evidence tended to prove were in fact made out, were properly made out under the terms of said contracts or not; or it may mean, that the giving or offering to give a release was a condition precedent, supposing, or if the jury should believe, that the said estimates were so properly made out; that is, were not fraudulent estimates. In the former sense, the instruction would have been improper, and was rightly refused. In 467 the latter, it *was a proper instruction, and ought to have been given. The making of the final estimates and giving releases for the amount due thereon, were both conditions precedent, but the latter is dependent on the former. If there were no estimates, there could have been no releases; and fraudulent estimates were as none at all in this respect. If the fact that the final estimates made out were fraudulent, excused the plaintiffs from using any exertions to procure any other, a fortiori it excused them from giving or offering to give releases. I think the refusal of the court to give the instruction was at least calculated to mislead the jury; and that it ought to have been given with such an explanation of its meaning as to cause its being understood by the jury in the latter of the two senses above mentioned. The Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co. v. McCullough, 12 Gratt. 595, shows that the giving of the releases in this case was a condition precedent to the plaintiff's right of action for the balances appearing to be due on the final estimates.

Thirdly; the court was asked to instruct the jury that if they believed from the testimony that the said work, &c., was done, &c., under the said two written contracts, and that in accordance with said contracts, final estimates as to the work, &c., done under each had been made out by the engineers therein designated to perform that duty; and further, that the full amount of said final estimates had been paid to the plaintiffs, the greater part before the institution of this suit, and the residue into court to the credit of this suit, with costs up to the time of such payment; then, unless they believed further from the testimony that there was fraud or intentional misconduct on the part of the engineers making up such estimates, they ought to find for the defendant on the first count of the declaration.

The court refused to give this in-
468 struction as asked *for; but gave it with the following addition: "But the jury may from the evidence correct any intrinsic errors apparent on the face of the said estimates, and as to any work and labor done and materials furnished by plaintiffs to and for defendant not specially provided for in the said contracts, the jury will find according to the facts as proved before them. Which said last named instructions were given to the jury by the court, superadding orally that if the jury undertook to correct any errors intrinsic and apparent on the face of the estimates, they must confine themselves to the estimates alone, and not take into consideration any extrinsic facts or any proof in the case, and that they were confined to the correction of errors apparent on the face of the final estimates, or that they must be satisfied that the final estimates were produced by the corruption of the resident engineer, before they could disregard the said final estimates."

I think the court erred in refusing to give the instruction as asked for, and also in making the addition it did thereto. When a party asks for a proper instruction, it is the duty of the court to give it substantially as asked for. The third instruction asked for by the defendant in this case was proper and unexceptionable: The addition made thereto by the court was calculated to mislead the jury. It does not appear that there were any intrinsic errors apparent on the face of the estimates; nor does the bill of exceptions show that there was any evidence before the jury as to any work, &c., not specially provided for in the said contracts. What is said on those subjects, is, therefore, an abstraction. If intrinsic errors had been apparent on the face of the estimates, the court ought to have pointed them out specifically to the jury. The addition made to the instruction, taken in connection with what was superadded orally by the court, was contradictory and 469 conflicting in itself; in *saying, first, that the jury may from the evidence, correct any intrinsic errors, &c.; and then, that if they undertook to correct any intrinsic errors, &c., they must confine themselves to the estimates, and not take into consideration any extrinsic facts, or any proof in the case.

Fourthly; the court was asked to instruct the jury that if they believed from the testimony that the said work, &c., was done, &c., under the said two contracts; that final estimates had been properly made out in pursuance of said contracts; and that the plaintiffs had submitted themselves to the action of the engineers designated in said contracts, both as to the monthly estimates and final estimates therein provided, in every particular, except that they objected to the final estimates when made known to them; then, in the absence of proof of any fraud or other misconduct on the part of said engineer, the jury can only find for the plaintiffs under the first count, upon the basis of taking said final estimates to be conclusive between the parties.

The court refused, also, to give the instruction as asked for, but gave it with this addition: "Unless there is error apparent on the face of the estimates, or the jury are satisfied that said estimates were fraudulently made up by the engineers, as explained in giving the third instruction, to which reference is had, and the same is herein incorporated."

Most of the observations made in regard to the third instruction and the addition thereto, equally apply to the fourth instruction and the addition thereto. The fourth instruction is unexceptionable in form and substance, and the court erred in not giving it, without the addition. See Kidwell v. The Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Co., 11 Gratt. 676.

The fifth instruction asked for by 470 the defendant was *intended to present the proposition that one of the plaintiffs having during the progress of the work assigned his interest in one of the contracts to a person not a party to the suit, therefore the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover in this action for any work done under that contract. As this point was not relied on in the argument, no other notice will be taken of it than to say that it is certainly not maintainable, and that the court did not err in refusing to give the instruction.

The fourth error assigned is founded on the fifth bill of exceptions, from which it appears that on the trial of the cause, the plaintiffs having offered evidence tending to show that certain excavation, constituting part of the work in controversy, was of solid rock, and the defendant having offered evidence tending to show the contrary; the defendant thereupon moved the court to have the jury taken to view the premises; having shown to the court that the points of examination were situated in the county of Marshall, on the line of the said rail road, about thirty miles from Wheeling; and having offered to send the jury to the said points whenever desired, upon the trains of the defendant, or by any other mode of conveyance, and to defray all expenses incident to the taking of said view. But the court overruled the motion; and the defendant excepted.

This motion was no doubt founded on the Code, p. 629, ch. 162, § 10; which provides that "the jury may in any case, at the request of either party, be taken to view the premises or place in question, or any property, matter or thing relating to the controversy between the parties, when it shall appear to the court that such view is necessary to a just decision; provided the party making the motion shall advance a sufficient sum to defray the expenses 471 of the jury, and *the officers who attend them in taking the view; which expenses shall be afterwards taxed like other legal costs."

This court cannot say that the Circuit court erred in overruling the motion, unless it appears from the record that a view was necessary to a just decision. It does not so appear. It only appears that evidence was offered, by one party tending to prove one thing, and by the other the contrary. It does not appear that there was any difficulty in deciding the question on the whole evidence, even if it appears that had any such difficulty existed, it might have been removed by a view. The court might have had good cause for believing the evidence on one side, and not believing that on the other.

The fifth assignment of error has already been considered. The sixth is, in the action of the court, as set forth in the defendant's seventh bill of exceptions; as to which it is contended, that upon the fact there disclosed, the court ought either to have set aside the verdict, or permitted the jury, if so disposed, to correct it. The facts, so far as deemed material, are substantially as follows: When the jury were retiring on Saturday morning the 18th of November 1854, the judge of the court having official occasion to be absent from the court-house during the day, at his suggestion it was agreed by the court and counsel on both sides, that in his absence the clerk of the court should receive the verdict and discharge the jury; such being a customary practice in the court. While the jury were in their room they sent for the clerk, who declined going, informing them through the sheriff, that in the absence of the court and counsel, he could have no communication with them. Late in the evening of that day, the court not being adjourned, the jury agreed upon their verdict and returned it. There was no exception to the form, or time or manner of returning 472 *it; and the clerk received and recorded it, and discharged the jury. The court did not sit on Monday the 20th of November. At its sitting on Tuesday morning the 21st, the defendant's counsel suggested to the court that a portion of the jury had made a mistake in the verdict which had been rendered at a late hour on Saturday evening, or had misunderstood its effect, and requested that the jury might be recalled together for the purpose of enquiring of them as to their understanding of the verdict. The court objected but the counsel for the plaintiffs consented that the jury might be reassembled. In the afternoon of the 21st of November, the jury came into court. The counsel for the plaintiffs consented that the jurors might be asked simply, "Is this your verdict?" but objected to their being asked any question as to their understanding of its legal effect. The court directed the jury to be polled and the question put, after the verdict being read to them: "Is this your verdict?" without the jurors being sworn. To which question they all replied that they had assented to the verdict. But three of the jurors went on to state that their understanding when they rendered it was that the sum mentioned in the verdict was subject to a reduction by the sum of five thousand three hundred and fifty dollars and ninety-nine cents paid into court by the defendant at the last term; and one of them went on further to say that since the jury had been discharged he had conversed on the subject of this understanding of the jury with one of the counsel for the defendant. The counsel alluded to then stated to the court that, after the discharge of the jury, he had conversed with two of them, and ascertained from one that he understood the verdict was to be reduced as aforesaid, and from the other that he did not. The court interposed, and spoke of the impropriety of polling the jury after it had been discharged, &c. The counsel for 473 the defendant *then, for the first time, objected to the verdict, that it was invalid, because it was received by the clerk instead of the court, notwithstanding the consent of the counsel of the parties previously given, that it should be so received. The said counsel said they would insist on the point, or at least would not waive it, and that the matter was in the hands of the court. The court decided that the reception of the verdict by the clerk and his discharge of the jury was regular and proper, and that it could not interfere with the verdict so rendered and entered up, except in some one of the regular methods appointed by law. To which action of the court the defendant excepted.

A verdict is not complete and valid until it is rendered in open court by the jury, and received and recorded by the clerk. Until then any juror may change his opinion and withdraw his assent to the verdict. The jury may be polled by the court, and ought to be if requested by either party, for the purpose of ascertaining, with certainty, whether all the jurors understand and agree in the verdict. When a jury in a civil case, or a case of misdemeanor, agree in their verdict during a recess of the court, and wish to separate before the court will sit again, it is the practice in England to permit them to do so, upon their giving a privy verdict to the judge at his chambers; and it is the practice in New York and some other states, to permit them to do so, upon their sealing up their verdict. But in either case, and although the parties expressly agree that the jury may deliver a privy or a sealed verdict, it is of no validity until it is delivered and assented to by the judge in open court; and the same right then exists to have them polled as in the case of a general verdict. Any of the jurors may then dissent from the verdict to which they had previously agreed, and the jury may find a different verdict. 10 Bacon's Abr. Verdict, B; Bunn v. Hoyt, 3 474 John. R. *255; Root v. Sherwood, 6 Id. 68. In that case, the court said, "There is no verdict of any force but a public verdict given openly in court. The previous agreement that the jury might seal up their verdict, did not take away from the parties the right to a public verdict duly delivered." Blackley v. Sheldon, 7 Id. 32; Fox v. Smith, 3 Cow. R. 23; Douglass v. Tousey, 2 Wend. R. 352; Lawrence v. Stearns, 11 Pick. R. 501. In that case, Shaw, C. J., delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The only verdict which can be received and regarded as a complete and valid verdict of a jury, upon which a judgment can be rendered, is an open and public verdict given in and assented to, in open court, as the unanimous act of the jury, and affirmed and entered of record, in the presence and under the sanction of the court. A convenient practice has been adopted in this country, authorizing the jury, when they agree during the adjournment of the court, to seal up their verdict and separate, and come in and affirm it at the next opening of the court. But in such case the verdict is to be affirmed in open court as the unanimous act of the jury, and in presence of the whole panel, so that each juror has an opportunity to express his dissent to the court in case his decision has been mistaken or misrepresented by the foreman or his fellows; or in case he has been forced into acquiescence by improper means. Such an affirmation is the only evidence the court can receive of the free and unanimous assent of the jury to the verdict."

The practice which prevails in the Circuit court, of authorizing the clerk, with the consent of the parties, to receive the verdict and discharge the jury, during a recess of the court, is not sanctioned by any authority, legislative or judicial. The ill effects of it is strongly illustrated in this case. The consent of parties, which certainly can cure many errors and irregularities, cannot, I think, legalize this 475 practice. Parties *may refer their disputes to the decision of arbitrators, and may prescribe their mode of proceeding; but when they resort to the tribunals constituted by law, they cannot, at pleasure, change the modes of proceeding which the law has prescribed for the government and direction of those tribunals. They cannot change the relative functions of the court and jury, nor authorize the court to delegate an important part of its functions to the clerk. Consent cannot give jurisdiction to a court having no jurisdiction of the subject matter, nor annex repugnant conditions to an estate. Upon the same principle, consent cannot authorize a clerk, in the recess of the court, to receive a verdict and discharge the jury. If the irregularity does not appear upon the record, of course no advantage can be taken of it in an appellate court. But if the objection be made at the proper time and place, and be put upon the record, it must prevail, notwithstanding the previous consent of the parties.

I am therefore of opinion that it was not competent for the parties, by their consent, to authorize the clerk to receive the verdict and discharge the jury during the recess of the court. But if it was, certainly it was competent for them, by their consent, to have the jury, after such discharge, reassembled in court and polled, for the purpose of ascertaining whether they assented to the verdict. This was done; and it was thereby ascertained that at least three of the jurors did not assent to the verdict in the literal terms in which it was written, but understood that the sum mentioned therein was subject to the heavy reduction of five thousand three hundred and fifty dollars and ninety-nine cents, which had been paid into court. The defendant was certainly entitled to credit for that large sum. But it is quite natural that, having been paid into court pending the suit, 476 it should have been *overlooked by the jury, or they should have supposed that it was not necessary for them to allow the credit, and that it would be allowed by the court as a matter of course. That the credit was not given by the jury, is extremely probable, from the further fact that interest was allowed by the jury from the 4th day of December 1852, the day when the work on the 172d section was finished according to the final estimate; which is inconsistent with the deduction of any subsequent credit. It is true that a court will not, generally, set aside a verdict on the statement or affidavit of a juror that he did not understand the verdict. But here there was no motion to set aside a verdict. There was in fact no verdict. The question was, whether that which the jury had agreed and had delivered to the clerk, should be made their verdict by their assent in open court. It was proper for the court, therefore, to hear all that the jurors had to say upon the subject, and to be well satisfied whether they understood and fully concurred in the verdict. Under these circumstances, I think the court ought to have ordered a new trial, or at least to have sent the jury back to their room to consider further of their verdict.

The seventh and last assignment of error is, that the court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial, upon the ground that the verdict was contrary to the evidence, and the law as applicable to the evidence.

There is not such a certificate of facts in this case as will enable this court to revise the judgment of the Circuit court, on the motion for a new trial. The certificate, in part at least, is of the testimony and not the facts; and as to much of the testimony, it is certified that it was conflicting. It is impossible, therefore, for this court to say whether the Circuit court erred or not in overruling the said motion.

477 *But for the other errors before mentioned, I am of opinion that the judgment must be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Moncure, J.

Judgment reversed.

478 *Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co. v. Laffertys.

July Term, 1858, Lewisburg.

1. Pleading and Practice—Special Plea—General Issue.—In assumpsit upon the count for work and labor, &c., defendant offers a special plea, setting out a special contract, and averring that the work sued for was done under it, and every thing to be done by defendant was done. The special plea, if it contains a defence to the action, only amounts to the general issue; and should be rejected.
2. Same—Assumpsit—Evidence—Special Contract.—On the trial of such an action the defendant has no right to arrest the plaintiff in the course of making out his case, by an offer to show that the work was done under a special contract, it not having appeared from the plaintiff's evidence that there was any such contract.
3. Contracts—Construction of Railroads—Engineer's Estimates—Fraud.—In an action for work and labor by a contractor on a rail road against the company, under a special contract which provides that the final estimate of the engineer shall be conclusive upon the parties, if plaintiff proves the final estimate was fraudulently made, he may recover without proving further that he was unable to procure a proper final estimate after demand upon the company or other proper exertions on his part.
4. Same—Same—Same—Same.—In such a case the special contract provides that upon receiving the full amount of the final estimate made out agreeably to the terms of said contractor, the contractor shall give a release under seal from all claims or demands whatsoever growing out of said contract. The giving such release is a condition precedent to the plaintiff's recovery, if the final estimate has been properly made out; but not if the final estimate was fraudulently made.
5. Same—Same—Same—Same.—In such a case, if the final estimate has been made out in accordance with the contract, and the full amount thereof has been paid to the contractor, then, in the absence of any proof of fraud or other misconduct on the part of the engineer, the action cannot be maintained.
6. Instructions—If Correct, Should Be Given as Asked.—Instructions which are correct in themselves, should be given as asked. And it is error to substitute for them another instruction which, though it may state the law correctly, is long and complicated, calculated to mislead the jury, and does not cover the points of the instructions asked for.

This was an action of assumpsit in the Circuit court of Ohio county, instituted 479 by John and William J. *Lafferty against the Baltimore & Ohio Rail Road Company. The case is very like the case of Polly, Woods & Co. against the same defendant, the report of which immediately precedes this. The facts are stated by Judge Moncure, in his opinion. There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiffs; and the rail road company applied to this court for a supersedeas; which was allowed.

C. Robinson, for the appellant.
Russell, for the appellees.

MONCURE, J. An agreement was entered into between the appellees and the appellant in this case, similar to those which were entered into between the appellees and the appellant in the case just decided, of The Baltimore & Ohio Rail Road Company v. Polly, Woods & Co., except that in this case the work to be done was on the 161st and 162d sections of said road. The agreement bears date on the 20th day of January 1851, the work was to be completed on or before the first of June 1852, and the prices agreed to be paid for the different kinds of work were generally different from the prices agreed to be paid for similar work in that case.

The work was finished on the 1st of December 1852. The monthly and final estimates were made of the quantity, character and value of the work, as provided for in the said agreement.

In June 1853 the appellees instituted an action of assumpsit against the appellant. The declaration contained but two counts, to wit, the indebitatus count, and the account stated. No bill of particulars appears

*As to each of the propositions contained in the syllabus above, see the preceding case, B. & O. R. R. Co. v. Polly, 14 Gratt. 447, and foot-note.

Digitized by Google

in the copy of the record which is before this court; though it is probable that one was filed with the declaration. After various proceedings were had in the action, a verdict was found for the appellees 480 on the *general issue, for fifteen thousand three hundred and seven dollars and sixty cents, with interest thereon from the 20th day of December 1852 until paid; and judgment was rendered accordingly on the 5th of July 1854. The appellant obtained a supersedeas to the judgment.

The first error assigned in the petition for the supersedeas, is the rejection by the court of three special pleas which were offered by the defendant. They are similar to the three special pleas which were offered and rejected in the case of The Baltimore & Ohio Rail Road Company v. Polly, Woods & Company; except that the first special plea in this case avers full payment of the amount ascertained by the final estimate. And for reasons assigned in that case, I am of opinion that the court did not err in rejecting the three special pleas in this.

The second assignment of error is founded on the defendant's second bill of exceptions. On the trial of the cause, the plaintiffs having offered evidence of work done by them for the defendant, proposed to examine a witness (Charles De Hass) as to the amount and value of the work; and thereupon the defendant objected to the admissibility of such evidence, and offered to prove that the whole of said work was done under a written contract, duly executed by the plaintiffs and defendant (and set out in hæc verba in the bill of exceptions); and that a final estimate of said work had been made according to the provisions of said contract; which objection the court overruled, and the defendant excepted.

The question presented by this assignment of error, is the same in effect with the question presented by the second assignment of error in the case above referred to: and for reasons given in that case, I am of opinion that the court did not err in overruling the objection above mentioned.

481 *The third and last assignment of error is, the refusal of the court to give the three instructions asked for by the defendant, and the giving of certain other instructions in lieu of the second and third. This assignment of error is founded on the defendant's third and plaintiffs' second bills of exception, which refer to each other, and are to be taken together. From which it appears that on the trial of the cause the plaintiffs having offered evidence tending to prove the cause of action as declared upon, and the defendant having proved the written contract aforesaid, and offered evidence tending to prove that the work in the declaration mentioned was done under that contract; and having further offered in evidence papers purporting to be monthly and final estimates of the local or resident engineer mentioned in said contract; and the plaintiffs having offered evidence tending to impeach said estimates, and show mistake and error on the face of them; and the defendant having offered evidence to sustain them; and the plaintiffs and defendant having proved facts tending to show a waiver in the times of the performance of said contract and alteration of some of the terms thereof; the defendant thereupon moved the court to instruct the jury as follows, viz:

1st; that if they believe from the testimony that the work, &c. set out in the first count of the declaration, and charged in the bill of particulars, was done by the plaintiffs under the said written contract; then although they may further believe from the testimony that no proper and sufficient final estimate of said work has been made by the engineer charged with that duty, according to the terms of the contract, the plaintiffs are yet not entitled to recover under said first count, unless they further show that, after a demand or other proper exertions on their part, they have been unable to procure such a final estimate as is required by the contract.

482 *2nd; that if they believe, &c. (as above); then that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover under said count, unless they have further shown, either that they had given or had offered to give to the defendant a release under seal, from all claims or demands whatsoever growing in any manner out of said contract.

3d; that if they believed, &c. (as above); and further, that in accordance with said contract, a final estimate of said work, &c. has been made out by said engineer; and that the full amount of said estimate has been paid by the defendant to the plaintiffs; then, in the absence of any proof of fraud or other misconduct on the part of said engineer, they ought to find for the defendant so far as said first count is concerned.

These instructions the court refused to give; but in lieu thereof, or of the second and third, gave the following:

"The contract between plaintiffs and defendant, provides for the performance of certain kind of work for the defendant, and the mode and times of ascertaining the quantity and nature of such work as the same shall have been executed, and fixes the compensation for each respective kind. The contract provides for embankment, earth excavation, loose rock excavation, and solid rock excavation; and the character of these different kinds of work, besides this general classification, are again more specially defined in the contract. From the general language used in their classification, and from the very nature of the subject, it is apparent that at no stage of the work, where there is any gradual change in the character of the material to be removed, there can be a precise admeasurement or ascertainment, by any agency or method which might have been adopted, of the quantity, and especially of the character of either or each class; but something must be left to the judgment of one or the other party, or to some proper substitute. Hence, *in the provision for 483 ascertaining quantities and classification, the term "estimate" is properly used, rather than the more precise and definite term of "admeasurement," as the amount of the respective classes of work could not be ascertained in advance, and it was desirable that the plaintiffs should be paid in whole or in part for their work as it progressed; and as it was necessary for the defendant that its work should be done in a given order of time and in a sufficient and proper manner, it became essential to the convenience and conducive to the ascertainment of the rights of the parties, that a "mutual agent" of the plaintiffs and defendant should be appointed for the purpose of making these estimates at stated intervals, and with diligence, fidelity and skill. By the contract, this mutual agent was the local or resident engineer.

"This mutual agent having been provided by the contract, you should receive and adopt his estimates as correct, and the onus or burden of proof to impeach them is thrown upon the plaintiffs. But it is competent for the plaintiffs to show that those estimates are produced by fraud and corruption, or they may show mistake or error, patent or open to inspection on the face of the estimates; but that it is not competent by extraneous proof, to show mere error of classification or ascertainment of quantity. You are to ascertain whether there was a waiver of the contract by the parties; and for this purpose you will weigh all the circumstances of the transaction, the relative position of all the parties, and any other circumstances of forbearance or oppression which you may find touching this matter in the testimony, to ascertain the fact and character of this waiver, and to what extent there has been any deviation or alteration therefrom by common consent, viz: in the time of performance and in the joint mode of executing the same by the plaintiffs and the defendant.

484 *"If you shall find that there was a waiver of time in the performance of the contract, and you are further satisfied that the plaintiffs have a right, under the instructions herein given, as to fraud, corruption or mistake, to recover, then the terms of compensation fixed in the contract, will govern your finding as to all the work to which its terms apply, and which was performed by the plaintiffs. If from the facts and circumstances of the case you find there was a waiver of the time of performance, and that thereby the defendant reserved to itself authority to place a force on the work to complete the execution thereof, in the manner in which the same was done by the defendant, then you will charge the plaintiffs with the cost of the work so done by the company, its agents and laborers. The court is of opinion that the monthly estimates are divisible contracts, whereby it was provided that those estimates should be made and fixed by the contract, and these estimates or divisible contracts are governed by the principles herein stated.

"That in the presence of fraud or patent error, the final estimate of the engineer, as in the case of monthly estimates, is not conclusive, but to be governed by the like principles of investigation herein given you in charge. But in ascertaining whether there was any fraud or corruption on the part of the resident engineer, you will weigh all the testimony before you, treating the estimates of the resident engineer as prima facie correct, and consider opinions, knowledge and facts of the scientific witnesses as delivered in testimony on either side, and give them such weight as in your judgment they may be justly entitled to. If you find no fraud or corruption in the resident engineer, nor any error and mistake on the face of the estimates, you should find for so much and to such extent in favor of the defendant. If, on the other hand, you find mistake and error on 485 the face of those estimates *you will correct such estimates to the extent of such error and mistake; and if you find fraud and corruption in the resident engineer, then you will apply the testimony to the case, and ascertain, as far as practicable, the actual amount of work done by the plaintiffs, its classification, and allow them therefor according to the terms of the contract. These instructions apply to the first count in the declaration."

The three instructions asked for by the defendant are very much like the first three instructions asked for by the defendant in the case of The Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co. v. Polly, Woods & Co. before referred to. The first instruction in this case is identical, in substance at least, with the first in that; and for reasons assigned in that, I think the Circuit court did not err in refusing to give it. It is stated in the bill of exceptions that the plaintiffs offered evidence tending to impeach the final estimate. They might have impeached it by proving fraud in th engineer in making it out; though certainly such proof ought to have been very clear to have had that effect. If so impeached, I think, as I said in that case, that it was not incumbent on the plaintiffs to show that they demanded, or used other exertions to procure any other final estimate.

The only difference between the second instruction asked for in this case and the second asked for in that, is, that while both treat the giving or offering to give a release as a condition precedent to the action, the words "upon their receiving the full amount of final estimates properly made out," &c. are inserted in the latter, but not in the former. These words are of some importance, and their insertion in the second instruction asked for in this case would have rendered it less objectionable in form than it is. But still I think the refusal of the court to give the instruction was calculated to mislead the jury, and make them believe that, under no circumstances giving or offering to give a release a condition precedent. The instruction should have been given with a slight modification, basing it upon the further belief of the jury, "that a final estimate was made according to the contract, and without fraud."
486 and with no qualification, *was the

The third instruction asked for in this case is the same, in substance, with the third asked for in that, and ought to have been given in the form in which it was asked for. The only question as to the propriety of doing so arises from the fact that it does not expressly appear from the bill of exceptions that any evidence was offered to prove payment of the amount of the final estimate, or any part thereof; and therefore it may be said that the instruction involves an abstract proposition. This ground was not relied on by the Circuit court, nor was it taken by the counsel of the appellees, in the argument before this court, doubtless because there was in fact evidence before the jury of the payment of the whole amount of the final estimate. It was not expressly stated in the bill of exceptions that evidence of the fact had been offered, probably because the fact was not denied. It was not one of the controverted questions in the case. But though it was not so stated, I yet think it sufficiently appears that there was evidence of payment before the jury to authorize the giving of the instruction. There was evidence before them that the monthly estimates required by the contract were regularly made; and the object of requiring them was, that four-fifths of the amount of each, as made, might be paid to the plaintiffs. The amount of the verdict is not one-third as large as the amount of the final estimate.

I also think the Circuit court erred in giving the instruction which it did in lieu of the second and third instructions asked for by the defendant. The instruction given was very long and complicated, and calculated to mislead the jury. The 487 second and third instructions *asked for presented, or were obviously intended to present, two simple propositions, upon which the defendant had a right to have the opinion of the court briefly and plainly expressed to the jury. The second required only a slight modification; the third none at all, and could not well be improved, in form or substance. In the long instruction given in lieu of them, not a word is said about the release, which is the gist of the second, nor the payment, which is the gist of the third. The court might properly have embodied the substance of the two in one instruction, in the form or to the effect following, to wit:

"If the jury believe from the evidence that the contract offered in evidence was entered into between the parties, that the work, &c. set out in the first count of the declaration, was done, &c. under and by virtue of that contract, and that a final estimate was made according to the said contract, and without fraud; then the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover under the said first count:

1st; without proving that before this action was instituted they gave or offered to give to the defendant, upon receiving the balance appearing to be due on the said final estimate, a release under seal from all claims or demands whatsoever growing in any manner out of the said contract. Nor

2d; if the jury believe from the evidence that before the action was instituted the amount of said final estimate was paid by the defendant to the plaintiffs."

The plaintiffs also excepted to the instruction given by the court; but I do not think it was prejudicial to them. I do not mean to deny the correctness of any of the legal propositions stated therein. Most if not all of them may be correct; though I express no opinion as to that. I consider the instruction objectionable, as a substitute for the second and third asked for 488 *by the defendant, as being abstract in some respects, and as being calculated to mislead the jury.

There is another bill of exceptions in the case, which perhaps ought to be briefly noticed. The defendant having offered in evidence certain papers, purporting to be such monthly and final estimates as are provided for in said contract, the plaintiffs objected to their admission, and the defendant offered certain evidence of witnesses to show their admissibility; whereupon the court excluded one of them, to wit, the paper purporting to be the monthly estimate of March 1852, but admitted all the rest, and both parties excepted: the defendant, to the exclusion of one of the papers, and the plaintiffs, to the admission of the rest. I think the Circuit court did not err in either respect.

But for other errors before mentioned, I think the judgment ought to be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Moncure, J.

Judgment reversed.

July Term, 1858, Lewisburg.

1. Delinquent Land — Statute — Possession within Meaning of.—Upon the question whether land has been forfeited under the act of 1835 for the failure of the owner to have it placed upon the books of the commissioner of the revenue and pay the taxes due thereon, or whether it was within the exception to the second section of that act, it appears that a person under whom the defendant claims was in possession of the land at the time of the passage of the act. The defendant may rely upon his possession to defeat the forfeiture, if his possession was such as the statute describes.

from the patentee, the patentee himself living in an adjoining county for years, and neither he nor any person claiming under him setting up any claim to the land against the equitable title, a conveyance of the legal title may be presumed in favor of the party in possession, to prevent a forfeiture of the land, if the legal title is necessary.

3. Delinquent Land—Statute—Possession under Equitable Title—Effect.—A party in possession of land claiming it under a good equitable title, is within the exception to § 2 of the act of February 27, 1835, p. 12, concerning delinquent lands.*

This was an action of ejectment in the Circuit court of Carroll county, brought by Fielden L. Hale against Edmund Marshall. The case is stated by Judge Lee, in his opinion.

Cook, for the appellant.
Floyd, for the appellee.

LEE, J. This was an action of ejectment brought by the plaintiff in error against the defendant, in the Circuit court of Carroll county. The plaintiff claimed under a grant from the commonwealth 490 to himself for *eleven hundred and ninety-four and a half acres of land in Carroll county, bearing date on the 31st of October 1846. The defendant claimed under a grant to one William Garrott for four hundred acres of land in Montgomery county, bearing date on the 12th of October 1790, and several intermediate successive contracts for the sale of the same between different persons claiming under that grant, and through whom he sought to connect himself with the patentee. The land embraced by this grant lies wholly within the boundary of the grant to the plaintiff, and he insisted that it had been forfeited to the commonwealth prior to the emanation of his grant by reason of the failure of the owner to comply with the provisions of the act of the 27th of February 1835 requiring the owners of lands omitted from the books of the commissioners of the revenue to cause the same to be entered in the proper counties and charged with taxes, and to pay all such as would not have been relinquished under the provisions of the act of the 10th of March 1832 had they been returned delinquent prior to the passage of that act. The defendant pleaded the general issue, and upon the trial, the jury found a special verdict setting out all the facts proved; and upon that verdict the court gave judgment for the defendant. To this judgment a supersedeas has been awarded by a judge of this court.

The county of Carroll was formed of part of the county of Grayson by an act passed on the 17th of January 1842. The county of Grayson was formed of part of the county of Wythe by an act passed on the 7th of November 1792; and the county of Wythe was formed of part of the county of Montgomery by an act passed on the 1st of December 1789. So that the land granted to Garrott though described as lying in the county of Montgomery, in fact was situate at the date of the grant in the 491 county of Grayson which *had been created after his entry and survey were made, but before the same were carried into grant. It does not appear whether it was ever upon the books of either the county of Montgomery or the county of Wythe, but it is found that it was never on the books of Grayson county up to the time of the formation of Carroll county, nor on those of the latter prior to the year 1847. Thus it was ascertained to be omitted land in regard to which the directions of the act of 1835 had not been complied with. But the defendant contended that his case came within the exception contained in the second section of that act, which exempted from the forfeiture which it declared, all lands which at the date of the act were in the actual possession of the owners or proprietors thereof.

I think the special verdict sufficiently ascertains that at the time of the passage of the act of 1835, the land in question was in the actual possession of a party under whom the defendant claimed title. The land had been claimed by one William Moore under the Garrott title, and he is found to have been in the actual possession of it during his lifetime. He died in 1820, and upon the division of his estate it was allotted to his son Samuel D. Moore. In December 1820 Samuel D. Moore contracted by bond to convey the same to one Harden H. Moore, and the latter used the land as a cattle farm and had tenants whom he permitted to reside upon it in consideration of their taking care of his stock. And this possession he kept up from the time of his purchase till the year 1843 when he assigned the title bond under which he held it to one John Boyd. Nor can there be any question that the defendant may avail himself of the possession of any party under whom he claims title and with whom he can connect himself, for the purpose of repelling the forfeiture sought to be set up against him, just as he might for the purpose of 492 making out a bar under the *statute of limitations. The possession of those under whom he claimed was for these purposes, his possession acquired by him as an incident to his purchase from his vendor as each vendee who preceded him, in succession acquired it of the party from whom he purchased. So that if the possession of Harden Moore sufficed to protect the land from forfeiture under the act of 1835, that protection enures to the benefit of all who took the land after him under his title.

Actual possession of this land under the Garrott title being thus held in 1835, there could be no forfeiture under the second section of the act of the 27th of February of that year, if Harden Moore who thus had the possession was the owner or proprietor of the land within the meaning of that section. The words of the act are "and upon their failure to do so" (the failure of the owners or proprietors of omitted lands to have the same entered upon the commissioner's books and charged with taxes, and to pay such taxes as were found due), "all such lands or parcels thereof not now in the actual possession of such owner or proprietor by himself or his tenant in possession shall become forfeited to the commonwealth, &c." Was he such owner or proprietor, or tenant in possession of the true owner?

Moore claimed through several intermediate sales under that made by Bott as attorney in fact for Garrott the patentee, to Oldham, but no conveyance from Bott is shown, nor does it appear that any was ever executed. But he received the full consideration for the land in a slave taken at three hundred dollars, and delivered the possession to Oldham. Oldham sold the land to John Bott, and delivered the possession to him; and it was subsequently purchased by William Moore who acquired the actual possession, and continued to hold it until his death, which occurred in 1820, some six or seven years after his purchase. The 493 contract *of sale by Bott was, it is true, by parol, but that was no departure from his letter of attorney. The execution of the broader power conferred to sell, convey and make lawful right in fee simple, presupposed and necessarily imported a power to make a parol contract of sale, to be afterwards fully executed by the conveyance of the title. And neither Garrott nor any person claiming under him, has ever set up any pretension of right to the land adverse to any of the parties claiming under the sale from Bott to Oldham. The contract was fully executed on the part of the latter, and Harden Moore and those through whom he claimed under that contract, at the passage of the act of 1835 which speaks as of its date of the lands exempt from forfeiture, had had actual possession by themselves and their tenants without let or molestation from any quarter, for certainly twenty-one or twenty-two years, and probably for several years more; for William Moore's possession commenced in 1813 or 1814 and it appears that Robinson (from whom no doubt it took its name of the "Robinson Place") Harris and Bunch, John Bott and Oldham his predecessors in the ownership of the land under the sale by Garrott's attorney, all had actual possession of the land, and had paid the purchase money contracted to be paid by them, respectively. Any action whatever that could have been brought against Harden Moore for the recovery of the land by Garrott himself would have been effectually defeated by the statute of limitations, and even if Garrott were dead and a writ of right had been brought in the names of his heirs relying upon the seizin of their ancestor, there is the strongest probability that it would have been barred also. For the power of attorney authorizing Bott to sell the land bears date in 1802, and although the date of his sale to Oldham does not appear yet as there had been four successive sales of the property before the 494 sale to William Moore in *1813 or 1814, and as all these purchasers paid their purchase money and in turn had held actual possession of the land for some time, longer or shorter, it might be reasonably inferred that the entire possession previous to the passage of the act, had continued for a period not less than twenty-five years, and this would have barred any action in any name or upon any seizin whatever. Connecting this with the fact that Garrott lived in an adjoining county, and the absence of any pretence of claim whatever on his behalf or of any one claiming under him, I think the circumstances are such as may fairly raise the presumption of a grant or conveyance of the legal title to Harden Moore. That a grant may under circumstances be presumed for the purpose of quieting the possession is a well settled and familiar doctrine, and it applies as well to corporeal as to incorporeal hereditaments. Mayor of Kingston upon Hull v. Horner, Cowp. R. 111; Foley v. Wilson, 11 East. R. 56; Sumner v. Child, 2 Conn. R. 607; Eldridge v. Knott, Cowp. R. 214; Archer v. Saddler, 2 Hen. & Munf. 370; Ricard v. Williams, &c., 7 Wheat. R. 59. And if it may be presumed for this purpose, certainly the reason is not less strong where the purpose is to protect the party against a forfeiture of his estate which the courts are never inclined to favor, by giving him the full benefit of his possession so as to invest him with the legal title, if that be necessary, to bring him within the exemption which it was the intention of the act to secure in favor of such actual possession. In this view conceding the position taken by the plaintiffs' counsel to be correct that the possession must be accompanied with the legal title, there is an end of the question.

It may be objected, however, that the presumption of a grant is one of fact to be made by the jury, and which cannot be made by the court upon the facts found, however well they might have justi-495 fied the *jury in presuming a grant and finding accordingly. And such an objection would seem to be countenanced by the case of Archer, adm'r, &c. v. Saddler, above cited, 2 Hen. & Munf. 370. But if this be conceded, it would only lead to a venire de novo in order that the jury might make the presumption; and taking the special verdict as it is, I think we can now pass definitely upon the case, and that the result will be in effect the same as if a grant had been actually found.

If Harden Moore cannot in the absence of such a finding be taken to have been invested with the legal title under the patent to Garrott at the passage of the act of 1835, he had, as we have seen, a clear equitable title under a contract of sale fully complied with on the part of the vendee, and so far performed on the part of the vendor that a court of equity would have enforced full and specific performance by its decree. And it might be said with great propriety that Harden Moore was the tenant in possession of the holder of the legal title within the meaning and spirit of the act, and that thus the case is brought within the exception which the act provides. But without dwelling upon this view, I pass on to remark that there is no just reason for imputing to the legislature any intention to discriminate between the owners or proprietors of lands under legal titles and such owners or proprietors with equitable titles only. There is nothing in the terms of the act to restrict the exemption which it provides to the former to the exclusion of the latter. It applies to every owner or proprietor in actual possession by himself or his tenant, and no reference is made to the nature of his title whether legal or equitable, in the section which declares the forfeiture subject to the exemption which it embodies. Nor is there any thing in the policy of the law as disclosed by the preamble to create any discrimination between these two classes of owners. That policy was 496 to a certain *extent no doubt, to secure to the commonwealth her just dues, but in a greater degree it was to remove the obstacles to the settlement and improvement of the country growing out of the ownership of "large tracts of land" by absentee proprietors who paid no taxes upon them, and took no measures to settle and improve them or to bring them into market. This, as I think, the controlling policy of the law, could of course have no application to lands settled and held in actual possession by the owners whether their titles were legal or equitable, provided they were claimed and deduced under grants from the commonwealth. A marked feature of this act as well as of the act of April 1, 1831, upon the subject of delinquent and forfeited lands, is the benefits which they secure to the actual occupant claiming under a grant from the commonwealth. By the act of 1831 the title to land forfeited to the commonwealth for non-payment of the taxes charged thereon, and by the third section of the act of 1835 the title to land forfeited for failure to enter on the land books and have the same charged with taxes, is transferred to and vested in the actual occupant claiming under a grant and who had paid the taxes due upon his land under his title, and this, in express terms whether his title were legal or equitable. The same respect is shown to a possession under claim of title legal or equitable, in the subsequent acts upon this subject until in 1842 the legislature went further and extended the benefits of such forfeitures to the claimants of title, legal or equitable, under grants from the commonwealth who had paid the taxes on their lands from the time they acquired such their title, without requiring the condition of actual possession. And I think there is no room to doubt that when the legislature spoke of the owners or proprietors of lands in possession, in the second section of the act of 1835, they had no regard to the 497 nature or *character of the title, whether legal or equitable, by which they held them. The equitable owner in possession was substantially and for all beneficial purposes, the owner or proprietor; and while under the act of 1831 and the third section of this act, a doubt might arise whether the transfer of the forfeited legal title was intended to be made only to a party in possession having the legal title under which he claimed, or might be made to a party having only an equitable estate, to remove which it is expressly declared that it should be to either, under the second section no such doubt could exist. It described a class of lands to be exempted from the forfeiture which it denounced, and it has used terms sufficiently broad to embrace equitable estates as well as legal. That a court of law is thus called on to notice equitable rights constitutes no objection. It does so for several purposes. It must do so in passing upon questions of transfer of forfeited titles under the third section and similar provisions of other acts in the series of land laws, and it never refuses to accept an equitable title as a sufficient basis for an adversary possession on which to make out a defence under the statute of limitations. For this purpose evidence of such a title has been held clearly admissible. Shanks v. Lancaster, 5 Gratt. 110; Koiner v. Rankin's heirs, 11 Gratt. 42.

It is in vain to say that the effect of this construction will be to create a class of lands sui generis, upon which the law of forfeiture is not to operate, and that thus the commonwealth will be defrauded of her just demands for taxes upon them. If such be the effect, still we are to enquire what the law is and not what it might have been or should have been. The legislature might have gone on to provide a means by which to enforce payment of taxes upon this class of lands from the owners in possession, though they have not done so in this act. The omission however can-498 not *vary the construction, and indeed it extends as well to lands of which the owners are in the actual possession with legal titles as to those held by equitable titles only; yet the former are unmistakably within the terms of the exception. And from the whole history of the legislation upon the subject of delinquent and forfeited lands it would appear that the legislature were looking less to the comparatively inconsiderable amount of revenue derived from taxation upon wild and unimproved lands assessed at that day at a very low not to say nominal rate, than to the evils growing out of absentee ownership in the serious check which it was found to oppose to the settlement and improvement of the country. Before the passage of this act there was no law in force declaring a forfeiture of omitted lands, the act of February 9th, 1814 having repealed all previous laws forfeiting omitted lands and released all previous forfeitures under them, and the policy of forfeiting such lands was not re-established until the act of 1835. That act describes particularly the class of lands intended to be forfeited, carefully excluding such as at the date of the act were in the actual possession of the owners, and none could be forfeited unless they came fully within the terms of the description.

The position taken by the counsel that the exception in the act was to be confined to such persons as had paid the taxes chargeable upon their lands, is, I think, utterly untenable. The second section did not relate at all to lands on which the taxes had been paid but to omitted lands only, on which the taxes could not have been paid: and there is no warrant whatever for interpolating the words "who shall have discharged all taxes charged or chargeable upon such lands from the time he acquired his title thereto" found in the third section after the words "owner or proprietor" in the second section.

499 Such a provision *in the second section would have been incongruous because its purpose was not to transfer the title to any other person but to forfeit it to the commonwealth where the owner was in default in not entering his lands and paying the taxes,and did not hold the same in actual possession. The purpose of the third section was to transfer such forfeited title to the person in actual possession and the legislature saw proper to require payment of his taxes as a condition of the transfer which it had not required for exemption from forfeiture under the second section.

Nor is there any thing in the idea that the act of March 23, 1836, operates an implied repeal of the second section. That act neither imposes a forfeiture nor extends the class of those liable to forfeiture under the act of 1835. Its design was to restrict not to enlarge. It gives further time to those imperiled by the last named act to comply with its provisions and thus avoid the penalty which it imposes, and it restricts its operation to lands omitted prior to 1832. Nor is there any thing either in the preamble or the enacting clauses which upon any fair construction can be held to do away with the exception in the second section of the act of 1835 in favor of the owners of lands which were at the date of that act in their actual possession.

That there is no exception in the act of March 5, 1846 (under which the plaintiff claims the land in controversy), in favor of actual occupants unless they claim title under grants and have paid all the taxes charged or chargeable upon the lands, will not help the plaintiff's case. The third section on which his claim rests applies only to forfeited lands, and before he can take any benefit from it, it devolves upon him to make out the forfeiture.

In any view of the case, and whether Harden Moore is to be considered as 500 having been invested with the *legal title or an equitable estate only in this land, I think no forfeiture accrued of the Garrott survey under the act of 1835, and that the Circuit court did not err in holding that the law upon the special verdict was for the defendant.

I am of opinion therefore to affirm the judgment.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Lee, J.

the seven heirs at law of Isaac Moore. The land had been sold to the defendant in 1833, and John Zumbro the husband of the plaintiff and herself, then living in the state of Tennessee, united in a deed bearing date the 14th day of October 1833, by which they conveyed their interest in the land to Henry Grove. This deed was acknowledged before the Rutherford Circuit court, and the certificate of acknowledgment is as follows:

"The state of Tennessee, Rutherford Circuit court, October term 1833: The within deed of conveyance was presented in one court, and acknowledged by the said John Zumbro, to be his act and deed for the purposes therein contained. The court thereupon proceeded to take the private examination of the said Mary Zumbro, wife of the said John Zumbro, separate and apart from her said husband, who ac-502 knowledged *that she executed said conveyance freely and voluntarily, and without any fear, persuasion or coercion of said husband. All which was, on motion, ordered to be certified."

This certificate was signed by the clerk of the court; and upon it the deed was admitted to record in the clerk's office of the County court of Augusta on the 28th of December 1833. The only question in the cause was whether the acknowledgment and privy examination was properly taken. The court below held that they were not properly taken, and decided in favor of the plaintiff: whereupon Grove applied to this court for an appeal; which was allowed.

Fultz, for the appellant.
Baldwin, for the appellee.

MONCURE, J. This is a suit in equity brought by the appellee Mary Zumbro, against the appellant Henry Grove, in the Circuit court of Augusta county, to have partition, and an allotment of her portion, being one-seventh, of the land in said county of which her father Isaac Moore died intestate, seized and possessed; and also to recover rents and profits. The appellant Grove claims the land by purchase from the heirs of said Moore; and especially claims the portion of said Mary Zumbro under a deed purporting to have been executed by the late husband John Zumbro and herself, bearing date the 14th day of October 1833, acknowledged by both before the Circuit court of Rutherford county in the state of Tennessee, where they then resided, certified to have been so acknowledged by the clerk and under the seal of said court on the same day, and, with the said certificate annexed, admitted to record in the clerk's office of the County court of Augusta on the 28th of December 1833. The cause came on to be heard on the 11th day of 503 June 1856; when the *court, being of opinion that the appellee's acknowledgment of the deed of her husband and herself before the court in Tennessee is incompetent and insufficient to divest her of her interest, right and title to the said land, and that therefore she is entitled to an undivided interest of one-seventh thereof, and to the rents and profits on said interest since the 18th day of May 1850, the date of the death of her said husband, decreed partition of the land and an account of rents and profits accordingly. From that decree this appeal has been obtained.

The objection taken to the jurisdiction of the court, was not relied on, but was waived in the argument; and properly so. The case involves two questions only. First, whether the Circuit court of Rutherford county in the state of Tennessee had authority to take the acknowledgment of the appellee; and if so, secondly, whether such acknowledgment was duly taken. And,

First, Had the said court authority to take the acknowledgment?

If it had, such authority must have been derived from 1 Rev. Code of 1819, ch. 99, § 15, p. 365, which was in force when the acknowledgment was taken. That section provides, that "when a husband and his wife have sealed and delivered a writing, purporting to be a conveyance of any estate or interest, if she appear in court, and being examined privily and apart from her husband, by one of the judges thereof, shall declare to him that she did freely and willingly seal and deliver the said writing, to be then shown and explained to her, and wishes not to retract it, and shall before the said court acknowledge the said writing, so again shown to her, to be her act, such privy examination, acknowledgment and declaration shall be thereupon entered of record in such court." The section then prescribes the manner and form in 504 which *such privy examination and acknowledgment may be taken and certified by any two justices of the peace within the United States. And then provides, that "when the privy examination, acknowledgment and declaration of a married woman shall have been so taken in court and entered of record, or certified by two magistrates, and delivered to the clerk to be recorded, and the deed also shall have been duly acknowledged or proven as to the husband, and delivered to the clerk to be recorded, pursuant to the directions of this act, such deed shall be as effectual in law to pass all the right, title and interest of the wife, as if she had been an unmarried woman."

The question is, whether the "court" authorized by the said 15th section to take such privy examination and acknowledgment, may be a court in any of the United States, or must be a court in the state of Virginia? It will be seen that previous sections of the law prescribe the mode of acknowledgment of deeds by persons sui juris. And that the 15th and 16th sections prescribe the mode of privy examination and acknowledgment by married women. The word "court" is sufficiently comprehensive to embrace courts in any of the United States, and there are no other words in the law which, expressly or by necessary implication, restrict it to courts in the state. The words, "such privy examination, acknowledgment and declaration shall be thereupon entered of record in such court," have not that effect. It is true that the legislature of this state cannot compel the courts of other states to enter any thing upon their records; any more than it can compel the magistrates of other states to take the acknowledgment of deeds. But it can prescribe the modes in which alone deeds may be acknowledged and authenticated out of the state for registration therein. And it can therefore require such acknowledgment, &c., of a married 505 woman made before a court *of another state to be recorded in such court as a means of having the deed recorded in this state. If any such court should refuse to permit the entry to be made upon its record, this mode of authentication would, in that case, fail of effect. It is not probable, however, that there would ever be any such refusal. There would seem to be no good reason for restricting the meaning of the word "court," in the 15th section, to courts within the state. Such privy examination and acknowledgment may be taken by two justices in any of the United States. Why not by a court of record in any of them? See 2 Lom. Dig. App. p. iv, and the note; from which it appears that the learned author is of that opinion.

But a brief review of the previous laws on the subject may serve to remove any doubt which would otherwise exist as to the meaning of the word in question.

Until 1776, there was no law of Virginia providing a mode of authenticating the acknowledgment of deeds in other countries for registration in this. At first, deeds were required to be acknowledged or proved in the General or County court in which they were to be recorded. See act of 1674, 2 Hen. St. 317; act of 1705, 3 Id. 319; and act of 1710, Id. 517. Then, two justices of the county in which a married woman resided were authorized to take her privy examination and acknowledgment, under a commission to be issued by the clerk of the General or County court. Act of 1734, 4 Id. 400; and act of 1748, 5 Id. 410. Of course this was merely a cumulative mode, intended to provide for the case of a married woman who could not conveniently travel to the General or County court. The original power of such court to take a privy examination and acknowledgment was still preserved. In October 1776 an act was passed, "to enable persons living in other countries to dispose of their estates 506 *in this commonwealth with more ease and convenience." 9 Id. 207. The 2d section of that act provided that deeds executed by persons sui juris residing in other countries, for the conveyance of land in this, might be acknowledged by them or proved by three or more witnesses before the mayor or other chief magistrate of the city, town or corporation wherein, or near to which, the grantors resided; or, if they resided in any of the states of America, and there happened to be no city or town corporate within the county wherein they resided, then they might be acknowledged by them before two justices or magistrates of the said county. The 3d section provided that where any person making such conveyance should be a feme covert, she might "personally acknowledge the same before such mayor or other chief magistrate, or before two justices or magistrates as aforesaid, according to her place of residence, and be by him or them previously examined privily and apart from her husband, whether she doth the same freely and voluntarily, and without his persuasions or threats." This act was confined to the single purpose indicated in the title.

The next act on the subject is that of 1785, entitled "an act for regulating conveyances," 12 Id. 154. This is a very important act; being an enactment of one of the revised bills which were reported to the legislature in 1779 by the committee of revisors appointed by the act of 1776. It covers the whole subject referred to in the title, and is comprised almost entirely in one unbroken section: the second section merely prescribing the day from and after which the act should be in force. It first declares that conveyances of lands shall be by deed, and directs how, when and where they are to be recorded, and how, when and where marriage contracts are to be recorded. It then makes the following provision in regard to deeds executed by non-residents of the state, or by husband and 507 *wife: "If the party who shall sign and seal any such writing reside not in Virginia, the acknowledgment by such party, or the proof by the number of witnesses requisite, of the sealing and delivering of the writing, before any court of law, or the mayor or other chief magistrate of any city, town or corporation of the county in which the party shall dwell, certified by such court or mayor, or chief magistrate, in the manner such acts are usually authenticated by them, and offered to the proper court to be recorded, within eighteen months after the sealing and delivering, shall be as effectual as if it had been in the last mentioned court. When husband and wife shall have sealed and delivered a writing, purporting to be a conveyance of any estate or interest, if she appear in court, and being examined privily and apart from her husband by one of the judges thereof, shall declare to him that she did freely and willingly seal and deliver the said writing, to be then shown and explained to her, and wishes not to retract it, and shall, before the said court, acknowledge the said writing, again shown to her, to be her act, or if before two justices of the peace of that county in which she dwelleth, if her dwelling be in the United States of America, who may be empowered by commission to be issued by the clerk of the court wherein the writing ought to be recorded, to examine her privily and take her acknowledgment, the wife being examined privily and apart from her husband by those commissioners, shall declare that she willingly signed and sealed the said writing, to be then shown and explained to her by them, and consenteth that it may be recorded; and the said commissioners shall return, with the commission and thereunto annexed, a certificate under their hands and seals, of such privy examination by them, and of such declaration made and consent yielded by her: in either case, the said writing, acknowl-508 edged also by the husband, *or proved by witnesses to be his act, and recorded together with such her privy examination and acknowledgment before the court, or together with such commission and certificate, shall not only be sufficient to convey or release any right of dower thereby intended to be conveyed or released, but be as effectual for every other purpose as if she were an unmarried woman. If the dwelling of the wife be not in the United States of America, the commission to examine her privily and take her acknowledgment, shall be directed to any two judges or justices of any court of law, or to the mayor or other chief magistrate of any city, town or corporation of the county in which the wife shall dwell, and may be executed by them in the same manner as a commission directed to two justices in the United States of America; and the certificate of the judges or justices of such court, or the certificate of such mayor or other chief magistrate, authenticated in the form and with the solemnity by them used in other acts, shall be as effectual as the like certificate of the justices in the United States of America." Then follow other provisions of the act, which it is unnecessary to notice.

I do not think there can be any serious doubt but that under this act, the "court," which was authorized to take the privy examination and acknowledgment of a married woman, was not restricted to a court within the state, but embraced every court which was authorized by the previous part of the section to take the acknowledgment of a person sui juris, whether in or out of the state. The immediate antecedent of the "court," in the provision in regard to a married woman, is "any court of law" in the provision in regard to a non-resident party; and the grammatical, as well as the reasonable construction of the act gives to the word in question the enlarged rather than the restricted sense.

509 *The next act is that of 1792, entitled, like that of 1785, "an act for regulating conveyances." 1 Stat. at Large, new series, 84. It copies, almost literally, the act of 1785, except that it embodies some additional provisions, and divides the subject, which that act comprehends in one section, into fourteen sections. The provisions of that act, which are herein before set out, are copied literally in the act of 1792 (except that the words, "or in the district or county where the lands conveyed lie," are inserted after the words, "reside not in Virginia," in the second line); that which relates to a deed executed by a non-resident party, being the 5th, and that which relates to a deed executed by a husband and wife, being the 6th and 7th sections of the latter act: the 7th section applying only to a wife whose dwelling is not in the United States. Certainly there is nothing in the act of 1792 which requires that the words in question should be construed in a more restricted sense in that act than in the act of 1785. The act of 1792 was slightly amended by an act passed in 1794, Id. 293; but the amendment is not material to the present enquiry.

By an act passed February 9, 1814, Sess. Acts, p. 35, important provisions were adopted in regard to conveyances; such as allowing them to be recorded on acknowledgment of the parties, or proof by witnesses in the clerk's office, or on acknowledgment before two justices in the country, certified in due form, under seal. And by another act, passed December 20, 1814, Sess. Acts, p. 75, it was provided, that the privy examination and acknowledgment of a feme covert might be taken without any commission, before any two justices, in any county or corporation within the United States, or the territories thereof, within which she might be.

Such, substantially, was the state of the law, so far as this case is concerned, 510 when the revision of 1819 *took place.

In that revision the law in regard to conveyances was embodied in an act entitled "an act to reduce into one act the several acts for regulating conveyances, and concerning wrongful alienations." 1 Rev. Code 361, ch. 99. The 1st, 2d, 3d and 4th sections of that act correspond, almost literally, with the same sections of the act of 1792. The 5th section of the act of 1819 is like the 5th section of the act of 1792, except that it is limited to a party residing "not in the United States, or any territory thereof;" instead of extending to a party residing "not in Virginia, or in the district or county where the lands conveyed lay;" and except also that it makes a small omission, not necessary to be noticed. The 15th and 16th sections of the act of 1819 correspond with the 6th and 7th sections of the act of 1792, relating to a deed executed by a husband and wife. The sections which in the act of 1819 intervene between the 5th and 15th, embody provisions of the act of February 9, 1814, with some amendment and some new provisions. The 15th section substantially agrees with the 6th section of the act of 1792, except the difference occasioned by the provision of the act of December 20, 1814, dispensing with a commission to take the privy examination and acknowledgment of a feme covert before any two justices within the United States, and prescribing the form of the certificate of the justices; and except a provision in regard to the effect of a covenant or warranty contained in the deed of a feme covert, which is inserted in the said 15th, but not in the said 6th section. The words of the former section are identical with those of the latter, in that part of each which relates to the appearance, examination and acknowledgment of a feme covert "in court." The words, "such privy examination, acknowledgment and declaration shall be thereupon entered of record in such court," follow in the former, but not in the 511 latter *section. But the effect of these words is merely to condense and transpose a provision contained in the succeeding section of the act of 1792, and not to alter the sense.

If the acts of 1785 and 1792 authorized a court of law of any other state or country in which a married woman might reside, to take her privy examination and acknowledgment to a deed for land in this state, the act of 1819 did the same thing. The words in the former acts which conferred such authority, were literally copied in the latter, and must have the same meaning in each. That the 5th and 15th sections of the act of 1819, which correspond with the 5th and 6th sections of the act of 1792, are separated from each other by several sections compiled from intervening legislation, can certainly make no difference. Nor can it make any, so far as this case is concerned, that the 5th section of the act of 1819 is restricted to a party residing "not in the United States, or any territory thereof," instead of "not in Virginia, or the district or county where the lands conveyed lie," as in the 5th section of the act of 1792. The effect of that change in the act of 1819 was to repeal so much of the act of 1792 as authorized a court out of this state, but in the United States, to take the acknowledgment or proof of a deed executed by a person sui juris for land in this state. It was at one time contended that such authority still existed under the act of 1792, notwithstanding the act of 1819; and that the latter did not repeal the former act in that respect. But this court decided otherwise in Lockridge v. Carlisle, 2 Leigh 186. Shortly before that decision was made, and probably while the case was pending in this court, an act was passed expressly authorizing any court of record in the United States, or any territory or district thereof, to take such acknowledgment or proof. Sup. Rev. Code, p. 213, ch. 155. That act would 512 doubtless *have authorized any such court to take the privy examination and acknowledgment of a married woman also, if the legislature had not supposed that such authority already existed under the act of 1819. There was the same reason for the existence of the authority in the one case as in the other.

I am therefore of opinion that, even looking to the act of 1819 by itself, but especially tracing it to its source, and viewing it in connection with antecedent acts on the same subject, the Circuit court of Rutherford county had authority to take the acknowledgment in question. The propriety, and often the necessity of so tracing an act to its source, and viewing it in connection with antecedent acts for the purpose of ascertaining its meaning, is manifest, and has often been asserted by this court. In Shirley v. Long, 6 Rand. 744, Judge Carr, speaking upon this subject, in its application to that case, says: "When we look at these consequences, I think we are bound to conclude that no change in the application of the words was intended; but that this blending of the two subjects (real and personal estate), has proceeded from inattention, added to that desire to condense, so visible in our revisals, and which, in other instances, is carried so far as to sacrifice, in some degree, clearness to brevity. This renders it often necessary to the understanding of a law, that we should look back to its origin, and trace its progress; and for this purpose the Statutes at Large by Hening are invaluable." The conclusion to which the court was led by the application of this rule of construction to that case, was opposed to the literal terms of the law in question. The conclusion to which we are led by the application of the rule to this case, is consistent with the letter as well as the spirit and reason of the law.

I have considered this question so much at length, not because it was neces-513 sary to do so for the purposes *of this case, but because of the importance of the question generally. I am informed that many deeds of married women for land in this state, have been recorded on certificates of their privy examination and acknowledgment before courts of record in other states; and that this course was pursued (in the belief that it was authorized by the acts of 1785, 1792 and 1819) down to the period when the present Code went into operation. If the fact be so, it is a matter of the first importance that those who hold lands under such deeds, should be quieted in their titles by the judgment of this court. And this is especially proper, since the present Code, p. 513, § 4, authorizes no other court to take the privy examination and acknowledgment of a married woman to a deed, but a court authorized to admit such deed to record. While the Code plainly announces this rule for the future, it seems to increase the doubt as to the pre-existing law, and makes it more proper that the doubt should be removed.

Having ascertained that the Circuit court of Rutherford county in the state of Tennessee had authority to take the acknowledgment of the appellee, the remaining enquiry is,

Secondly, Was it duly taken?

At common law a married woman is considered to be under the power of her husband, and can make no valid deed or other contract. The statute law enables her to convey her interest in real estate in a certain mode, prescribed mainly with a view to protect her against the coercion, persuasion or deception of her husband. It has long been held that the requisitions of the statute need not literally, but must substantially be complied with. To demand a literal compliance with them, would be, unnecessarily, to obstruct the alienation of property and throw a cloud over titles. To dispense with the substance of any of 514 them, would *be to deprive the wife of some of those safeguards which the law has provided for her protection. Several cases are to be found in our reports, in which a substantial, has been accepted in lieu of a literal compliance with these requisitions. Harvey & wife v. Borden, 2 Wash. 156; Ware v. Carey, 2 Call 263; Langhorne v. Hobson, 4 Leigh 224; and Tod v. Baylor, Id. 498, are cases of that kind. In the first two cases, it did not expressly appear from the commission or certificate, that the persons who took and certified the acknowledgment were justices; and yet the fact was presumed by the court, in the absence of evidence to the contrary. The last two cases occurred under the statute of 1792, and were cases of acknowledgment before justices of the peace under a commission. In Langhorne v. Hobson, most of the words used in the certificate of the justices were different from the words used in the law; and yet they were held to be equivalent. In Tod v. Baylor, it was not stated in the certificate that the deed was shown and explained to the wife by the commissioners; and yet it was held that the requisitions of the law were sufficiently complied with; the court being of opinion that the act of 1792, while it required the commissioners to show and explain the deed to the wife, did not require them to certify that they had done so: Though Tucker, P., was of opinion that it ought to appear from the certificate that she understood the deed, and that the fact did so appear in that case. On the other hand, Hairston v. Randolphs, 12 Leigh 445, is a case in which it was held that the requisitions of the law were not sufficiently complied with. That was a case of an acknowledgment before two justices of the peace, under the act of 1814 dispensing with a commission to the justices and prescribing the form of their certificate. It was conceded, that though the form of the certificate was given by law, yet it would be sufficient if to the same effect, 515 *though not in the same words. Indeed the law so expressly declared. The certificate in that case varied from the form prescribed, in several respects; but it was considered that it substantially complied with the law except in one particular; that the justices did not certify that the deed was fully explained to the wife, nor was there any thing in the certificate from which her knowledge of its contents, at the time of her acknowledgment, could be inferred. And for that defect, the deed was decided to be void as to the wife.

All the cases before cited were cases of acknowledgments before justices. There has been no case before this court, so far as I am informed, as to the sufficiency of an acknowledgment before a court. The law has prescribed somewhat different duties to be performed by a court and by justices taking the acknowledgment of a wife to a deed. But the duties in each case, whatever they are, must be substantially performed. In each case a mere authority is given by law, which must be pursued to make the act valid and binding. It must appear from the record of the court or the certificate of the justices, that this authority has been substantially pursued: though, if it so appear, the act, in either case, is generally conclusive. Harkins v. Forsyth, 11 Leigh 294; Carper v. McDowell, 5 Gratt. 212; Taliaferro v. Pryor, 12 Id. 277. As has been already stated, this is a case of an acknowledgment before a court under 1 Rev. Code of 1819, p. 365, § 15; which, or so much of which as is pertinent to the present enquiry, has already been set out in this opinion. That act required in such cases, that three things should be entered of record in such court, viz: 1st, the privy examination of the wife: that is, that she was examined privily and apart from her husband, by one of the judges of the court; 2dly, her declaration; that is, that she declared to him, that she did freely and willingly seal and deliver the said 516 writing, then *shown and explained to her, and wished not to retract it; and 3dly, her acknowledgment; that is, that, before the said court, she acknowledged the said writing, so again shown to her, to be her act. Have these requisitions been substantially complied with in this case? The certificate is in these words:

"The state of Tennessee, Rutherford Circuit court, October term 1833: The within deed of conveyance was presented in open court, and acknowledged by the said John Zumbro to be his act and deed for the purposes therein contained. The court thereupon proceeded to take the privy examination of the said Mary Zumbro, wife of the said John Zumbro, separate and apart from her said husband, who acknowledged that she executed said conveyance, freely and voluntarily, and without any fear, persuasion or coercion of her said husband. All which was, on motion, ordered to be certified. In testimony whereof," &c.

This certificate wholly omits any declaration of the wife that she wished not to retract what she had done; and contains nothing which tends to show that she made any such declaration. Her wish to retract what she had done, is perfectly consistent with every thing contained in the certificate. The law, as we have seen, expressly required this declaration to be made and entered of record; and the requisition is very material. I am therefore compelled to say that in my opinion the certificate is fatally defective in this respect, and that the privy examination and acknowledgment of the wife were not duly taken.

It does not appear from the certificate that the deed was shown and explained to the wife at the time of her privy examination. The law required this to be done; though, according to Tod v. Baylor, it did not require the fact to be certified. Tucker, P., was of opinion in that case, as before stated, that it ought at least to appear from the certificate that the wife understood 517 *the deed. But the court did not so decide; and it never has been so decided. Nor is it necessary to decide the question in this case; and I therefore express no opinion upon it. If the fact ought to have so appeared in that case, it ought so to appear in this; for the act of 1792, under which that case occurred, used the same language in this respect as to an acknowledgment in court and an acknowledgment before justices. But the law was altered in regard to an acknowledgment before justices by the act of 1814, which prescribed the form of the certificate of the justices, in which the fact that the deed was explained to the wife is expressly stated. Hairston v. Randolphs, 12 Leigh 445, was decided under that act.

I think the decree ought to be affirmed.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Moncure, J.

Decree affirmed.

518 *Craig's Heirs v. Walthall & Wife.

July Term, 1858, Lewisburg.

1. Wills—Construction of—Case at Bar.—Testator owning a large and valuable tract of land, and leaving a widow and six infant children, describes separate parcels of the land by boundaries, one of which he gives to each of his children. As to one of these parcels he says, "It is my will that the above described part of my farm shall be owned by my son John (about thirteen), and I do bequeath it to him subject to the control of my dear wife during her widowhood, and then to my son John for life." The widow takes a beneficial interest in the land during her widowhood.
2. Same—Jointure under Statute—Dower—Case at Bar.—The testator devises all his land to his different children, giving the wife one of the parcels during her widowhood, which parcel has the improvements upon it. He also gives her his slaves for life, all the rest of his personal property to enjoy and use for the best interests of his children; and the interest on the bonds due him to be used by her for the benefit of his children. This will be held to be in lieu of dower under the act. Code, ch. 110, § 4, 5, p. 474-5.†
3. Same—Same—Same—Election—Case at Bar.—In such case the widow having been told that the provision in the will was in lieu of dower, and advised to renounce it, declines to do so, and expresses herself satisfied with the provision; and takes possession of the property and holds it for four years, until she marries.—She has elected to take under the will, and cannot then claim her dower.

*See monographic note on "Dower" (division VI, G) appended to Davis v. Davis, 25 Gratt. 587.

†Code, ch. 110, § 4. "If any estate, real or personal, intended to be in lieu of her dower, shall be conveyed or devised for the jointure of the wife, such conveyance or devise shall bar her dower of the real estate, or the residue thereof."

§ 5. "But if such conveyance or devise were before the marriage, without the assent or during the infancy of the feme, or if it were after marriage, in either case the widow may at her election, waive such jointure and demand her dower. And when she shall demand and receive her dower, the estate so conveyed and devised to her shall cease and determine."

John Craig died in August 1852, leaving a widow and six infant children. By his will, which was duly admitted to probate in the County court of Montgomery,
519 *he laid off by metes and bounds three parcels of his land; and after designating the bounds of the first, he says, "I want, I direct, I bequeath the above described or parcel of land to my daughter Mary Taylor Craig, with the exception," that he wished each of his other children to have an acre lot of the said tract near the town of Christiansburg. After setting out the bounds of the second tract, he says, "It is my will that the above described part of my farm shall be owned by my son John Craig; and I do hereby bequeath it to him, subject to the control of my dear wife, Emeline Craig, during her widowhood, and then to my son John for life." Third, he says, "I desire that part of my farm now occupied by my tenant, Ch's Furrow, and known as my Furrow place, to my daughter Melinda W. Craig." And then he directs how certain lines shall be run. Fourth, he says, "I desire that the remainder of my farm shall be divided between my three children, Eleanor Lewis Craig, Ja's Robert Craig, and Ch's Joseph Craig, so as to be equal to each in point of value, or as near as can be made."

The testator directed that all his negroes should be used by his wife Emeline Craig during her natural life; and then to be equally divided among his children then living. And he gave his wife all his personal property except slaves, to enjoy and use for the best interests of his children. And he expressed the wish that the bonds then due to him and bearing interest should be kept as long as the circumstances would allow, in the hands of good and responsible persons, bearing interest, to be used by his wife Emeline Craig for the benefit of his children. And he appointed his brother Robert Joseph Craig and his nephew James C. Taylor executors of his will; the latter of whom qualified as such.

It appears that the eldest of the testator's children was at the time of his death about sixteen years old, and the second, John, was about fourteen. It appears 520 *too that the testator owned a large tract of very valuable land; there being at least eleven hundred acres, estimated at thirty dollars per acre; and that all the dwelling-houses and out-houses were on the part given to John Craig, whose land was estimated by some of the witnesses at one-third, and by one at one-fourth in value of the whole tract. The slaves were only six in number, and three of them were so old as to be an expense. The other personal chattels were horses, cattle, and the usual stock upon a farm.

Soon after the death of John Craig, the widow was informed by the executor that there was a provision for her in the will, that the executor considered it in lieu of dower, and that it might prove insufficient for her support if she should marry again. And in view of this fact he advised her to renounce the provisions of the will made for her, and elect to take her third. This she positively refused to do; saying she regarded the provision in the will as being intended for her dower, and ample for her support. It was also proved that her mother advised her to renounce the will; but she indignantly refused. And she occupied the land subjected to her control during her widowhood, and held the slaves and other personal property from the death of John Craig until she married Thomas A. Walthall, in October 1855.

In December 1855 Thomas A. Walthall and his wife filed their bill in the Circuit court of Montgomery county, against the children of John Craig, the object of which was to have dower assigned to the female plaintiff in the real estate of Craig. The bill stated that she continued in possession of the mansion-house and personal property, and cultivated the farm and appropriated the proceeds to the maintenance of the children. That she never elected to take the provisions of the will, for her benefit, if they could be said to be for her benefit, in lieu of her claim for dower.

521 *The defendants answered, insisting that the female plaintiff had accepted the provisions of the will in her favor, and that they were in lieu of dower. The facts, as they appear in the record, have been already given. The cause came on to be heard in June 1857, when the court held that the female plaintiff was entitled to have her dower assigned in the real estate of John Craig; and appointed certain commissioners to lay it off and assign it to her. And from this decree the heirs of John Craig obtained an appeal to this court.

Watts and Grattan, for the appellants.
Staples, for the appellee.

SAMUELS, J. This case presents, for the first time in this court, the question as to the true construction of sections 4 and 5, chapter 110, pages 474 and 475 of the Code of Virginia. This statute differs widely from that formerly in force, 1 Rev. Code of 1819, ch. 107, § 11, 12, in regard to legal jointures; and it approaches very nearly to the law of equitable jointure, as heretofore administered by the courts of chancery.

Our case seems to turn upon the several questions:

1st. What estate may make a jointure?

2d. Has such estate been devised by Craig to his wife?

3d. Was that estate intended to be a jointure?

4th. If so intended, has the wife made a valid election, accepting the jointure and relinquishing dower?

In regard to the first question: the statute is too plain to admit of doubt. Either real or 'personal estate of itself may make a jointure: it follows that both combined may have the like effect. The question was brought to the mind of the general assembly by the revisors, whether real estate only, or personal estate as well, should make a jointure. See Report of Revisors 565, ch. 110, § 4, and note. The general as-522 sembly *enacted that real or personal estate might make a jointure. It is not required that the jointure should begin at any particular period, or be of any particular duration of time.

Upon the second of the questions above stated, it appears that testator's whole personal estate was bequeathed to his wife in some form; the slaves for life; his goods and chattels absolutely; for on the authority of Stinson's ex'or v. Day & wife, 1 Rob. R. 435, and Dold v. Wallace, 3 Leigh 258, it cannot be held that testator's children had any interest in the goods and chattels. The interest on money due to testator was given to his wife, to be used by her for the benefit of his children. This provision far exceeded the wife's distributive share in the personal estate, in case she had asserted her claim to such share within the time and in the mode prescribed by the statutes, Code, ch. 123, § 12, p. 524; Sess. Acts 1852, ch. 28, § 1, p. 80. The argument on behalf of the appellees was chiefly directed to the purpose of proving that no beneficial interest in land was conferred by Craig's will on his widow; that her control over a portion of the real estate during her widowhood, was only as an agent or trustee for John Craig, the devisee in fee. If Emeline Craig the widow, and John Craig the son and devisee, had been strangers to the testators, I am inclined to think that the will would have conferred on her an estate during widowhood; that there is no appreciable difference between undefined control of real estate for a time, and a right to enjoy that estate for that time. However it would have been between mere strangers, yet the case affords other aids in the construction of this will: they are found in the relations of the parties, the condition of the estate, and of the beneficiaries under the will. Mrs. Craig, the widow, had a right of dower in her husband's real estate, which he could not affect without her 523 consent. *He might by law offer her a jointure of real or personal estate, or of both, in lieu of dower; and if she accepted the offer, her right of dower would be barred. The will should be construed in reference to the limits of the husband's power over his estate, and should be held to be within those limits, unless he appears to have intended to disregard them. If no property be given by this will as a jointure, then the husband exceeded his power in making present devises of his whole real estate by specific metes and bounds. This disregard must be followed by a derangement of the whole scheme of his will; for the dower in the whole estate must be assigned without regard to the metes and bounds of the specific devises. Some of the devisees must give up the whole or a large portion of their land to be held as dower, and then look to the other devisees for contribution to alleviate the burden imposed by the dower estate.

It is not shown that there is any thing in the condition of John Craig the devisee, which should require his property to be put under the control of his mother for an indefinite time. He was thirteen years old at the time of his father's death. If the devise had been intended for his sole benefit, it is impossible to see what interest of his would be promoted by withholding his property from him after arrival at full age; or by putting his property in the hands of another to be held for an uncertain time, without security to account for its profits. Other and younger devisees were left to the care of the law, to be exercised through guardians. It is apparent that the testator intended that his infant children should reside with their mother, the widow; thus it was necessary that she should have a dwelling-house; and it is shown by the record that the only dwelling-houses on the estate were on that part of the land put under her control during widowhood. The personal estate given to the wife, 524 consists *chiefly of slaves, live stock and farming utensils. Some of these subjects could be "enjoyed" and "used" only on a plantation. In my judgment it is clear that the widow was invested with a beneficial interest during widowhood in that part of the land put under her control.

Passing to the third question, it may be said that the second and third questions run into each other to some extent, so that a part of what has been said in regard to the second, applies to the third. The testator intended his will in all its parts to be effectual. If we suppose his intention to have been to create a jointure by means of the real and personal estate given to his wife, the will is consistent in all its parts. If, however, it be supposed that an estate in dower is yet to be carved out of the lands, then the devisees will, to some extent, be deprived of the lands devised to them respectively; and parts of the will are in conflict. If it shall be held that no jointure was intended, the widow on the death of her husband was entitled to dower, one-third part of the whole estate. Whether she would hold the land devised, and also her dower assigned out of the other land; or whether the land devised to her would be required to contribute to the estate in dower, it is not necessary to consider; for in either event, the consequences would be so much at variance with the whole scheme of the will, that I am constrained to believe that the provision made for the wife was intended to be in lieu of dower, and not in addition to it.

It only remains to consider the fourth question, whether the widow has made an election to accept the jointure in lieu of dower. On the general principles of law, a party cannot be required to make an election without such knowledge of the subjects submitted to his choice as will enable him to choose discreetly. On the same 525 principles, a party cannot be *held to have made an election without such knowledge, unless it manifestly appears that he intended to waive the benefit of accurate information; that he intended to incur the risk of making a bad choice. In our case, it is shown that the widow had full knowledge of the property given her by the will; she had it in her own possession; she repeatedly and expressly declared that she accepted and held the property as a full satisfaction of her interests in her husband's estate, and refused to take steps necessary to obtain any thing further from that estate. That an election may be made by acts in pais, seems to be well settled by the courts. 1 Lom. Dig. p. 146 of new edition, 121 of old; 1 Bright on Husband and Wife 546.

It would be hard to conceive a case in which an election could be more distinctly made than was that in our case.

I am of opinion the decree should be reversed, and the bill dismissed; giving the appellants their costs expended in this court and in the Circuit court.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Samuels, J.

Decree reversed, and bill dismissed.

526 *Hitchcox v. Rawson.

July Term, 1858, Lewisburg.

1. Ejectment—Evidence—Record of Proceedings for Sale of Delinquent Land.—On the trial of an action of ejectment, plaintiff claims under a conveyance from a commissioner of delinquent lands, and offers the record of the proceedings for the sale of the lands, in evidence. The defendant objects to it, for irregularities on its face. 1. That the land was not forfeited, because the forfeiture for non-payment of taxes was in the name of the patentee who had sold and conveyed before it was returned delinquent in 1801 and to 1814; though it was never entered in any other name. 2. Because the decree for sale was at a special term of the court. 3. Because the decree was conditional upon purchasers giving the bond. 4. Because the court on petition made an order directing the deed to be made to parties not reported to be the purchasers. 5. Because the deed was made by one commissioner of delinquent lands; though there was but one, and the order directed him. But none of these invalidate the proceedings so as to render them null as between the purchaser and a third party, in a collateral proceeding.

2. Same—Declaration—Insufficient Description of Land.†—A declaration in ejectment, which describes the land as a part of a larger tract owned by plaintiff, near certain creeks which have no public notoriety, is defective, and may be demurred to.

3. Same—Same—Same—Verdict.‡—In such a case, a verdict which finds for the plaintiff the land in the declaration mentioned, is too vague to enable the officer to deliver possession; and there must be a venire de novo.

This was an action of ejectment in the Circuit court of the county of Ritchie, by John Rawson against William Hitchcox. The declaration set out that the plaintiff was possessed in fee simple of a tract of land in the county of Ritchie, containing eleven hundred acres, and bounded as follows: setting out the boundaries. And being so possessed thereof, the defendant afterwards, &c. entered into the said premises, and unlawfully withholds from the plaintiff the possession of two hundred 527 acres in and adjacent to the *waters of Hughes' and Bunnell's runs; it being a portion of the above mentioned tract of eleven hundred acres of land.

On the trial of the cause, the jury found "for the plaintiff against the defendant the estate in fee simple in the land in the plaintiff's declaration mentioned." And on this verdict the court rendered a judgment, "that the plaintiff recover against the defendant the possession of the premises according to the verdict aforesaid."

The plaintiff claimed title under a sale by the commissioners of delinquent lands; and on the trial, to maintain his title, he offered in evidence the record of the proceedings of the court directing a sale of the land: and the defendant objected to it as evidence, for errors apparent on its face; but the court overruled the objection and admitted the evidence. The report of the commissioners of delinquent lands stated that ten thousand acres of land had been patented to Hugh Lenox in 1785, and that it had been forfeited in the name of Lenox for the non-payment of taxes from 1801 to 1807, and from 1809 to 1814; amounting to sixty-seven dollars and fifty-nine cents, the damages on which were one hundred and thirty dollars and thirteen cents. It also stated that Lenox had conveyed the land to Levi Hollingsworth; that Hollingsworth conveyed to Robert Morris in July 1794, and that in March 1795 Morris conveyed it to Thomas Willing, John Nixon and John Barclay, in trust for the North American land company. The land does not appear to have been entered on the commissioner's books in the name of any of these parties. The land claimed by the plaintiff is a part of this tract.

At a special term of the Circuit court in March 1841, an order was made directing a sale of the land aforesaid. And at the September term of the court for the same year, the commissioners having reported 528 that the *land had been purchased by Josiah M. Steed, on behalf of the North American land company, at the price of two hundred and fifty dollars, of which he had paid one-fourth, but had failed to give his bond for the balance, as required by the statute, the court made a decree that unless the purchaser should, within thirty days from the date of the decree, execute and deliver to the commissioners, his bond with security, &c. as required by law, the commissioners should proceed to resell the land. But if the purchaser should execute and deliver his bond to the commissioners in thirty days, then that said sale be confirmed, and upon the payment of the money mentioned in the bond the commissioners should convey to the said Steed on behalf of said company all the title of the commonwealth accruing under the forfeiture aforesaid in and to the said tract of ten thousand acres of land.

At the April term 1842 the commissioners reported that Steed had executed the bond required of him within the time appointed. And thereupon the court decreed that the decree of the last term should be unconditional, and the sale be confirmed.

At the April term 1845 the trustees of the North American land company petitioned the court, stating that the land was the property of the company, and had been purchased by Steed for them; that the tax and damages had been paid; and asking that the balance of the purchase money not consumed in the payment of the taxes and damages, might be released; and that the commissioners might be directed to convey the land to them. And at the same term of the court a decree was made in conformity with the prayer of the petition.

In the further progress of the cause, the plaintiff offered in evidence the deed from the commissioner of delinquent lands to the trustees of the North American land company; to which the defendant 529 objected: *but the court admitted the evidence. To the opinions of the court admitting the record and the deed, the defendant excepted.

After the plaintiff had introduced the evidence aforesaid, and a deed from the trustees of the land company to himself, for the tract of land herein before mentioned, the defendant introduced the deeds from Lenox to Hollingsworth, and from Hollingsworth to Robert Morris. And then he offered to prove that Robert Morris was dead; that Maria Nixon was his daughter and heir at law, and that she was married to Henry Nixon. And he then offered further to prove that Henry and Maria Nixon had, on the 17th of September 1836, caused said land to be entered on the books of the commissioner of the revenue, and charged with the back taxes and damages thereon; and offered further to prove that the said Henry and Maria Nixon had, on the 28th of October 1836, caused to be paid at the treasury office in Richmond, sixty-one dollars and fifty cents, the said back taxes and damages: It being admitted by the defendant that he did not claim by, through or under the said Nixon and wife, but adversely to them. But the court, on the motion of the plaintiff, excluded the evidence; being of opinion that the decree of the court declaring the said land to be forfeited as to said parties, was conclusive upon strangers in all collateral controversies. To this opinion of the court the defendant excepted. And on his application a supersedeas was allowed.

Hoffman, for the appellant.

Stephenson and William L. Jackson, for the appellee.

LEE, J. The various objections which have been urged in this case as grounds of error for which the judgment should be reversed, may be resolved into three. These are,

530 *1. That the Circuit court erred in permitting the record of the decree for the sale of the ten thousand acres of land granted to Hugh Lenox, as forfeited, and of the subsequent proceedings by which the commissioner was directed to make the conveyance of the same to Dundas and Kugler, together with the deed so made by him to them, to be read in evidence to the jury though objected to by the plaintiff in error.

2. That the court erred in refusing to permit the plaintiff in error to show that notwithstanding the decree for the sale of the land as forfeited, it was at the time in point of fact not forfeited under the law and not therefore liable to be sold as such.

3. That the declaration and verdict were both defective and insufficient and no judgment could properly be rendered for the plaintiff upon them.

In support of the first of these objections several reasons have been urged by the counsel in argument.

It is said that the order for the sale was made at an intermediate term of the court, and was a nullity because the court had no power at such a term to make an order of that kind.

The act of 1819, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 69, § 74, p. 243, provides that the courts at such intermediate terms might hear and determine all motions cognizable by them whether the same were depending and could have been tried at the previous term or not. And the same provision is found in the act concerning Circuit superior courts of the 16th of April 1831. Supp. Rev. Code, p. 157, § 61. And while the reasons which forbade the trial of cases that could not have been tried at the previous term could have no application to proceedings under the laws concerning delinquent and forfeited lands, it might be doing no violence to the spirit or language of the act to include ex parte proceedings of that character under the general and comprehensive term "motions." But it will be observed 531 *that by the sixth section of the act of March 15, 1838, the judges of the Circuit courts had the power to act upon the reports of the commissioners and to order sales, in vacation as well as in term, and it would seem difficult to hold that what the judge might certainly do in vacation he could not do at an intermediate term. If under a strict construction of the act, the court had not cognizance of these proceedings as a "motion," why may not its action be regarded as the action of the judge in vacation after he has signed the order? To say that his order is upon the record book and not upon the report of the commissioner savors too much of nicety and sticking in the bark.

But there is another answer to the objection, and that is that although the order for the sale was made at an intermediate term, yet the confirmation of the sale and all the subsequent proceedings in relation to the subject were had at regular terms of the court. And if there had been an irregularity in making the order for the sale at an intermediate term, I think it should be regarded as abundantly cured by the subsequent ratification and the proceedings afterwards had at the regular terms.

But it is said that the record of these proceedings was deprived of the character of legal evidence because it appeared from its face that the land was not in fact forfeited, that the case was coram non judice and the decree of sale and the proceedings under it were merely void.

The position taken by the counsel is that as this land was conveyed by Lenox to Hollingsworth as early as in the year 1794, the assessment in the name of Lenox for the years from 1801 to 1814 was illegal, and there could be no forfeiture for the failure to pay the taxes so illegally assessed.

It may not follow as a necessary consequence that an assessment of taxes

532 upon a tract of land would in *every case be illegal and void because the land had been previously conveyed to another by the party in whose name it was so assessed. But concede for the sake of the argument, that this land was improperly charged to Lenox after his conveyance to Hollingsworth, the position assumed is not made good. If the assessment in the name of Lenox is to be repudiated, there was no assessment of these lands in the name of any one before or after 1814, because the report ascertains that it had never been entered for taxation on the commissioner's books by any of the grantees claiming under Lenox; and it would then fall in the category of omitted land, as to which the provisions of the act of 1835 and subsequent laws had not been complied with. Thus, the report of the commissioners and the proceedings had upon it, quacunque via data, showed that this land was forfeited and liable to be sold. If the assessment in the name of Lenox was good, then the taxes had not been paid and the land was forfeited for the delinquency. If it was not good then the land had been entirely omitted from the books after the year 1794, and was liable to sale as forfeited for that cause. That the proceeding looked to a forfeiture for delinquency and not for omission from the books is not material to this enquiry. The question is of forfeiture or no forfeiture upon the face of the record and does not concern the regularity of the proceeding to enforce it.

Various irregularities are alleged to have occurred in the proceedings, the effect of which it is contended is to render the whole a mere nullity. It is said that the court had no power to direct a deed to be made to any other person than the purchaser, and the case of Walton v. Hale, 9 Gratt. 194, is cited to prove that the commissioner, who it is assumed has all the power on this subject that the court possesses, cannot execute the deed to a third person. The error in this consists 533 *in giving to the commissioner the whole power of the court. His duty is to obey the mandate of the latter, and without its order he can only convey to the purchaser. But the court might in the exercise of its ordinary powers direct the deed to be made to a third person. Whether that should be by bill, or by petition (as in this case), or on motion cannot be material to this enquiry. The court has jurisdiction to order the deed to be made to the party shown to be entitled to it, and whether that jurisdiction have been exercised with due regularity and formality, is a matter which a stranger certainly in a collateral proceeding cannot be permitted to enter into. As to him at least, factum valet, fieri non debet. And the same answer may be made to the argument that the court could not direct the deed to be made to Dundas and Kugler after it had directed it to be made to Steed the purchaser when the sale was confirmed, because when it made the order for the deed to Steed, the whole subject was disposed of and it had no longer any power over it. It is not denied that the court might by some formal proceeding to which Steed was a party, have directed the deed to be made to the trustees for the land company on whose behalf he made the purchase, and that Steed's rights were not duly respected is a matter of which third parties certainly cannot complain. It is not a question of jurisdiction but of the regularity of the mode in which the jurisdiction has been exercised; and if there be jurisdiction, whatever irregularities may have occurred in the course of the proceeding, the decree will yet be evidence, at least as against strangers in a subsequent collateral proceeding. That mere irregularities in a case of this kind, will not suffice to exclude the record as evidence in a subsequent controversy when offered by the party claiming under the sale has been expressly decided by this 534 court *in Smith v. Chapman, 10 Gratt. 445, and it cannot be considered any longer an open question.

Nor is there any foundation, I think, for the objection that the deed made to Dundas and Kugler was void because made by one of the commissioners only who made the sale, both of whom it is said were required by law to unite in the conveyance to the purchaser. This was a matter entirely within the control of the court. There was no absolute necessity for both commissioners to unite in the conveyance, and the court might require the duty of executing it to be performed by both or by one of them. The legal title was not vested in the commissioners requiring the deed of both to divest it; it remained in the commonwealth until transferred to the purchaser or those claiming by a conveyance executed by such commissioner as should be designated by the court. Chapman, the other commissioner, had resigned his office before the order for the deed was made, and it was perfectly regular and proper for the court to direct the other commissioner to make it. And if he had resigned or died before performing that duty, I can see no reason whatever to doubt the power of the court to appoint some other person to perform that duty in his stead.

This last objection, and indeed most of those made under the first head, proceed from a too narrow and restricted view of the functions and powers of the court in a proceeding for the sale of forfeited lands. It is a statutory proceeding it is true, but from the whole frame and structure of the acts upon the subject, it is plain to my mind that it was intended to give to the court the general powers of the court of chancery in executing the duty thereby imposed and in carrying out the proceeding to all its just and legitimate results; and the fourth section of the act of 535 *1837 (Sess. Acts, p. 10) expressly places the sales of those lands on the same footing as those of other lands directed to be sold by a decree of the court.

I think none of the objections urged against the admissibility of the proceeding for the sale of the land as forfeited, as evidence for the defendant in error in support of his claim, can be maintained; and without intending to say that it is absolutely such conclusive evidence of forfeiture either against those for whose default it was taken to be forfeited or against strangers, as to estop either in a subsequent suit from showing the contrary, I think it was clearly admissible as prima facie evidence at least of such forfeiture and as a link in the chain of the claimant's title. Indeed the admissibility of such a proceeding as evidence to this extent was distinctly affirmed by this court in the case of Smith v. Chapman, already cited.

Whether the record of such a proceeding is to be regarded as on the footing of a judgment in rem and so conclusive as to forbid any attempt on the part of the former owner or any third person in a collateral proceeding, to show by proof that notwithstanding the report and decree of sale, the land was in fact not forfeited and not liable to sale, was the question sought to be raised by the second bill of exceptions, and is the basis of the second ground of error as above classified. It has never been decided by this court, for in the case of Smith v. Chapman, cited and relied on by the counsel for the defendant in error, it did not arise and was not decided nor intended to be decided. In that case the questions in relation to this subject were as to the admissibility of the record when it showed irregularities in the proceeding upon its face, and the supposed necessity devolving upon the party who offered it of showing that every thing was regular before he could have the benefit of it. There was no offer to show that the land in controversy was in point of fact not forfeited 536 *when it was directed to be sold, and the precise question sought to be raised in this case did not and could not arise; and all that the court should be considered as having adjudicated in that case was that the existence of irregularities in the proceeding apparent on the face of the record would neither render it inadmissible as evidence nor as against strangers at least would impair the binding force and effect which it would have if free from such irregularities.

The question now sought to be raised is a grave and important one and will when properly presented, doubtless receive the careful and deliberate consideration of this court. In this case however, I do not think it necessarily or properly arises. The bill of exceptions does not state what were the years for which the Nixons had caused the land to be entered on the books and had paid the taxes charged and the damages. They of course only caused it to be entered and the taxes paid for such and so many years, as they were advised they were required to enter and pay for in order to save the forfeiture. But whether they made their entry and payment for all the years in which the land had been omitted including the years from 1801 to 1814 inclusive (treating the entry for those years in the name of Lenox as invalid) or under their construction of the act of 1835 only made their entry for the years after 1814 when the previous laws declaring lands to be forfeited for failure to enter them on the books and to pay the taxes charged upon them, were repealed and the forfeitures accrued under them remitted, or for the years which followed after the conveyance to Morris or after his death when the supposed title of Maria Nixon accrued is left entirely uncertain. It may be inferred that they did not enter and pay for the years from 1801 to 1814 because the amount that would have been due for those years alone accord-537 ing to the cotemporaneous *assessment, with the damages, was one hundred and ninety-seven dollars and eighty-three cents, while they only paid for all the years embraced by their entry on the books, the sum of sixty-one dollars and fifty-cents as the amount of all the taxes in arrear with the damages. Now it was not sufficient for the party to offer to prove payment of the taxes and damages which the Nixons considered to be in arrear. The years for which the entry and payment was alleged to have been made should have been shown in order that the court might see that proof of the entry and payment for those years would have been sufficient to save the forfeiture or at least would have been material and relevant when considered in connection with the proofs stated to have been previously given. Totally in the dark then as to the range of the proposed proof, this court cannot see that it would have been either the one or the other; and the subject therefore comes in too questionable a shape to be entitled to challenge the consideration and adjudication of this court. I think the court should decline to express any opinion at this time upon the question so imperfectly and doubtfully presented; and I feel the less hesitation in adopting this course because in my view as will appear in the sequel, the party will not be deprived of the benefit of the question if he can present it in a proper and available form.

It remains to consider the sufficiency of the declaration and verdict. The declaration alleges that the plaintiff was possessed in fee simple of a tract of land containing eleven hundred acres more or less, of which it gives the boundaries. It then alleges that the defendant entered into the said premises and unlawfully withheld from him (the plaintiff) the possession of two hundred acres in and adjacent to the waters of Hughes' and Bunnell's runs, being a portion of the tract of eleven hundred 538 acres. Our act, Code, ch. 135, *§ 8, requires that in ejectment the premises claimed shall be described in the declaration with convenient certainty so that from such description, possession thereof may be delivered. Now in this declaration, I think there is clearly a want of that convenient certainty. Supposing that it is meant that the defendant entered into the part only, the two hundred acres, of which he is alleged to withhold the possession (although it would seem that the entry was into the whole tract) yet the portion so withheld is not described with sufficient precision. It is "two hundred acres," and it is "in and adjacent to the waters of" the two runs named. But that there are runs known by those names is only inferentially alleged, and if there be such streams within the boundaries of the eleven hundred acres, it must still be left in doubt of what land "in and adjacent to" their waters possession is to be delivered in case of judgment for the plaintiff. I think therefore the description lacks sufficient certainty and precision and that if a demurrer had been put into the declaration, it should have been sustained. There was, however, no demurrer, and the defect might have been cured by a verdict which did ascertain the subject with proper certainty and precision. Beverley v. Fogg, 1 Call 484; Lovell v. Arnold, 2 Munf. 167; Bolling v. Mayor of Petersburg, 3 Rand. 563. But the verdict found is obnoxious to precisely the same objection that applies to the declaration. It finds for the plaintiff an estate in fee simple in the land in the declaration mentioned, without stating in terms whether it was the whole tract or the two hundred acres only, and if the latter was meant, without specifying the boundaries or referring to any plat on which it was designated or describing it otherwise than by reference to the declaration. There is therefore no more certainty and precision in the verdict than there is in the 539 declaration, and the defect in *the latter is not cured by the former. The judgment is according to the verdict, and they no more or better enable the officer to deliver possession of the subject recovered than the declaration itself.

I think therefore the court should not have rendered any judgment upon the verdict but should have set it aside and required the parties to plead de novo; and I am of opinion to reverse the judgment and remand the cause to the Circuit court with directions to set aside the verdict and the pleadings and to award a repleader.

540 *Dixon v. McCue & als.

July Term, 1858, Lewisburg.

1. Executors—Power under Will to Sell Realty—Control by Court.—Testator by his will directs his farm shall be kept for five years and cultivated by his widow for the support of his family, and longer if his executor thinks it will promote the interests of the family; and the executor is vested with power to sell at the proper time, say after five years. And as each child arrives at the age of twenty-one years, he or she shall have his or her share of his estate. The widow lives on the farm and cultivates it for five years, when the oldest child is within a few months of being twenty-one years old; and then the executor offers the land for sale. HELD: If it was not the positive duty of the executor to sell the land in time to pay the oldest child his share of the estate, the executor acting in good faith, and being of opinion that the interests of the family require a sale, and that opinion not disproved by the evidence, it would be an uncalled for and improper exercise of power in a chancellor's interfering and undertaking to substitute his discretion in the place of that of the executor.

2. Will—Provisions for Wife—Dower—Election.†—The principles applicable to the case of a widow as to the necessity of electing between her right of dower, and the provisions of her husband's will, are the same as those applicable to other persons.

3. Same—Same—Same—When Election Necessary.†—If the widow's taking dower in the real estate will clearly interfere with the provisions of the will, she must elect.

4. Same—Same—Same—Election—Case at Bar.—In the case above stated, though the widow kept possession of the land for the five years and cultivated it; and took a legacy of property to the value of five hundred dollars to aid her in carrying on the farm; still she having been under a mistake as to her rights under the will, will not be held to have elected to take under it; but may still take her dower.

David S. Dixon died in April 1847, having made his will, which was duly admitted to probate in the County court of Augusta. He left a widow and ten infant children. The second, third, fourth and fifth clauses of his will are as follows:

"Secondly. I devise that my wife
541 shall retain possession *of the farm for the term of five years after my decease, that the family be kept together, and the plantation managed by my wife in the best possible manner she can; that the family, including my aged mother, be maintained and supported from the proceeds of the farm, and the education of my children attended to and paid for out of the said proceeds. And in order that my wife shall have the means of thus conducting said farm, I desire and devise,

Thirdly. That my wife shall receive and retain out of my personal estate my negro man Dick, some domestic cloth and yarn, and such other articles besides, out of my estate at valuation or appraisement, as shall amount to the sum of five hundred dollars.

Fourthly. To effectuate my wishes and desires, I do hereby vest, in my executor (hereinafter to be named) full power and authority, at the proper time, say at the expiration of five years from the time of my decease (although I desire that my wife retain possession of the farm for a longer period, if my executor shall be of the opinion that her management has been judicious, and the interests of the family promoted by such retention); at the proper time, I say, my executor is vested with full power and authority to dispose of all my real estate, in fee simple, in as full and large a manner, in every respect, as I could myself do if living; and in effecting such sales, he shall adopt such mode and terms of sale as shall best promote the interest of the estate. And after such sale is effected, I give to my beloved wife, in addition to that herein devised to her, the sum of one thousand dollars, to be paid her by my executor out of the first payment for the real estate.

Fifthly. It is my desire, as heretofore expressed, that my wife shall keep the family together during the early period of the lives of the children, and that the proceeds of the farm, whilst under her 542 control, shall *go to the maintenance of the family, and to the education of the children: and after the sale of the real estate, as directed, that the interest accruing on that which shall remain, after paying the sum devised to my wife, shall be applied in the same way as the products of the farm have been, namely, to the maintenance of the family, and the education of the children. And my anxious desire is, that my boys, when they arrive at a suitable age, shall be bound out, by my executor, to learn good trades: but should either of my sons prefer and desire an education, and in the sound discretion of my executor, he shall deem it advisable, then a part of his share of the estate may be applied to this purpose, and such sum shall be deducted from his share, when he shall arrive at the age of twenty-one years, at which time, or age rather, it is my desire that each of my children, sharing, and sharing alike, shall receive his or her fair proportion of the whole of my real estate."

He appointed Thomas McCue his executor, who qualified as such.

In April 1852 McCue advertised the farm for sale on the 29th of May; when Mrs. Dixon the widow filed her bill in the Circuit court of Augusta county, to enjoin the sale. She set out the provisions of the will, and stated that she had remonstrated with McCue, insisting upon the necessity there was, that she should retain the land to support the younger children, who could not be supported on the interest of their shares of the purchase money; whilst she must be separated from them. That she had managed the farm judiciously, and it was then in a better state of cultivation than it was at the death of her husband; and the interests of the family would be promoted by permitting her to retain possession of it. She denies that the executor is authorized under any fair construction of the will then to sell the land. Says that had she 543 not conceived *herself entitled, under the will, to retain the farm to enable her to raise her children, she would have renounced said will, and would have taken the share of her husband's estate to which she would have been entitled by law. The prayer of the bill was, that the plaintiff might be permitted to retain the farm and cultivate it as heretofore, and thus secure a support for herself and her children; and for an injunction; which was granted.

McCue answered the bill. He said he had advertised the sale of the land by virtue of authority vested in him by the will of his testator, and in the exercise of what he considers a sound discretion. That he does not think that the interests of the family of his testator will be promoted by permitting the plaintiff to retain longer possession of the land. That she barely supports herself and those of the children who are still with her. That the oldest child will be of age in a few months, at which time, according to the will, he will be entitled to have his share of the estate; and he asks, how is that share to be given him; or how is he to be compensated for the delay in receiving his portion, upon the idea that by such delay the rest of the family will be more comfortable. It was this view of the subject which influenced the respondent in determining the question left to his discretion. He may have erred, and he is prepared to acquiesce in any thing the court may hold to be right under all the circumstances. But it is a question in which the children were interested and ought to be heard.

In June 1852 there was a motion to dissolve the injunction; which was overruled. And the court directed the children to be made parties; which was done. Afterwards, in April 1853, the oldest son, having come of age in the previous year, answered the bill, insisting upon his right to have his share of the estate; and expressing the opinion that the true interest of 544 all *the children would best be promoted by following the plan indicated by the will of his father, viz: by selling the land and dividing the money, and putting the children to respectable trades. In the next year another of the children came of age, and answered to the same effect.

A great many witnesses were examined on the questions, whether the farm had been as well cultivated by Mrs. Dixon, since the death of her husband, as it had been in his lifetime; and whether or not it was the interest of the children that the land should be sold. Of course there were differences of opinion upon both points: though it was generally the opinion of the witnesses that the interest of the elder children would be promoted by a sale. It appeared that six of the children were put out from home; there remaining there only the four youngest.

The cause came on to be heard in February 1855, when the injunction was dissolved.

After the dissolution of the injunction the plaintiff filed an amended bill, claiming dower in the land, and also the provision made for her by the will out of the personal estate. This was contested by the executor and the elder children. They insisted that the provisions in the will in favor of Mrs. Dixon were in lieu of dower: and that she had accepted them, having had possession of the land for five years under the will; and having received the legacy left her out of the personal estate.

The cause came on again to be heard, in June 1855, when the court dissolved the injunction, which had been reinstated, and dismissed the bills. Whereupon Mrs. Dixon applied to this court for an appeal, which was allowed.

Fultz, for the appellant.
Baldwin, for the appellees.

545 *DANIEL, J. I have experienced no serious difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the appellant has wholly failed to make out a case on her original bill.

I am not prepared to say that the period had not arrived when to postpone any longer a sale of the farm would have involved a plain disregard, by the executor, of the testator's intentions.

The second, third and fourth clauses of the will, as also the first portion of the fifth clause, would seem to indicate a purpose, on the part of the testator, to leave it to the discretion of his executor either to sell the farm immediately on the expiration of the term of five years, during which the appellant was to have the possession and management of it, or to defer a sale thereafter as long as in his opinion the interest of the family would be promoted by its being retained in the possession of the appellant. But in the last member of the fifth clause, after expressing his "anxious desire" that his boys, on arriving at suitable ages, should be bound out by the executor, to learn good trades, the testator directs that if either one of them prefers an education, the executor, if he deems it advisable, is to apply a part of the share of such son in the estate to that purpose; such part to be deducted from his share, on his attaining the age of twenty-one years: "at which time or age (the will proceeds) it is my desire that each of my children sharing and sharing alike, shall receive his or her fair proportion of the whole of my real estate."

The will of the testator was proved and ordered to be recorded at the April term of the County court of Augusta, 1847, and the advertisement of the sale of the farm is dated the 28th of April 1852. The term of five years, during which the appellant had a right to hold the farm, independent of any consent on the part of the executor, had therefore expired. The bill of injunction filed by the appellant appears to 546 have *been sworn to on the 3d, and to have been filed on the 18th of May 1852. And in the answer of the executor, sworn to and filed on the 7th of June 1852, he states, that "the oldest child is (then) nearly of age, and will be of age within a few months; at which time, according to the will, he will be entitled to receive his share of the estate." And he asks, "How is that share to be given him, or how is he to be compensated for the delay in receiving his portion, upon the idea that by such delay the rest of the family will be rendered more comfortable?" "The property (he continues) is not increasing; no profits are made. It was this view of the subject which influenced the respondent in determining the question left to his discretion." As to the fact, stated by the executor, in respect to the age of the oldest child, I take it there was no dispute. In truth, in her amended bill filed on the 27th of January 1853, Mrs. Dixon admits that Franklin Dixon, the oldest son, came of age in the month of September preceding.

In the testimony of the numerous witnesses who were examined as to the management of the farm by Mrs. Dixon, and as to whether the interests of the family would probably be promoted by her being allowed to retain the possession for a longer period, there is much conflict. Several of them, who seem to be men of observation and experience in such matters, think that the farm has been judiciously managed, and express the decided opinion that the interests of all the children would be promoted by Mrs. Dixon's continuing to retain the possession and management. On the other hand, several others of them, whose means of forming a judgment, apparent candor in stating their reasons, &c. would seem to entitle their views of the matter to an equal degree of consideration, regard the management of the farm, of the children, and of the concerns and interests of the family, *by Mrs. Dixon, as in many respects wanting in proper judgment, and give it as their opinion that the interests of all the parties concerned would be best promoted by allowing the executor to proceed to an immediate sale; whilst there are yet others, apparently equally worthy of credit, who, seeing no material difference in the management of affairs by Mrs. Dixon, from that pursued by her hubsand in his lifetime, think that the interests of the children grown and of those nearly grown, would be promoted by a sale at once, and that the interests of the younger children would be best cared for by allowing Mrs. Dixon to retain the management and apply the proceeds of the farm to supporting and rearing them; as had been done in the case of the older children.

The charge in the bill, that the executor, in determining to make a sale of the farm, was prompted by a desire to advance his own pecuniary interest, rather than by a regard to the interests of the family, derives no support or countenance whatever from the evidence; and there is an entire absence of any thing to show that his conduct was actuated by any improper bias, or wish to advance the interests of the older children at the expense of Mrs. Dixon and the younger children.

In such a state of things there would appear, to my mind, to be a strong semblance, if not of usurpation, at least of uncalled for and improper exercise of power, in a chancellor's interfering and undertaking to substitute his discretion in the place of that of the executor.

As already intimated, it would require a very liberal interpretation of the will in favor of the pretensions of the appellant, to hold that the matter of proceeding to make a sale of the farm was, at the time of the filing of the bill, any longer optional with the executor, and had not become, by 548 reason of the approaching *majority of the oldest son, a peremptory duty. And if this difficulty were out of the way of the appellant, it seems to me quite clear that the powers with which the testator designed to clothe the executor, if not of a character purely discretionary, resting wholly on opinion and judgment, and therefore belonging to a class of powers over which courts of equity generally disclaim all control, at least partake so strongly of that character as to make the exercise of such control dependent upon its being shown that the executor was proceeding to act not upon an honest judgment and a sound discretion, but upon some fraudulent or improper motive, or clear mistake of duty.

This has not been shown. I see nothing in the case from which to infer that the executor has not been governed by a sincere, impartial and just regard to the interests of all concerned. And I think that the Circuit court properly refused to stay a sale any longer, on the grounds taken by the appellant in her original bill.

Several questions arising upon the amended bill, remain to be considered.

The first of these is: Has Mrs. Dixon, upon a proper interpretation of her husband's will, a just claim to the provisions therein made for her, and also a right to have dower assigned her in his estate?

The general principles in reference to which this question must be considered, are few and well ascertained, notwithstanding the precedents disclose much apparent conflict in the opinions of judges engaged in the task of applying those principles to the special facts and circumstances of particular cases.

The cardinal doctrines upon the subject are clearly and concisely stated by Vice Chancellor Kindersley, in the case of Gibson v. Gibson, 17 Eng. L. & E. R. 349. The first principle (he says) is, that the 549 doctrine of *election is founded on the same reasons and governed by the same rules when applied to a widow claiming dower, as when applied to any other case. The second proposition, as applicable to all cases, is, that a person, who is entitled to any benefit under a will or other instrument, must, if he claims that benefit, abandon every right or interest the assertion of which would defeat, even partially, any of the provisions of that instrument. And applying this to the case of dower, the doctrine is, that if the testator has made such a disposition of his real estate, as that the assertion by the widow of her right to dower would prevent that disposition taking effect as the testator intended, then she must elect to abandon either her dower, or the benefit given her by the will. The third proposition is, that in no case is a person to be put to an election, unless it is clear that the provisions of the instrument, under which he is entitled to any benefit, would be, in some degree, defeated by the assertion of his other rights. And therefore, in the particular case of dower, unless it is beyond reasonable doubt that the assertion by the widow of her right to dower would prevent the giving full effect to the testator's intention, the widow shall not be put to her election. It is not enough (he continues) to say that upon the whole will it may fairly be inferred that the testator intended his widow should not have her dower; in order to compel her to elect, the court must be satisfied that there is a positive intention, either express or clearly implied, that she is to be excluded from dower. He adds, as a fourth proposition, that the intention to exclude the widow from dower must be apparent on the face of the will itself.

To the extent of the first three propositions, as I understand them, the doctrine upon the subject is the same in Virginia as in England. The fourth proposition, however, restricting the search for the 550 testator's *intentions to the face of the will (whatever may be the state of the law upon that subject in England) has been so far modified in this state by our statute and the decisions of our courts as to allow the circumstances of the testator and the relative situation of the parties to be referred to as evidence, in all enquiries touching the true interpretation of the will. Ambler & wife v. Norton, 4 Hen. & Munf. 23; Herbert and others v. Wren, 7 Cranch's R. 370.

The rule with us in respect to the admissibility of extrinsic evidence to explain a will generally, as stated by Judge Lee, in the case of Wootton v. Redd's ex'or, 12 Gratt. 205, is, that in expounding wills, "extrinsic evidence may be resorted to for the purpose of showing the situation of the testator and the state of his family and of his property at the time of making his will." And he adds, that "generally, evidence may be received, as to any facts known to the testator which may reasonably be supposed to have influenced him in the disposition of his property, and as to all the surrounding circumstances at the time of making the will."

There are dicta of English chancellors to the effect that, in order to put the wife to her election, it must appear from the will that her right to dower was present to the mind of the testator, and that his dispositions were made in reference to it, and with a purpose to exclude it. And there are expressions in the latter part of V. C. Kindersley's statement of his third proposition, which, if taken alone, would seem to countenance such an idea. But when we look to his whole statement, I think it quite clear that he meant to affirm nothing further on that head than what was said by Lord Alvanley in French v. Davies, 2 Ves. jr. R. 572, viz: that the testator must appear to have the wife's rights in mind, and mean to bar her, or that what she demands is repugnant to the disposi-551 tion. This *idea of the necessity of a presence of a wife's rights to the mind of the testator, was urged by counsel in the case of Parker v. Sowerby, 27 Eng. L. & E. R. 154, but was rejected: the chancellor observing that to raise a case of election against a wife provided for by the will, nothing more was required than that it should be apparent upon the will that the intention of the testator was to dispose of his property in a manner which was inconsistent with the right to dower.

It has been frequently said by learned judges and law writers that the implication which puts the widow to her election, must be a clear and necessary one.

Dangan, Ch., in the case of Bailey v. Boyce, 4 Strobh. Eq. R. 84, whilst stating the law very strongly in favor of the rights of widows, still thought it proper to explain what he understood and intended by a necessary implication. "There is (he s of course some latitude here as to what is a necessary implication or inference. A necessary implication or inference arising on the face of a will or deed, I apprehend, unless words have lost all certainty, means a construction the converse of which would be unreasonable, far-fetched and forced." And it is, I take it, in the sense of this definition that expressions of the kind have been usually employed.

In saying in the case of Higginbotham v. Cornwell, 8 Gratt. 83, that "the conclusion against the claim of the widow ought to be as satisfactory as if it were expressed," Judge Baldwin has, as I humbly conceive, stated the doctrine somewhat too strongly. A rule thus rigid, whilst it formed no necessary foundation for the judgment of the court in that case, would, in my opinion, come in conflict with decisions in numerous cases which have been too long and too generally recognized as precedents, to allow of dissent or doubt in respect to their authority now. There are comparatively very few of the reported 552 cases, wherein implications *of the testator's intentions have prevailed in putting the widow to her election, in which it would be truly said that the conclusion against the claim of the widow was as satisfactory as if the testator, in the very terms of the devise, had expressed an intention to exclude it. And I think it fairly results from the authorities, that whenever the inference against the widow's right is clear beyond reasonable doubt; whenever the implications against her are so strong, that, to defeat them, resort must be had to a forced, far-fetched or unreasonable construction of the will, a case is made which puts her to her election.

The case of Wiseley v. Findlay, 3 Rand. 361, is cited in the petition for the appeal as authority for the propositions, that a devise by a husband to his wife of his whole lands for years, even if expressly declared in the will to be in lieu of dower, would not, though she took the lands under the will, be such a jointure as could bar her right of dower. And that no provision made for her in her husband's will, in personal estate, though accepted, can bar a widow of her dower in his real estate. On a reference to the case it will be seen that no such propositions were decided by the court; though it is true that dicta to that effect were made by Judge Green in the course of his opinion. Judge Tucker, in vol. 1 of his Commentaries, at p. 74-5, remarks at some length on the case of Wiseley v. Findlay; and at p. 75, he says, "It is very certain that in that case, the provision being by will, it was no absolute bar, if the wife chose to renounce it; which she might have done, notwithstanding more than a year had elapsed from her husband's death; as the act requiring such prompt renunciation did not apply to her dower right. Still we are not precluded, I presume, by the opinion of the court in that case, from giving to the act a construction which would make even personalty a bar to dower, when properly settled by way 553 *of jointure. Thus, if before marriage a woman of full age enters into articles with her intended husband, by which ten thousand dollars in stock are settled upon her in lieu of dower, I should have no doubt it would operate an absolute bar under the broad terms of our act, unless indeed they shall be narrowed down by judicial legislation. See Ambler v. Norton, 4 Hen. & Munf. 23. And so, though a devise of ten thousand dollars either expressly or by averment in lieu of dower, is no absolute bar (since the wife is not bound by the will of her husband), yet it will so far operate as a jointure under the act, that she will be compelled to make her election and relinquish either the dower or the bequest." At p. 75-6, he observes further, "To constitute the jointure an absolute bar, the act also requires that it must take effect immediately on the husband's death, continue during her own life, and be determinable only by such acts as will forfeit her dower at common law. Yet observe, if it wants these requisites, the widow cannot take both. If she demands her dower, the estate conveyed in lieu of it shall cease." The first of the propositions thus stated by Judge Tucker, has in effect been recently decided by this court in the case of Findley's ex'ors v. Findley, 11 Gratt. 434; on which a wife was held to be barred by an agreement in contemplation of marriage, wherein the husband covenanted and bound himself, his heirs, &c. to pay her, if she survived him, certain sums of money, to be received by her in bar of, and in full compensation for her dower. The other propositions stated by him are, I think, equally just and correct. The question in such cases, whether the wife shall be put to her election, does not turn on the character of the estate, as whether real or personal, in which the provision is made for her. The true enquiries are, Is it manifest that the provision was intended to be in lieu of dower? Or, Is it clear that the claim of dower conflicts with 554 *the devise to another, of the subject in which the dower is claimed? As has been already intimated, however, whilst the general principles underlying questions of the kind, can no longer be regarded as subjects of serious controversy, yet, in the application of the principles to the cases, much conflict in the decisions will be found to exist. Not unfrequently, cases in which the implications of the testator's intention to exclude the claim of dower have been adjudged sufficiently strong to put the widow to her election, are found to be distinguished from others where the opposite result has been arrived at, by features of little mark or prominence. And in some classes of cases, the conflict of decisions is direct, the opposing judgments growing out of the different degrees of weight allowed by different judges to facts of the same or a like character. Thus, in numerous cases it has been decided, and may be regarded as clearly settled by the English decisions, that when a testator merely devises all of his lands to be sold and a part of the proceeds to be paid to his wife; or where, after making bequests or devises to his wife, he devises the residue of his estate or the balance of his lands to others; no such implication arises of an intention on the part of the testator to exclude the widow's claim to dower in such residue or balance of the real estate, as will put her to her election. It is said that the claim to dower does not, in either of such cases, come plainly in conflict with the intentions of the testator in respect to other objects of his bounty; that except where he has plainly indicated a purpose to do so, it is not to be presumed that he has designed to give away rights that do not belong to him; that such devises do not in terms import any thing more than all of the testator's interest in the subjects given.

555 Brown. C. C. 347, *Lord Thurlow met the argument, that by the devise of "all my estates," the testator meant to exclude the claim of the widow, with something of irony in the remark—"Because the testator gives all his property to the trustees, I am to gather from his having given all he has, that he has given that which he had not."

In the case of Gibson v. Gibson, already cited, V. C. Kindersley, after citing the foregoing observation, pursues the answer to arguments of a like character, with a few additional pointed remarks. "When it is recollected (he says) that it is only because the lands are his that the wife is entitled to dower out of them at all, it would be strange if his describing them as his should have the effect of excluding her from her right to dower. She is entitled to dower only because the lands are his; and the argument is, that because he describes them as his he meant to deprive her of dower." Still, upon the question whether the widow is put to her election by an annuity payable out of all the testator's estates or lands, the decisions have not been uniform. There is probably a preponderance against putting her to an election in such cases; but there are many well considered decisions the other way. And yet it is not easy to perceive any material difference, in the reasoning applicable to such cases, from that which was received as so satisfactory in the class of cases first mentioned.

And yet again, in cases where the testator has devised all his estates, or all his lands, or the residue of his estates or lands, to trustees, with power to lease, the English chancery court, after much discussion and some conflict of decisions, seems now to have come to the settled conclusion that the wife, in such cases, if provided for to any extent by the will, must make her election. Kindersley, V. C., in the case of Parker v. Sowerby, 21 Eng. L. & E. R. 39, said, that there was a series of cases which decide that although a devise of 556 *all a testator's estates is no proof that the testator did not mean his wife to enjoy dower also, inasmuch as all his estates meant only what was his own to devise, yet a devise upon trust to manage a farm, or the giving a power to lease lands, had been considered indicative of an intention to deprive the widow of her rights, which, in the absence of such a power or trust, she would be entitled to claim. The cases on this subject (he said) were too numerous and uniform, and their authority too high to allow him to hold, at the present day, that the principles to be deduced from them were not the established law. The case before him, he further observed, came within the authority which had been cited, subject, however, to the observation, that the right to dower arose out of a particular freehold estate, while the benefit the widow received was out of the personal estate, and from an annuity charged on an estate different from that out of which dower was claimed. Now, the rule (he said) was this: "If a testator devises any portion of his real estate in such a manner that the claim of dower would defeat that intention, then the widow is put to her election, if there were even the slightest benefit—a gold watch for instance—conferred upon her by the same instrument." And his decree was in accordance with the foregoing views.

In the case, however, of Warbutton v. Warbutton, 23 Eng. L. & E. R. 415, coming on the year after (1854), before Stuart, V. C., he made a directly opposite decree. In the course of his opinion he said, that the power of leasing might be a strong circumstance, but that it was not enough to put the widow to an election: and he endeavored to show, that in Parker v. Sowerby, the opinion and decree had proceeded from a misapprehension of the decisions on which they were founded. This decree in Warbutton v. Warbutton induced the defeated party in the case of Parker v.
557 Sowerby *to take an appeal in that case. In the Court of appeals, consisting of the Lord Chancellor Cranworth and Vice Chancellors Turner and Knight Bruce, the subject was fully discussed, and the entire line of authorities examined and reviewed. The views of V. C. Kindersley were fully sustained, and his decree affirmed by a unanimous court.

There is still, however, a further class of cases, which, as I conceive, bears more directly on the one before us than any to which reference has yet been made. In the case of Miall v. Brain, 4 Madd. R. 68, where the testator devised his estate to trustees, with directions to permit his daughter to use, occupy and enjoy a certain freehold house for her life. The vice chancellor held, that the testator contemplated for his daughter the personal use, occupation and enjoyment of the house, which was inconsistent with the widow's right to dower therein. And the widow was put to her election.

A like decree was made in the case of Butcher & wife v. Kemp, 5 Madd. R. 61.

The facts of the case are stated with sufficient detail, in the opinion of the vice chancellor, to show its application to this. "The testator (he said) directs that his trustees shall stand possessed of the farm, which he describes as containing about one hundred and thirty-six acres, during the minority of his daughter, upon trust to carry on the business thereof, or to let the same upon lease for her benefit, as they should think best; and for that purpose, gives them all his stocks, cattle and implements on the farm. The question is, whether the testator can be considered as speaking of his interest in the farm subject to his widow's claim of dower. His plain intention is, that his trustees should, for the benefit of his daughter, have authority to continue his business in the entire farm which he himself occupied, consisting of about one hundred and thirty-six 558 acres; and *this intention must be disappointed, if the widow could have assigned to her a third part of this land." Like views prevailed in the case of Roadley v. Dixon, 3 Cond. Eng. Ch. R. 356. The analogy between that case and the one under consideration, will be seen in the following brief extract from the opinion of the lord chancellor: "After devising his real estate generally, the testator adds, 'And upon further trust, that they my said trustees do and shall, during the minority of my said son, occupy and manage the farm now in my own possession, employing a proper person as bailiff to superintend the same.' The farm in the testator's own possession was the farm at Searby; and it formed a very considerable portion of the whole of the property which he held in Searby. It was the intention of the testator, therefore, that that farm at Searby should be occupied and managed by his trustees, and that they should take possession and hold possession of it. To assign that part of the property for dower, setting it out by metes and bounds, would be inconsistent with such an intention."

The case of Birmingham v. Kirwan, 2 Sch. & Lef. 444, to the extent of the opinion and decision respecting the house and "demesne of 170 acres," in which dower was claimed, may be ranged in the same class of cases. See also Taylor v. Taylor, 20 Eng. Ch. R. 727; and Lowes v. Lowes, 26 Eng. Ch. R. 501.

Testing this case by the foregoing precedents, I do not think that the claim of the widow, to its whole extent, can be justly sustained. The directions in the second and third clauses of the will, that the widow shall retain possession of the farm for the space of five years after the testator's death, and manage it in the best possible manner: that the family, including the testator's mother, shall be all kept together and maintained and supported from the proceeds of the farm: that the education of the children shall be 559 *attended to and paid for out of said proceeds: and that, in order that the widow shall have the means of thus conducting the farm, she shall receive and retain out of the personal estate the negro Dick and other personal property, to the amount of five hundred dollars in value, all tend to show that the testator intended that the farm in its entirety should be held by the widow, and enjoyed by her and the family as a home: that the farm as one entire undivided concern should be cultivated, controlled and managed by her; and that the proceeds of the whole of it should constitute a fund in her hands to be by her appropriated to the support of herself and the family, and the education of the children. When with these intrinsic evidences of intention we couple the facts that the children were ten in number, and several of them of tender years, and that the farm was a small one, the implication of the testator's intention to exclude dower in the farm during the five years and until the executor, in the exercise of his discretion, should proceed to a sale, becomes so strong as to admit of no reasonable doubt. We may I think safely conclude (as was said by the chancellor in Birmingham v. Kerwan), in respect to "the house and demesne" in that case, that the testator intended the widow to retain possession of the whole farm "under a right created by the will, and not part of it, under a right which she had previously had, and part under the will." She could not, during the space of time above mentioned, have taken a third of the farm to her own exclusive use, without breaking in upon a scheme in which others had, under the will, a beneficial interest. The children had an interest, an essential interest, in the proceeds of the farm. Their support, maintenance and education are not referred to, and treated, by the testator merely as motives or inducements 560 leading to the devise to the *widow, but are coupled with it as a trust and imposed upon it as a charge.

No doubt or cloud is thrown over the indications of the testator's intentions, to be collected from the second and third clauses of the will, by the language which he has employed, in the fourth clause, in directing the sale of the real estate. If this direction, and the further direction to pay the widow one thousand dollars out of the proceeds of the sale, constituted the only provisions in which the testator set forth the position which he intended her to occupy in respect to his real estate, the rights which he wished her to have therein after his death, there would be room to argue that the case came within the influence of the first class of decisions to which reference has been had. In such a state of things, it might be said that the expression, "my executor is vested with full power and authority to dispose of all my real estate in fee simple, in as full and large a manner in every respect as I could myself do if living," did not show a clear purpose to bar the widow of her dower, inasmuch as the testator, "if living," would have no "power or authority" to dispose of her right thereto; and that hence no conflict could arise from the widow's claiming both her dower and the thousand dollars. But, as we have seen, such is not the case. And there is no rule which requires us to cull out from the will the expressions most favorable to the pretensions of the widow, and, rejecting the explanations furnished by other portions of the will, to treat such expressions as the controlling indications of the testator's intentions. The provisions which the testator has made for his wife and children out of the products of his real estate for the five years after his death, and out of the proceeds of the sale thereof after the expiration of that period, are closely connected parts of one entire 561 scheme. And when we *read those provisions in the connection in which they were written, and in the light of the circumstances by which the testator was surrounded; when we see that the farm on which he lived constituted the whole of his real estate; that the provision which he makes for his widow out of it is liberal, having regard to its value; and that the shares which the children are to receive respectively out of the proceeds of the sale, after the payment of the one thousand dollars to the widow, constitute, at best, but very scanty provisions for their support and education and outfit; the ambiguity of expression in the clause in question is cleared away, and we are led to a conclusion, satisfactory beyond all reasonable doubt, that the testator intended his wife to have no other rights in the subject than those conferred upon her by the will.

I concur therefore in the opinion of the Circuit court, that the widow is not entitled to dower in the land, and at the same time to the legacy of one thousand dollars given her by her husband's will out of the proceeds of the sale of the land. But I do not think she has done any thing which deprives her of the right to make her election now. Her retaining possession of the farm after her husband's death, does not of itself furnish conclusive evidence of her having elected to accept the provisions made for her by the will. Her possession down to the period of the advertisement of the farm for sale by the executor was, unexplained, conduct of an equivocal character, susceptible of reference, either to her rights as the widow of the testator, or to rights conferred upon her by his will. No state of things has grown out of her action in the matter, to disturb which now, would work wrong or injury to others. It is true, that in her bill she discloses the fact that in retaining possession she had been acting under her husband's will, but under her husband's will, as she construed and under-562 stood it. She states in the *bill, that had she not conceived herself entitled under the will to retain the farm to enable her to raise the children, she would have renounced the will, and claimed that share of her husband's estate to which she would have been entitled by law. It is true we have already expressed our concurrence with the judge of the Circuit court in the opinion that the construction of the will for which she contends is not the true one. But we have no reason for supposing that she did not in fact interpret the will as she says she did; or that she did not in good faith shape her conduct by such interpretation. I think we shall act in thorough accordance with the decisions on the subject, in holding that the widow has not yet made an irrevocable election. See Streatfield v. Streatfield, Leading Cases in Eq. 65 Law Lib., notes at p. 271, 289; Upshaw v. Upshaw, 2 Hen. & Munf. 381, and Taylor v. Browne, 2 Leigh 419.

Upon the whole, I am of the opinion to reverse the decree, and remand the cause for further proceedings in accordance with the principles herein declared, and with liberty to Mrs. Dixon to make her election beween her dower in the land and the legacy of one thousand dollars, which the executor is directed to pay her out of the proceeds of the real estate.

563 Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co. v. Gallahue's Adm'rs.

July Term, 1858, Lewisburg.

Attachment—Garnishment—Case at Bar.*—The estimates of work done by a contractor for a railroad company, are made up to the 20th of each month, when they are considered due, though not paid for some days afterwards. As the price of the work done by the contractor after the 20th may be forfeited to the company for several causes, before the 20th of the next month, no debt is due from the company to the contractor until the 20th arrives: and therefore an attachment being served on the company on the 14th of the month, there is nothing then in its hands due to the contractor which may be attached, though in fact no forfeiture occurs, and on the following 20th of the month the amount of the estimate may be due.†

This is the sequel of the case reported 12 Gratt. 655. When the cause went back the parties agreed the facts. From this it appears, that the course of business in respect to the contracts between the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company and the defendants in the action, P. and F. C. Crowley, was for the company through its engineers to make the monthly estimates of work done on the 20th day of each month, and payments upon these estimates were 564 made *about the 10th of the next month. The estimates made on the 20th of December 1851 were paid by the company prior to the service of the attachment; which was served on the 14th of January 1852. The estimates made on the 20th of January 1852 were also paid by the company, but after the service of the attachment, and the amount of work done by P. and F. C. Crowley between the 20th of December 1851 and the 14th of January 1852, and which was embraced in the estimates of the 20th of January, after deducting one-fifth according to the terms of the contract, was two thousand one hundred and fifty dollars. The contracts under which the work was done, were set out at length; but the provisions of them which affect this case are stated by Judge Samuels in his opinion.

It was agreed that if the work done between the 20th of December 1851 and the 14th of January 1852, was liable to the attachment; or if the attachment was a lien upon the earnings of said Crowleys, under said contracts up to the end of two months subsequent to the 14th of January 1852, there should be a judgment for the whole amount of the plaintiffs' debt. But if the attachment did not operate as a lien upon the earnings of said Crowleys between the 20th of December and 14th of January, nor upon any earnings subsequent to the 14th of January, then the judgment in favor of the plaintiffs should be for three hundred and nine dollars and seventy-six cents, the amount admitted in the answer of the company, but with costs to the company.

Upon this agreed state of facts the court rendered a judgment against the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Company for one thousand and sixty-six dollars and seventy-nine cents, and interest, the whole amount of the plaintiffs' claim. Whereupon the company applied to this court for a supersedeas; which was allowed.

SAMUELS, J. When this case was formerly before the court, it was decided, 12 Gratt. 655, that the plaintiff in error was such a party as might be a garnishee under process of attachment.

It is alleged by the plaintiff's counsel in this court, that the Circuit court erred at its June term 1857, and also at a previous term, in refusing leave to the garnishee to file an amended answer to the attachment. The decisions of this court have settled the practice that a party alleging error in the ruling of a Circuit court, must show the error on the face of the record; that the court here will intend that the Circuit court decided correctly, unless the contrary appears. In our case the record shows the fact that at some term prior to that of June 1857 the leave had been refused; but why the leave was asked, or what support was offered to sustain the application, is not shown. At June term 1857, when leave was again asked and refused, the cause was ready for trial; and if an amended answer had been received, it would have presented a new issue, and might have caused a delay of the trial. In this state of the case, it was incumbent on the plaintiff to have shown an excuse for its delay in asking leave; and this was not done nor attempted to be done. It is unnecessary, however, for any purpose in this case, to decide whether the amended answers should have been filed, inasmuch as the parties have themselves agreed the facts of the whole case, thereby dispensing with the necessity for an answer, issue, or trial by jury. The case, as it now stands, presents only a question of law as to the time and state of facts at and under which the garnishee became liable, if liable at all, to the attaching creditor, and the amount of that liability.

566 *The parties, in their agreement of facts, set out at length the contract between Crowley (the defendant in the attachment) and the garnishee (the plaintiff here). This contract, amongst other things, provides in substance that if Crowley should not well and truly from time to time comply with and perform all the terms therein before stated and stipulated, on his part, in manner and form and within the time thereinbefore mentioned; or in case it should appear to the chief engineer that the work did not progress with sufficient speed; or in case of interference with said work by legal proceedings, the chief engineer should have power to annul the contract, if he saw fit to do so; of which three days' notice in writing should be given to Crowley, when the agreements on the part of the company, and every clause thereof, should become null and void; and the unpaid part of the value of the work done should be forfeited by the said Crowley to the use of the company. The parties further agree, that if the value of work between December 20th, 1851, and January 20th, 1852, under the contracts, is liable to the attachment, then the attaching creditor should recover of the garnishee the full amount of their debt, interest and costs: so in regard to work done to the end of two months subsequent to 14th January 1852. But if the attachment did not operate as a lien upon the earnings between 20th December 1851 and January 14, 1852, or upon earnings after January 14, 1852, then the judgment in favor of the attaching creditor should be rendered for three hundred and nine dollars and seventy-six cents, but with costs in favor of the garnishee.

In the case of the Baltimore and Ohio R. R. Co. v. McCullough & Co., 12 Gratt. 595, this court affirmed the general principle that the terms of a contract, such as that in our case, must be complied with before a debt can arise out of it. In that case, the terms that a release should be ex-

567 ecuted cotemporaneously with *the receipt of money estimated as having been earned, not having been complied with, the court held that the contractor himself, or his creditors standing in his place, could not enforce payment of the money. In our case, the performance of labor by Crowley for the garnishee, after 20th December 1851, and before 14th January 1852, did not of itself put the garnishee in the condition of debtor to Crowley; for by the terms of the contract, if Crowley should not well and truly, from time to time, comply with and perform all the terms thereinbefore stated and stipulated, on his part, in manner and form, and within the time therein mentioned; or in case it should appear to the chief engineer that the work did not progress with sufficient speed; or in case of interference with said work by legal proceedings, the chief engineer should have power to annul the contract, if he saw fit to do so, of which three days' notice in writing should be given to Crowley, when the agreements on the part of the company, and every clause thereof, should become null and void, and the unpaid part of the value of the work done should be forfeited by Crowley to the use of the company. Thus, at the time of service of the attachment, 14th January 1852, it was uncertain and dependent upon future events, whether any amount whatever would be due for labor performed between 20th December and 14th January; nor is the case changed by the fact that the contract continued in force and was complied with by Crowley, and that on the 20th January the garnishee became indebted in the amount estimated as due for labor from 20th December to 20th January. This debt was of the latter date only; it cannot be divided into parcels, and one parcel held to be due as of the 14th, and the other of the 20th January; the debt was entire, and was wholly dependent upon events which could not be known before 20th January. The same reasons show 568 that Crowley's *earnings, at any time after 20th January, could not create a debt as of the 14th January, the time of serving process.

The statute, Code of 1849, ch. 151, § 1, p. 600, makes "debts due" the subject of attachment; § 7 makes service by copy on a party "indebted to the defendant," a sufficient service; § 9 directs the officer to return with the attachment the names of persons "owing debts to the defendant;" § 11 prescribes the mode of proceeding under attachments in equity, whereby "debts due or to become due" to the defendant, are made the subject of attachment, to be executed in the same manner and to have the same effect as at law; § 12 creates a lien on attached effects, which lien under the obvious construction of the statute is the same, whether created under process of law or equity. This lien can affect only such subjects as exist when the attachment is levied or served; it is impossible to conceive the existence of a lien without a subject. The judgment or decree of the court satisfies the lien by applying the subject in the hands of the garnishee to the debt due the attaching creditor. The sections of the statute above referred to subject a "debt" to process of attachment; such debt may be due and payable at once, or it may be due and payable at a future time; but to constitute a debt, there must be a time of payment. It has been said, however, that § 17 extends the operation of the attachment to a subsequent time, and to debts not in existence at the time of levying or serving the attachments, but subsequently coming into being. This construction seems to be at war with the general principles of law regulating the liability of property to pay debts; if this be a case of the kind, it is perhaps the only case in which a subject is bound by process not levied or leviable on it, and this after the return day of the process. Drake on Attachment, ch. 26, § 555 to 559, inclusive.

569 *In this, a common law case, we can decide only according to the law governing common law courts: if a different rule shall prevail in chancery courts, it must be so decided in a case before such court.

I am of opinion to reverse the judgment of the Circuit court with costs, and to enter judgment against the plaintiff, the garnishee, for three hundred and nine dollars and seventy-six cents, the amount confessed to be due to Crowley, but with costs of the Circuit court to the plaintiff.

570 *McCann v. The Commonwealth.

July Term, 1857, Lewisburg.

(Absent LEE, J.)

Criminal Law—Discharge by Examining Court—Effect on Subsequent Prosecution for Same Offence.*—A discharge by an examining court, of a prisoner committed on a charge of felony, is not a bar to another prosecution for the same offence, except when the record shows that the discharge was upon an examination of the facts charged.†

This was an indictment in the Circuit court of Harrison county, against William M. McCann for a felonious and malicious assault upon Cyrus Ross with stones, with intent to maim, disfigure, disable and kill. There were three counts in the indictment, but they were substantially the same.

*See principal case cited in Ward v. Reasor, 98 Va. 404, 36 S. E. Rep. 470.

†Code, ch. 205, § 11, p. 765. "If the court in which a person is examined as aforesaid, discharge him, he shall not thereafter be questioned or tried for the same offence."

When the prisoner was set to the bar, he moved the court to quash the indictment, on the ground that he had not been examined for the offence charged therein. This motion the court overruled; and upon comparing the record of the trial before the examining court with the indictment, there does not seem to have been any ground for the motion.

The prisoner then pleaded a discharge by the examining court; to which the attorney for the commonwealth replied, "nul tiel record:" and so the court held. The record produced showed that the prisoner had been brought before the County court for examination upon the same charge, in August 1855, and the case was regularly continued from term to term, until the October term; when the entry on the record is, 571 *"Ordered that this case be dismissed." This entry bears date the 8th of October; and on the 11th of the same month he was again arrested and committed by a justice for examination; and at the November term of the County court, he was examined and sent on for trial to the Circuit court; he having set up the former dismissal of his case, which was overruled.

On the trial the jury found the prisoner not guilty of the felony charged in the indictment; but guilty of an assault and battery on said Cyrus Ross; and they assessed his fine at one hundred dollars. And thereupon the court rendered a judgment against him for the fine and the costs of prosecution; and for twelve days' imprisonment in the county jail; and required him to find security in the penalty of one thousand dollars to keep the peace and be of good behavior for one year. From this judgment McCann applied to this court for a writ of error; which was allowed.

Robert Johnston, for the appellant.
The Attorney General, for the commonwealth.

DANIEL, J. The first bill of exceptions founded on the refusal of the Circuit court to quash the indictment, because there had been no sufficient examination of the accused by an examining court, is not mentioned either in his petition or in the written argument of his counsel. I have, however, carefully looked to the evidence adduced upon the hearing of the motion, and I have been wholly unable to discover any ground for the allegation of such insufficiency. The examination seems to have been duly heard at a regular term of the County court, the term at which the accused was by his recognizance required to appear. There seems to be an exact correspondence between the certificate of the justice who admitted the accused to bail and the record of 572 the examination by the County *court in respect to the nature of the offence; which is set out in each of them in plain, sufficient and unambiguous terms. And whilst the indictment contains three counts, yet they each charge the same felony; a felony identical with that for which the accused was examined, and remanded to the Circuit court for trial.

The true ground on which the accused rested his defence in the Circuit court, and on which he seeks here to reverse the action of that court, is, doubtless, that presented in his two special pleas. In each of these pleas he seeks to set up the order made by the examining court in October 1855, as a discharge—a discharge exempting him from all liability to be thereafter questioned or tried for the same offence. The order in question is briefly as follows: "Ordered, that this case be dismissed."

It is conceded that the effect of the order turns upon the true construction of the 11th section of chapter 205 of the Code of 1849, which declares, that "if the court in which a person is examined as aforesaid, discharge him, he shall not thereafter be questioned or tried for the same offence."

Reading this section by itself, the construction would seem to be a natural, if not a necessary one, that the discharge therein mentioned is a discharge consequent upon an examination of the prisoner by the court. And when we connect it with the preceding provisions of the chapter, the construction appears still more obvious. The sections previous to the 6th having declared in what cases examinations are to be had, how the courts which are to make such examinations are to be composed, &c., that section provides, that "upon such examination, if it appear to the court that there is not probable cause for charging the accused with the offence, he shall be discharged." Adopting the course pursued by the attorney general, in his printed argument, of combining the two sections (the 573 *6th and 11th) and reading them as one, and throwing out of view all previous legislation on the subject, it would seem impossible to escape his conclusion, that the discharge mentioned in the one is identical with that mentioned in the other of these sections; and that no discharge can, under the provisions of the 11th section, be relied on as a bar to subsequent question or trial, except such a discharge as is adjuged, by the court, upon an examination, in which it has been made to appear that there is not probable cause for charging the accused with the offence.

The counsel for the accused, however, refers to the 3d section of the act of 1804, in which the legislature for the first time declared the effect of a discharge by the examining court, on a subsequent prosecution for the same offence. And he calls our attention more particularly to that portion of the section in which the court is mentioned as "the court of the county or corporation in which the offence is or may be examinable." Upon the words which I have italicised he founds the argument that, under the acts of 1804 and 1819 (in both of which the same language is used), the force of a discharge, as a bar to further prosecution, was in no wise dependent on the fact of its being the result of an examination: that the fact of its being pronounced by a court of competent authority, a court having the right to examine the accused, constituted all that was essential to the validity of the discharge as a bar. And he contends that the revisors, in employing the words, "is examined," in place of the words, "is or may be examinable," did not mean to effect any change in the law in this particular; and that the words, "the court in which a person is examined as aforesaid," are merely intended to designate the court whose discharge is a bar; and do not qualify the discharge further than to show what court may make it, viz: the County court, at its regular or 574 *special session, organized as an examining court, with five justices on the bench, &c.

It cannot be denied that the particular words referred to in the act of 1804, do countenance the construction of that act, contended for by the counsel for the accused. But on looking to the whole of the 3d section of the act and the other parts of the act to which it refers, it becomes, I think, quite obvious that such is not the true construction. The language of the section is, "If any person charged with any crime or offence against the commonwealth, shall be acquitted or discharged from further prosecution by the court of the county or corporation in which the offence is or may be examinable, he or she shall not thereafter be examined, questioned or tried for the same crime or offence, but may plead such acquittal or discharge in bar of any other or further examination or trial for the same crime or offence; any law, custom, usage or opinion to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding." 2 Rev. Code (1808), p. 38.

The office of this section is not to declare in what cases the party is to be discharged; but to declare the effect of the discharge on a subsequent prosecution for the same offence. The power to discharge is conferred by the first section; and when we look to that we see that a court is to be held "for the examination of the fact, which court, consisting of five members at the least, shall consider whether, as the case may appear to them, the prisoner may be discharged from further prosecution, or may be tried in the county or corporation or in the district court, &c." The power to discharge is no where else mentioned in the act. Is it not then a necessary inference that when in the third section the legislature attached to an acquittal or discharge the effect of a bar, they had in contemplation no other discharge than a discharge from further prosecution, pronounced by the court upon an examination of the 575 *fact and a consideration of the case? Why declare that a discharge may be pleaded in bar of any other or further examination or trial, if such discharge had not resulted from a previous examination or trial?

The counsel for the accused, however, in further support of his view, refers us to the fifth section of chapter 205 of the Code, regulating the power of the examining court over the subject of adjournment; in which the court is prohibited from adjourning the examination, except on the motion of the accused, &c., "beyond the third regular term after the examination was ordered." And assuming that the discharge of a prisoner from further prosecution would be the result of a continuance of the case (except under the circumstances provided for), "beyond the third term," he says that here is an instance of final discharge without examination, and consequently that the construction which would limit the bar sanctioned by the eleventh section to the single case of a discharge upon an examination, must be unsound, inasmuch as no good reason can be assigned why the legislature should prohibit further prosecution in the one instance of final discharge, and not in the other. And hence he concludes that the term "discharge" cannot be restricted in its meaning, by referring it to the 6th section, but must be taken in its largest sense, embracing any discharge whatever by the examining court.

In the reply by the attorney general to this assumption, there seems to me to be much force. He refers us to section 36 of chapter 208, in which it is provided, "that every person charged with felony, and remanded to a superior court for trial, shall be forever discharged from prosecution for the offence, if there be three regular terms of such court after his examination, without a trial, unless the failure to try him" results from some of the causes there mentioned. And he argues, that as the legislature have thought it necessary to 576 attach, *in express terms, to the delays in the superior court the consequences of a discharge from further prosecution, the fair conclusion from their silence in respect to such consequences as flowing from the prohibited delays in the examining court, is, that they did not mean to attach to the latter the same or like consequences.

This view derives support from the fact, that in the act of 1804 the examining court was restricted in its power to adjourn to a period not longer than three days, except on the application of the prisoner, and then for not more than ten days from the day of adjournment.

It is difficult to suppose that in 1804 the legislature intended that an irregular adjournment by the justices occasioning a delay longer, by a day or two, than that allowed by the act, should operate the grave result of a final discharge of the accused. And though the legislature in all the subsequent acts have extended the period to which the court may adjourn, yet, as they have still remained silent as to what shall be the effect of an adjournment to a period more distant than that allowed by the law, there arises a strong inference that these provisions, with respect to adjournments by the examining courts, are simply directory; and that a departure from them does not result in the final discharge of persons accused.

As to this question, however, I do not deem it necessary to express a definitive opinion. Its decision is not, I think, material in its bearing on the argument under consideration. For if it be conceded (as contended for by the counsel for the accused) that a continuance for more than three terms of the County court would result in a final discharge of the party accused, such a discharge would be an act of the law, and not the result of a judgment pronounced by the examining court, and would 577 plainly stand outside of *the provisions of the 11th section of chapter 205, construed even as the counsel contends it ought to be. For according to his construction, a discharge, to avail the accused as a bar, must yet be a discharge by a court in which the offence is examinable, a court lawfully held, &c.; whereas the discharge in the case supposed would be the result flowing from the fact that there was no longer any court in which the offence could be legally examined. Upon the supposition that the law intends a discharge to flow from a continuance beyond the third term, a prisoner, if still held in custody after the expiration of such term, would be illegally detained, and would be discharged upon a habeas corpus. Green's Case, 1 Rob. R. 731. And if the prisoner should not avail himself of the writ, he might doubtless, if sent on by a County court subsequently held, have the indictment quashed, on the ground that he had not been examined by a competent court. Or if a court held subsequent to the third term, by adjournment should discharge a prisoner on the ground that it had no jurisdiction of the case, and the prisoner being subsequently prosecuted, should, instead of resorting to other modes of relief, wait until he was indicted, and then seek to rely on a plea of such discharge, it is obvious, for the reasons already stated, that the plea, if received, would be allowed, not under the 11th section, but by virtue of some other law: such discharge having been pronounced not by a court in which the offence was examined or was examinable, but by a court having no legal capacity or power to proceed with the examination.

The history of the circumstances and reasons which led to the adoption of the provisions of the 3d section of the act of 1804, furnishes strong support in aid of these views. In Myers' Case, 1 Va. Cas. 188, it is stated by Judge White, as also by two of the distinguished counsel of the prisoner (Messrs. Tazewell and 578 *Taylor), that the passage of this section was probably caused by the expression of an opinion by Judge Tucker, in his notes on Blackstone's Commentaries, to the effect that an acquittal by an examining court did not in any case constitute a bar to further prosecution. And on a reference to the 5th volume of his work, p. 335 (in notes), it will be seen that the judge there uses the following language: "There have been decisions to the effect that if a person brought before an examining court, and upon such examination be discharged by that court, such discharge may be pleaded as an acquittal;" and he then proceeds to express the opinion that such was not the case, and founds his opinion mainly on the idea that acquittal was the legal converse of conviction; and as the examining court had no power to convict, so neither had they, in the absence of an express provision conferring it, the power to render such a discharge as could be pleaded as a bar to a subsequent prosecution.

It is thus apparent that the evil was, that doubts existed whether a regular discharge upon an examination by the examining courts had the force of an acquittal, and it was to remedy this evil and to remove these doubts, that the 3d section of the act of 1804 was passed.

And on looking into the course of legislation in the interval between 1804 and 1849, I can see nothing calculated to reflect doubt on the construction of the law on this subject, as it now stands.

In 1819, as has been already stated, the 3d section of the act of 1804 was re-enacted without alteration; and no change was made in the law in this regard till the revision of the criminal laws in 1847-8. In the 3d section of the chapter on examining courts (Sess. Acts 1847-8, p. 139), the power to discharge is conferred in the following terms: "If it shall appear to the court, on the whole examination, that no offence 579 *has been committed, or that there is not probable cause for charging the person with the offence, he shall be discharged." And the effect of a discharge is declared in the 8th section as follows: "If any person shall be discharged by the County or Corporation court in which his offence is examinable, he shall not thereafter be questioned or tried for the same offence, except on indictment found within twelve months thereafter; in which case, no other examination shall be necessary." It is evident that in the 3d section of this chapter the word "discharged" is used as the equivalent of the words "discharged from further prosecution," employed in the corresponding part of the act of 1804; and it is, I think, equally evident that it is used in the 8th section in the like sense, and is substituted for the words "acquitted or discharged from further prosecution," employed in the 3d section of the act of 1804. And the only material difference between the 8th section of the law of 1847-8 and the 3d section of the act of 1804, contemplated by the legislature, is, I think, that the former allows of a prosecution by indictment after a discharge by the examining court. Such evidently was the view of the matter taken by the revisors, in the notes accompanying their report to the legislature.

The 11th section of the chapter on "examining courts," as reported by them, was as follows: "If the court in which a prisoner is examined as aforesaid, discharge him, he shall not thereafter be examined, questioned or tried for the same offence, unless new evidence which is material, be discovered; in which case, he may again be prosecuted within one year from the time of such discharge, but not after." And in assigning their reasons for recommending the adoption of this section in place of the 8th section of the law of 1847-8, they say, "When, after full examination by a *court, the prisoner is discharged for want of proof of even probable cause for a trial, it is thought hard that he should be yet liable to be taken up and indicted on the same evidence, without examination." They therefore proposed to modify the law of 1847-8, so as to make the liability of a party discharged by the examining court, to be again prosecuted for the same offence, dependent on the discovery of new and material evidence. The legislature, however, refused to allow of a subsequent prosecution, either as provided for in the law of 1847-8, or as recommended by the revisors, but adopted the first part of the section reported by them, after striking out the provision in respect to a subsequent prosecution, on the discovery of new evidence. They thus, I think, restored the law substantially to the footing on which it stood by the act of 1804; and I feel satisfied that the effect of the section in question is to attribute the qualities of a legal bar to such a discharge by an examining court, only, as may be made by the court upon examination.

It is incumbent on the accused, therefore, to show that the order on which he relies in support of his pleas of former acquittal, is substantially a discharge upon examination. It may be conceded, that in view of the loose and hurried manner in which the proceedings in the County courts are often recorded, it would be harsh in the court to require that the record exhibited by the accused should set out the fact of his acquittal, with the clearness and precision of language that would be looked for in the orders of a court whose proceedings are recorded in extenso. Still, the record which he vouches, must be of such a character as to prove, with reasonable certainty at least, the fact which it is offered to establish. The words of the order must be at least such as (of their own sense, or by means of reference to the context) to be capable *without the aid of strained and unnatural inferences, of certifying the fact that the discharge relied on was the result of an examination.

Applying this test to the order in question, it fails, I think, to show the fact for which it is vouched. The words of the order, so far from being appropriate to convey the idea of trial and acquittal, have had a definition affixed to them, by judicial decisions and analogous cases, importing a cessation of the proceedings without any examination whatever of the cause upon its merits. Lindsay v. The Commonwealth, 2 Va. Cas. 345; Wortham v. The Commonwealth, 5 Rand. 669. And there is nothing on the face of the proceedings with which the words of the order can be connected, so as to be made capable of showing that they were used for the purpose of indicating a discharge of the accused upon examination.

As this view, if concurred in (as I understand it is, by a majority of the court), results in an affirmance of the judgment, I deem it unnecessary to express any opinion as to the other question discussed by the attorney general.

MONCURE and SAMUELS, Js., concurred in the opinion of Daniel, J.

ALLEN, P., concurred in the result.

582 *Gibboney v. The Commonwealth.

July Term, 1857, Lewisburg.

(Absent LEE, J.)

Gaming—Indictment—Proof.*—An indictment for playing at cards at a public place, may be sustained by proof that the party bet at faro at the time and place stated in the indictment.†

This was an indictment in the Circuit court of Wythe county against Robert Gibboney for unlawfully playing at cards at the hotel of Charles Yancey, said hotel being then and there a public place. The case is stated by Judge Samuels. The only question in the cause was, whether proof of betting at faro at the place and time stated, would sustain the indictment. The court below held that it would, and there being a verdict and judgment for the commonwealth, Gibboney applied to this court for a supersedeas; which was allowed.

Cook, for the appellant:

Two bills of exceptions were filed by petitioner upon the trial; but both present the same question, with so little variation, as not to require separate consideration. That question is, whether under an ordinary *indictment for "unlawfully playing at cards," the defendant can be found guilty, by proof, of betting at faro.

583

By law, the game of faro is recognized as a different sort of gambling from ordi-

†Code, ch. 198, § 4, p. 743. "If a free person bet or play at any such table or bank as is mentioned in the first section (A B C. E O table, or faro bank, or table of the like kind), or if at any ordinary, racefield, or other public place, he play at any game except bowls, chess, backgammon, draughts, or a licensed game, or bet on the sides of those who play, he shall be fined thirty dollars, and shall, if required by the court, give security for his good behavior for one year, or in default thereof, may be imprisoned not more than three months."

nary card playing. It is set apart as one of a class, to be punished with greater severity than common games. Specific provisions, inapplicable to other games, have been adopted for its suppression. That the legislature intended to make it a more serious violation of law than the more common games, is apparent, not only from the peculiar provisions found in the first three sections of chapter 198, page 742 of the Code, but also from the language of the 4th section, which announces the punishment of such as bet or play at this game. It is a misdemeanor to bet at faro at any place, while other gaming is unlawful at only some particular places.

Nor is it a game necessary to be played with cards. Most usually it is so, but not of necessity. It may be played with any kind of markers or counters. Plates of tin, or pieces of leather, or paper, with suitable numbers marked upon them, would answer as well as cards; and the game thus played would be equally as unlawful as if played with cards. The second bill of exceptions shows that cards are not the only instruments with which this game might be carried on.

Windsor's Case, 4 Leigh 680, shows that when the commonwealth alleges the playing to have been at a particular game, she must so prove it. Here she alleges that the defendant "played at cards." The game proven, is a different one. The defendant could not have pleaded his conviction under this indictment, in bar of another charging him with "betting at faro." The language of the 4th section is in the disjunctive; making either of the two offences a misdemeanor, and the commonwealth chose her ground.

Wyatt's Case, 6 Rand. 694, contains 584 a judicial recognition *of the distinction between faro and other games of the like kind, and the ordinary forms of card playing. It is one of the games in which the chances are unequal, and is therefore placed in the list of those which are especially condemned by law.

Had this indictment only charged the defendant with unlawful gaming at the place named in the indictment, possibly he might have been found guilty upon the evidence. This may be inferred from the case of Linkous, 9 Leigh 608, coupled with the remarks of Judge Semple in Windsor's Case, 4 Leigh 680. But when we come to speak of faro, we find it unnecessary to charge that it was at any public place.

The Attorney General, for the commonwealth.

The exceptions taken in this case are both based upon the ground, that proof of playing at faro is not sufficient to sustain an indictment for "unlawfully playing at cards."

This may either be, because:

1st. Faro cannot be prosecuted, except under the first clause of § 4, ch. 198 of the Code; or,

2d. Faro is not described by the terms of the indictment, "unlawfully playing at cards."

The first ground is erroneous, as will appear from the following considerations:

These laws in ch. 198 are construed remedially—section 20. The 4th section of that chapter groups offences punishable alike. It punishes faro and the like, wherever played, and any unlawful game, when played at an ordinary, in the same way. The first clause refers to faro, &c., alone; the second to any game, except bowls," &c.

Under the second clause, then, can faro be prosecuted? The answer is found in the answers to two other questions. Is faro "any game?" The affirmative answer includes it under the terms of the sec-585 ond *clause. Is it among the excepted games? The negative answer leaves it under the including terms, unrelieved by the exceptions.

The petitioner's counsel so argues, that if his view be right, a prosecution for playing faro cannot be instituted under a statute, whose terms expressly include it, and do not except it; and this, merely because it might be prosecuted under another clause, without a specification of an ordinary as the place. Such a construction would, so far from being remedial, be more rigid than a penal construction. See 1 Arch. Cr. Pl. & Ev. 111-5, and notes, for cases of acts having a double criminal aspect.

The second ground is equally untenable. The charge is for unlawfully playing at cards at the hotel of Yancey. Is the faro proved, within the terms of this description? Was it played at the hotel? Unquestionably. Was it a playing with cards? That it is a game played with cards appears from ch. 198, § 1; "whether the game or table be played with cards, dice or otherwise."

If it might be played with cards, it was relevant to ask the question excepted to in the first bill; to be followed, if necessary, by a question as to how it was played.

The other bill of exceptions shows it was played with cards; and does not show it could be played without them.

It may be said that on the authority of the case in 3 Rand. 108, the second bill cannot be referred to in aid of the first. The cases are different. In that, the two exceptions were to points of evidence; and as neither purported to give all the evidence, the court, to avoid injustice, refused, in considering the one, to look into the other. In this, the second bill gives all the evidence in the case. The reason for that decision is inapplicable to this case.

In addition, the question was rele-
586 vant, because it is *a matter of which even the court may judicially know. See 12 Gill & John. 260. Faro is usually, if not always, a game of cards. In order to the interpretation of a statute containing the word faro, as in the case of any other word, the court may judicially know its meaning without evidence.

Upon the second bill of exceptions, it is clear the verdict was right, and the instructions proper. The probata sustained the allegata completely.

In fact, the whole question rests on this distinction. Playing at cards is the generic term, which includes faro, and all other games of cards. Under this descriptive term, faro may be proved. On the other hand, as faro is a specific term, upon a charge of playing at that, no other specific game of cards would be provable.

The great objection in this case seems to rest upon the idea, that notwithstanding this conviction, the party may be again indicted for this playing at faro, under the first clause of the 4th section, and he cannot plead autre fois convict.

This assumes the point in dispute. For if for the act proved he may be prosecuted under either clause, as I insist, a conviction under either is a discharge from prosecution under the other. He cannot be again indicted; or if he be, he may plead autre fois convict, and prove that the offence charged in the second indictment is the same for which he was convicted.

It is true, it is difficult in such cases to sustain this plea. This arises from the frequent repetition of, and the likeness between, the several offensive acts, and the natural obliviousness and want of discrimination between them by the offender and the witnesses. Owing to this difficulty, the statute requires prosecutions within a year—a short limitation.

But the same difficulty occurs in like cases, where there is no question of the 587 validity of the conviction. *Thus, in liquor cases, 1 Gratt. 553, "selling to persons to the jurors unknown;" which lets in evidence of any selling within a year. See also how difficult to make the plea available against conviction for a particular game of cards; as in Windsor's Case, 4 Leigh 680.

A place must be laid, which is done here. Head's Case, 11 Gratt. 819.

All necessary to define the offence must be stated. Here it is done. 3 Gratt. 590.

It is only where as in Coe's Case, 9 Leigh 620, a different species of offence is sought to be proved from the one charged, that the evidence has been held insufficient. Here one is proved, of a number included under generic terms.

In Windsor's Case, 4 Leigh 680, a particular kind of game at cards was charged—another kind could not be proved. One species is alleged—another could not be proved. It is very different to allege under a general term and to prove any one included under it. See Semple's opinion in that case.

This last case was decided on two grounds:

1. To allege one, is to exclude all others, and thus surprise the defendant, if another could be proved.

To allege one, when another is proved, would bar the plea of autre fois convict for the record vouched, would falsify it.

Defendant's counsel, referring to Windsor's Case, in his petition concedes, that possibly a conviction upon proof of faro might have been had, under a charge for unlawful gaming. Now it would seem that, if under a charge of unlawful gaming, proof of any game, faro inclusive, would suffice. the same proof would suffice, under a general charge of unlawful gaming at cards. The latter is more specific in alleging the special character of the gaming, but 588 each charge is inclusive of *the offence proved. If the concession be right, the argument of the counsel is at an end.

6 Rand. 694 is cited to show that faro is different from other games of cards. True—but the case does not show that faro is not a game of cards. Nor is the difference spoken of material, except as to the dealer, who has the advantage of the inequality, and it is not applicable to the player.

In concluding, I would refer the court to 1 Arch. Cr. Pl. & Ev. 111-5, and the notes, for cases where the same act has a double criminal aspect; in which prosecutions for both will be good, except where under the first, there might have been a conviction for the second offence; or where the one is inclusive of the other.

Here, had there been a prosecution under the first clause of § 4, it would have barred a conviction under the second clause, because the former is inclusive of the latter. But an acquital in this case, where the place is specified, and must be proved, would not bar a conviction for faro at another place.

As to the evidence to sustain these pleas, see 1 Arch. 113, note (1); 113-1, note 2.

SAMUELS, J. The plaintiff was indicted in the Circuit court of Wythe county, for that, on the 1st of August 1854, at the county aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of said court, he did unlawfully play at cards, at the hotel of Charles Yancey, in the town of Wytheville; said hotel being then and there a public place, &c. The plaintiff pleaded not guilty. On the trial before the jury, a witness on behalf of the commonwealth was asked the question whether he had seen the plaintiff bet or play at faro at the place alleged in the indictment. This question was objected to by the plaintiff; but the court overruling the objection, 589 *allowed the question to be asked and answered; and thereupon the plaintiff filed his first bill of exceptions. This exception, however, does not show what answer was given to the question; nor can we look to the second bill of exceptions in aid of the first, as the first does not refer to the second; nor does the second show what answer was given to the particular question excepted to. If the court should be of opinion that the question was improper, still the judgment could not be reversed for that reason, as it does not appear that the answer was, or might have been prejudicial to the plaintiff.

In the progress of the trial it was proved that the plaintiff did bet at the game of faro at the time and place mentioned in the indictment; that the game of faro is played with cards; and that the plaintiff did not play at any other game at that time and place. Thereupon the plaintiff moved the court to instruct the jury, in effect, that proof of betting at faro did not sustain the charge of playing cards, alleged in the indictment. This instruction the court refused to give, and instructed the jury that if they believed from the evidence that the plaintiff, within twelve months before the finding of the indictment, did bet at the game of faro exhibited at the place named in the indictment, they ought to find him guilty. To these several rulings of the court, the plaintiff filed his second bill of exceptions.

It must be conceded that the law prior to the 1st July 1850 would have justified a conviction of the offence alleged in this case, upon the proof heard therein. Faro is a game, and it is played with cards; and it is not one of the class of games excepted, "bowls," &c., &c. See 1 Rev. Code, p. 563, § 5; Sess. Acts 1848, p. 114, § 5. The present Code of Virginia became the law upon and after the day above named, and gives the rule for our case. Chap. 198, §
590 4, p. 743, *embraces this subject. The second clause of the section last cited, if it stood alone, would extend to the case, as would the previous statutes above cited, if they had remained in force. A penalty is denounced against playing "at any game at an ordinary," &c. except, "bowls," &c., &c.: faro is included by the terms "any game;" it is not included within the exceptions "bowls," &c., &c.; it is played with cards, as the evidence in the record shows; it is therefore properly described as unlawful playing at cards.

It only remains to enquire whether the first clause of § 4 of the statute has the effect of withdrawing the offence of playing at faro from the general provisions of the law; of making it a different offence to be prosecuted as such, upon allegations and proof specifically appropriate to it.

The legislature obviously intended by the first clause of § 4, to extend the previous laws against gaming at public places, to certain games, faro and others, when played at private places; to this extent new offences were created, to be prosecuted upon proper allegations and proofs. This construction is perfectly consistent with the purpose of leaving gaming at public places to the operation of the general law. And such, in my judgment, is the meaning of the law upon the most strict construction of its terms. Construing it, however, as a remedial law according to § 20, p. 745 of the Code, we must hold that as to certain games, faro, &c., when played at public places, the commonwealth has cumulative remedies: one under the general law against all forbidden games at such places—the other under the law against faro and the games classed with it, when played at any place.

The revisors of the statute say, in their report to the general assembly, p. 977, § 4, that they inserted the first clause for the sole purpose of preventing any question as to whether the place at which faro, &c., 591 *was played was public or private; they indicate no purpose of withdrawing any case from the operation of the second clause, which would be embraced by its terms.

The argument on behalf of plaintiff, that the judgment in this case will be no bar to another prosecution for the alleged playing at faro, is not well founded. The judgment will bar a future prosecution for the criminal fact of which the plaintiff may have been convicted upon the indictment in this case; and this, although the fact may be described by a different name. Having shown that in this case the plaintiff may be convicted of unlawful playing at cards, by proof of playing at faro, it follows that this judgment will bar a further prosecution for the same offence, although it shall be described as playing at faro.

I am of opinion to affirm the judgment.

The other judges concurred.

Judgment affirmed.

October Term, 1857, Richmond.

1. Indictment for Murder—Conviction.—Under a common law indictment for murder, the prisoner may be found guilty of murder in the first or second degree, or manslaughter.

2. Same—Same—New Trial—Higher Offence.†—QUÆRE: If a prisoner has been convicted of murder in the second degree, or manslaughter, and obtains new trial, whether he can be put upon his trial again for a higher offence, than that of which he was convicted.

Indictment for Murder—Conviction.—It seems settled that an indictment in the common-law form for murder is good and will support a conviction for murder in the first or second degree, or manslaughter. The principal case is cited as authority for the proposition in Bull v. Com., 14 Gratt. 620; Cluverius' Case, 81 Va. 848; Kibler v. Com., 94 Va. 809, 26 S. E. Rep. 858; State v. Abbott, 8 W. Va. 747. †Criminal Law—New Trial—Higher Offence.—The question, as to whether, if a prisoner, on an indictment for murder, has been convicted of murder in the second degree or manslaughter, and obtains a new trial, he can be put upon his trial again for a higher offence, than that of which he was convicted, seems to have been brought directly to the notice of the court of appeals for the first time in the principal case. But, as seen from the second headnote, the court left the query unanswered: though DANIEL, J., expressed the opinion that the conviction barred a subsequent trial for a higher offence. But, in Stuart v. Com., 28 Gratt. 958, there is a partial answer to the question. In this case, the rule was laid down that, where there is but one count in an indictment on which the accused may be convicted of one of several offences which are covered by the indictment, the verdict of the jury finding the accused guilty of one of the said offences is a verdict of acquittal of all the others of a higher grade of offence; and thus, on an indictment for murder, a verdict finding the accused guilty of manslaughter is a verdict of acquittal as to the murder, and a bar to a conviction thereof on a second trial. But the court left it a query as to whether the same rule applies where, on an indictment for murder, the jury find the prisoner guilty of murder in the second degree. The principal case was reviewed in this case (pp. 956-958).

5. Same—Same—Same¶—Cause of Death.* — Upon a trial for homicide, it is competent for the commonwealth to introduce physicians or surgeons to give their opinion on a state of facts testified to by themselves or other witnesses, in respect to a wound or beating proved to have been inflicted on the deceased, as to whether such wound or beating would be a cause adequate to produce the death, or was the actual cause of the death.

In State v. Cross, 44 W. Va. 315, 29 S. E. Rep. 527, the court, after reviewing the Virginia cases (among others the principal case and Stuart v. Com., 28 Gratt. 950) and statutes, decides (in keeping with Stuart v. Com.) that where a party is tried upon an indictment for murder and found guilty of voluntary manslaughter, and obtains a new trial, though the verdict is silent as to murder, he cannot be tried again for murder. But this court also left it a question as to whether one found guilty of murder in the second degree can be tried again for murder in the first degree.

In 1878, it was enacted by the Virginia Legislature (Acts of 1877-'78, p. 344, § 25) that "if a verdict be set aside on the motion of the accused, and a new trial awarded, on such new trial the accused shall be tried, and such verdict may be found and sentence pronounced as if the former verdict had not been found." In Briggs' Case, 82 Va. 560, this act was pronounced constitutional. See the principal case cited in this case at p. 562. In this case (Briggs v. Com.), on the indictment for murder, the accused was convicted of murder in the second degree. Upon appeal, the conviction was set aside and a new trial awarded. At the second trial, the prisoner pleaded an acquittal of murder in the first degree by virtue of the former conviction of murder in the second degree, and moved the court to so charge the jury as to exclude a finding of murder in the first degree. It was held that the lower court did not err in rejecting the plea, and in refusing, in effect, to charge the jury that they could not convict the accused of murder in the first degree, upon the ground of the former conviction of murder in the second degree. But, by Va. Code 1887, § 4040, it is provided: "If the verdict be set aside, and a new trial granted the accused, he shall not be tried for any higher offence than that of which he was convicted on the last trial." This statute was construed in Forbes v. Com., 90 Va. 550, 19 S. E. Rep. 164; Benton's Case, 91 Va. 782, 21 S. E. Rep. 495. See 2 Va. Law Reg. 697, 787, 870.

§Same—Opinion—Medical Experts.—In Ellis v. Harris, 32 Gratt. 690, the principal case was cited as correctly expounding the law as to the admissibility of the testimony of an expert. On the subject of admissibility of the opinion of a nonexpert, see foot-note to McCormick v. Hamilton, 23 Gratt. 561.

¶Same—Same—Same—Same—How Questions Should Be Put.—In McMechen v. McMechen, 17 W. Va. 694, it was said: "There seems to be no conflict of authorities on the law applicable to the testimony of medical experts. The law bearing upon the precise question we are now considering may be thus correctly stated: When a medical expert is asked to give his professional opinion to a jury not upon matters within his own knowledge but upon a hypothetical case founded upon the testimony of witnesses previously examined in the case, the questions to him must be so shaped, as to give him no occasion to mentally draw his own conclusions from the whole evidence or a part thereof, and from the conclusion so drawn express his opinion, or to decide as to the weight of evidence or the credibility of witnesses; and his answers must be such, as not to involve any such conclusions so drawn, or any opinion of the expert, as to the weight of the evidence or credibility of the witnesses. the homicide is not criminally responsible for the death, although it should also appear that the symptoms of the disease were aggravated, and the fatal progress quickened, by the enfeebled or irritated condition of the deceased, caused by the violence.

593 *At the October term 1856 of the Circuit court of the city of Richmond, George Livingston was indicted for the murder of Elizabeth Duesberry. The indictment was in the usual form of a common law indictment for murder, and contained but one count. To this indictment the prisoner demurred; but his demurrer was overruled. He was tried at the same term, and found guilty of murder in the second degree; but on the motion of the prisoner, the court set aside the verdict and granted him a new trial. In April 1857 the prisoner was again tried and found guilty of voluntary manslaughter; and the term of his imprisonment was fixed at one year. Upon this trial the clerk charged the jury in the same terms as on the first trial. Upon the verdict the court rendered judgment against the prisoner; and he applied to this court for a writ of error; which was allowed.

On the trial a number of questions were saved; but it is only necessary to state those which were acted on by this court. It appears that the deceased was the mistress of the prisoner, and that he frequently beat her. On the Saturday previous to her death he gave her a beating, which was testified to by two of the inmates of the house where she lived. These witnesses testified, that on the same evening, and about two hours after the beating, she complained of a violent pain in her side. This testimony the prisoner moved the court to exclude; but the court overruled the motion; and the prisoner excepted. This is his first exception.

Dr. Waring, a practicing physician in Richmond, was sent for to see the deceased, and attended her until her death on the next Thursday. He stated, in giving in his evidence, that he heard nothing, either from the deceased or the witnesses, of bruises or pain any where except in the lower part of the abdomen, in the region of the bladder. That he treated the de-594 ceased *to allay inflammation and promote action on the bowels. He made a post-mortem examination; and after detailing the appearances, said he saw sufficient cause of death, without referring it to the beating. The witness having said in answer to a question by the attorney for the commonwealth, that he heard the testimony of all the witnesses who had been examined; the attorney put to him the following question: Do you not think that the violence which she received by the beating which you have heard described, accelerated the death of the deceased? This question was objected to by the counsel for the prisoner; but the objection was overruled; and he excepted. This is his second exception.

After taking the foregoing exception, the prisoner by his counsel moved the court to exclude from the jury all the medical evidence which they had heard from the witness Waring, and all evidence given by him derived from his knowledge or skill as a practicing physician, unless it was proved or admitted by the commonwealth that he was an expert in his profession; the prisoner being willing to admit the fact. But the court overruled the motion; and the prisoner excepted.

After the attorney for the commonwealth had asked several other questions of the witness as to the effect of a beating upon a person in a diseased condition; all of which were excepted to by the prisoner's counsel; his ninth question was as follows: Your last answer seems to be based upon the opinion that the inflammation of the bladder and the constipation of the bowels could not have been caused by the infliction of the violence which you have heard related by the witness. Suppose the diseases of which you speak had developed themselves in this case after the violence (but not in consequence thereof), yet when she was suffering from said violence, do you think that said violence did or did not ac-595 celerate her death? To *this question the prisoner by his counsel objected; but the court overruled the objection; and he again excepted.

On the trial a number of physicians had been summoned, who were present and heard the evidence, and were examined as to their opinion of the cause of the death of the deceased. Among these physicians was Dr. Charles Bell Gibson, who having stated that he had heard all the testimony in the cause, the attorney for the commonwealth put to him the following question: Please state what in your opinion, from all the evidence which has been given in this cause, was the cause of the death of Elizabeth Duesberry? This question was objected to by the prisoner by his counsel; but the objection was overruled by the court: and the prisoner again excepted. The witness answered: I think she died of peritonitis, which is an inflammation of the peritoneum, a cerous membrane which covers most of the viscera of the abdomen. This peritonitis was caused, I think, by the beating testified to.

After all the evidence had been introduced, and the argument of the cause had been concluded, when the jury were about to retire to consider of their verdict, one of them asked the court to instruct them, whether it was necessary to prove that the beating and the death occurred on the respective days laid in the indictment. And thereupon the court instructed the jury as follows: It is averred in the indictment that the beating and injury was inflicted on the 14th of March 1856, and that the deceased died on the 19th of that month. It is competent for the commonwealth to prove that the beating and injury was inflicted on the 8th, and that the deceased died on the 13th of that month; and if the ingredients necessary to prove the crime are proved to the satisfaction of the jury, they may find the prisoner guilty under this indictment. To which opinion of the court the prisoner excepted.

596 *Crenshaw and Crump, for the prisoner.

The Attorney General, for the commonwealth.

DANIEL, J. The indictment is in the common law form of an indictment for murder. In the demurrer to it, which was overruled by the Circuit court, the causes of demurrer are not stated. And as to those causes which have been assigned by the counsel for the prisoner, in the argument here, they seem to be fully answered by the cases of Miller v. The Commonwealth, 1 Va. Cas. 310; Vance v. The Commonwealth, 2 Va. Cas. 162; and Wicks v. The Commonwealth, 2 Va. Cas. 387.

In the last mentioned case, the General court held, unanimously, that the true object and effect of our act of 1802-3 was not to create two offences out of the crime of murder, but to arrange the various kinds of murder at the common law, under the two denominations of murder in the first degree, and murder in the second degree; and to annex to the cases in each denomination a punishment corresponding in severity to the degree of atrocity with which they might be perpetrated, and by which they would be marked as belonging to the one or the other of said denominations of murder. And that the legislature contemplated no change in the frame of the indictment, they further held, was plainly to be inferred, from the clause requiring the juries, in all cases of indictments for murder, when they find the party accused guilty of murder, to ascertain in their verdict whether it be murder in the first degree or second degree; and also from the clause requiring the court, in case of conviction by confession, to proceed by examination of witnesses to determine the degree of crime, and to give sentence accordingly. These clauses, they held, would have been wholly unnecessary, if it had been in the contemplation of the framers of the 597 act that the indictment *should in each case set out specially the features by which the offence should be marked as belonging to murder in the first or murder in the second degree: inasmuch as a general verdict of guilty on the one hand, or a confession of guilt on the other, under such an indictment would necessarily, without any further resort to the jury or the examination of witnesses, ascertain the degree of the offence beyond all doubt.

In conformity with these views, the practice has hitherto generally, if not uniformly prevailed in our courts, of prosecuting and punishing all acts of felonious homicide whatsoever, under indictments for murder, framed as at common law.

The same practice has prevailed in Pennsylvania from an early period, under the act of the legislature of that state, of the 22d April 1794, from which the first section of our act of 1802-3 is taken. White v. Commonwealth, 6 Binn. R. 179; Wharton's Am. Cr. Law 410.

No injustice or inconvenience is shown to have resulted from the practice; and I do not know of any act of our legislature which can be construed as indicating a purpose to change it. I see no reason for disturbing it.

I can see no objection to the admissibility of the testimony, the refusal to exclude which, forms the ground of the prisoner's first exception. It seems now to be well settled, that whenever the bodily or mental feelings of an individual are material to be proved, the usual expressions of such feelings, made at the time in question, may be given in evidence. If they were the natural language of the affection, whether of body or mind, they furnish (it is said) satisfactory evidence and often the only proof of its existence: And whether they were real or feigned is for the jury to determine. So also the representations, by a sick person, of the nature, symptoms 598 and effects of the *malady under which he is laboring at the time, are received as original evidence. 1 Greenl. Evi. 179; Aveson v. Lord Kinnaird, 6 East's R. 188. Such representations (it is said) are admitted from necessity, and as being in the nature of pars res gestæ. Roulkac v. White, 9 Ired. R. 63. And hence it is the practice to receive them, though made by persons who, if produced in court to testify, would be properly rejected as incompetent witnesses. Frequent instances of this will be found in the reports of cases in the courts of the southern states, growing out of actions on warranties of the soundness of slaves. In such actions, where the question is as to the diseased state of the slave at a particular time, the appearance and actions of the slave, his exclamations or declarations, at the time, as to his pains and other symptoms, are all regarded as part of the res gestæ, and admitted on that ground. Such declarations, it was said by the court in Jones v. White, 11 Humph. R. 268, drawn from the slave by those investigating the character and symptoms of the disease, become part of that investigation, and as such may properly go to the jury. The admissibility of such evidence is further sustained by the cases of Marr v. Hill, 10 Missouri R. 321; Grey v. Young, Harper's S. C. R. 38; Biles v. Holmes, 11 Ired. R. 16; Allen v. Vancleave & Kelso, 15 B. Monr. R. 236; Clancey v. Overman, 1 Dev. & Batt. 402.

In one of these cases, however (Marr v. Hill, &c.), it was said by the court that the mere declarations of a slave that he was diseased, without proof of any symptoms or appearance of disease, would be mere hearsay, which ought not to affect the rights of any person, and would be clearly inadmissible. Without stopping to enquire whether this dictum correctly states a qualification to the rule, it is obvious to remark that such a qualification can have no application, where, as here, the enquiry is had been assaulted and beaten only two hours before the period at which the declarations as to her sufferings were made. On the contrary, the circumstances under which the question, as to the admissibility of the evidence, arises here, seem to me to bring this case directly within the influence of the decision in Biles v. Holmes. There the object was to show that a slave had been permanently injured by a severe blow on the head; and the plaintiff was allowed to prove that "he complained much of headache when exposed to the sun, and stated his inability to work in the sun." And it does not appear from the report of the case that the offer on the part of the plaintiff to prove such complaints and statements, had been preceded by proof of any other evidence of the supposed malady. And in the case of Aveson v. Lord Kinnaird, it was said by Lawrence, J., that it was in every day's experience in actions of assault, that what a man has said of himself to his surgeon, is evidence to show what he suffered by reason of the assault. Aveson v. Lord Kinnaird, 6 East's R. 188, already cited.

Doubts have been expressed in some cases whether the admissibility of such evidence should not be restricted to the proof of complaints and statements made by the sick or suffering persons to their physicians. On a reference, however, to the cases which I have cited, it will be seen that the courts recognize no distinction, in respect of competency, between such declarations, when made to physicians, and when made to unprofessional persons. I think the evidence was properly received.

The objections to the testimony of Dr. Waring, so far as founded on the supposed absence of proof of his being an expert, must have proceeded from a mistake—inasmuch as it appears from the second bill of exceptions, to which express reference 600 is made in the *third and fourth, that he was proved to be a practicing physician in the city of Richmond. This evidence, in the absence of any conflicting proof, was sufficient to justify the court in overruling the objection.

In the instructions which the court gave to the jury at their instance, I can perceive no error. The variance between the dates of the beating and injury inflicted on the deceased, and of her death, as averred in the indictment, and the true dates of those events, as shown by the proofs, was wholly immaterial. Commonwealth v. Ailstock, 3 Gratt. 650; Wharton Am. Cr. Law 220. And it is obvious that in saying to the jury, "that if the ingredients necessary to constitute the crime were proved to the satisfaction of the jury, they might find the prisoner guilty under the indictment," the judge could not have been understood by the jury as intending to deny the truth of the proposition that they ought to be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the prisoner before they could convict him. The question propounded by the jury, and the answer given by the judge, both plainly pointed to the variance between the dates alleged and proved, and not to the degree of belief or satisfaction, in the minds of the jury, respecting the guilt of the prisoner, essential to his conviction. The instruction given by the judge amounted in effect to nothing more than saying to the jury, that if all the other elements of the crime were established in accordance with the requirements of the law, the variance just mentioned presented no valid objection to their finding the prisoner guilty under the indictment.

It seems to me, however, that the court below erred in receiving a portion of the testimony set out in the fifth bill of exceptions; and more particularly that portion sought and elicited by the ninth question propounded by the prosecution to the witness Waring. I know of no authority 601 which would hold a party *criminally responsible in a case such as that which it was the aim and tendency of this testimony to establish.

It is true that if a man be sick of a mortal disease, and receives a wound which, by irritating or provoking the disease to operate more violently, hastens his death, the party inflicting the wound may be held accountable for the death. In such a case it is said, the deceased has not died ex visitatione dei, for the wound has hastened the death, and the offender cannot apportion his wrong. 1 Hale 428.

So again, it is said by the same authority, if a man receives a wound not mortal, and through neglect or failure to use the proper application, it turns to a gangrene or fever which causes the death, then the wound, being the cause of the gangrene or fever, is regarded as the causa causati, and the party inflicting the wound may be held responsible for the death.

On the other hand, however, if the wound be not mortal, but with ill applications the party dies, and it clearly appears that the medicine and not the wound was the cause of the death, this is not homicide.

It will be seen that there is a marked difference between the first two cases thus instanced by Lord Hale, and the case pointed to by the testimony in question. In neither of the former is any independent cause interposed between the wound and the death. In the first of the two the death would not have occurred at the time it did but for the wound. Though the sick man was laboring under a disease, which if left to take its natural course, would result in death at no distant period; yet the death in respect of time is plainly referable to the wound. So, in the second, though the gangrene is the proximate cause of the death, yet the gangrene is a consequence of the wound; and so the death is, by a regular course and natural order, in the sequence of events, traced up to 602 the wound as its *originating cause.

But in the case sought to be made out by the testimony objected to, a disease is supposed to have supervened between a blow not mortal and the death: a disease not caused by the blow, but coming by the visitation of Providence.

In such a case, the exemption of the party inflicting the blow from criminal accountability, is, it seems to me, even more obvious than in the third of the instances cited from Hale. For then it might be said, the "ill application" of which the party died would not have been resorted to but for the wound inflicted by the wrongdoer; and if the connection, there, between the wound and the death, is too remote to be made the foundation of criminal responsibility, a fortiori, must such be the rule when the disease, but for the supervention of which the death would not have occurred, is, in its origin, independent of the wound or blow, and wholly out of the course of its consequences. In such a state of things, the blow and the death have no necessary or natural connection with each other as cause and effect. The blow is neither the proximate cause of the death, nor is it, though made by extraneous circumstances to accelerate it, linked with it in the regular chain of causes and consequences. A new and wholly independent instrumentality is interposed in the shape of the disease; and in contemplation of law, the death stroke is inflicted by the hand of Providence, and not by the hand of violence.

I am also of the opinion that the Circuit court, instead of overruling, ought to have sustained the motion of the prisoner to exclude from the jury the second question propounded to Dr. Gibson, and his answer thereto, set out in the sixth bill of exceptions. I do not doubt that in criminal as well as in civil trials, when questions of art or science are involved, persons who have peculiar skill or experience 603 therein, may be *introduced to give to the jury their opinions on such questions. In 1 Philips Evidence, p. 190, it is said that the opinion of a witness in general is not evidence: the witness must speak to facts. But on questions of science or trade, or others of the same kind, persons of skill may speak not only as to facts, but are allowed also to give their opinions in evidence. The opinion of medical men is evidence as to the state of a patient whom they have seen. Even in cases where they have not themselves seen the patient, but have heard the symptoms and particulars of his state detailed by other witnesses at the trial, their opinion on the nature of such symptoms, has been properly admitted. Thus on a question of sanity, medical men have been permitted to form and express their judgment upon the representation which witnesses at the trial have given of the conduct, manner and general appearance exhibited by the patient. So in prosecutions for murder, they have been allowed to state their opinion whether the wounds described by witnesses were likely to be the causes of death.

In England it would seem that the practice in respect to the character and scope of the questions which ought to be propounded to a professional person or expert in such cases, is not as yet very well settled. 2 Leading Criminal Cases 105, notes. I think, however, that it is a well established practice in this country, in cases of homicide, to allow physicians and surgeons to say, upon a state of facts testified to either by themselves or by other witnesses, whether in their opinion a particular wound or blow described would be an adequate cause, or even, whether such wound was, in their opinion, the actual cause of the death in the particular case. Commonwealth v. Rogers, 7 Metc. R. 500. But it would seem to be generally agreed that in such case the opinion of the witness is to be restricted to matters of science, 604 and that he is not to *be allowed to give an opinion on things with which a jury may be supposed to be equally well acquainted. 3 Philips 761, notes. And especially, that the questions should be so shaped and the answers so given as to exclude any opinion of the medical witness as to the credit of the witnesses on the truth of the facts testified to by others. Commonwealth v. Rogers, just cited.

The question and answer under consideration are in violation of these guards and restrictions, and invade the province of the jury. The question calls for, and the answer gives not simply the opinion of the witness as a man of science on a given or supposed state of facts, but an opinion necessarily involving his judgment as to the truth of evidence, not free from conflict.

The like objection exists in respect to the course pursued in the examination of Dr. Waring; which is made the ground of the second bill of exceptions.

I do not think that the Circuit court committed any error in overruling the motion of the prisoner to set aside the verdict on the ground that the jury was improperly charged by the clerk. For if we should concede, for the sake of the argument, that the verdict of guilty of murder in the second degree only, amounted also in effect to a verdict of not guilty of murder in the first degree, and that upon the second trial the prisoner ought not to have been again placed in jeopardy for murder in the first degree, we would still be of the opinion that the motion was properly overruled. The first error, if any, was committed when the second trial was granted. The prisoner ought then to have asked the court to make an order, that upon the second trial so much of the charge to the jury should be excluded as related to murder in the first degree. Having failed to do so, he should have made such a motion to 605 the court on the new *trial before the charge to the jury was given; or at least have brought the subject to the notice of the court before the jury retired. He has been found guilty on the second trial, not of murder in the first degree, but of manslaughter, for which he could without question be legally tried and convicted under the indictment. The prisoner has not shown, and the court cannot see how he has been, or could have been injured by the course pursued.

As, however, on account of the errors in the ruling of the Circuit court, which we have already indicated, we have to reverse the judgment, and remand the cause for a new trial, the question does necessarily arise, whether upon such trial the prisoner may be yet legally tried and convicted of murder in either degree; or whether the Circuit court is to be directed so to modify the charge to the jury as to restrict their enquiry and finding to the offense of manslaughter.

In the case of Lithgow v. The Commonwealth, 2 Va. Cas. 297, it was decided by the General court, that when there are several counts in an indictment, and on one of them the prisoner was convicted, and acquitted of the rest; if, on a writ of error obtained by him, the judgment and verdict are set aside, and a new trial awarded to him, the prisoner can only be tried again on the count on which he was convicted, and not on the other counts of which he had been before acquitted. The court said there was no reason why a prisoner, who had been rightfully acquitted upon one of several offences which have been joined in the same indictment, should be again brought into jeopardy for these alleged offences; because, having been wrongfully convicted on another of these separate charges, he seeks and obtains redress against this latter error. And in Bennet v. The Commonwealth, 2 Va. Cas. 234, the same court decided that when there are several counts in an indictment, and the jury convict the prisoner 606 *on one of them, finding nothing as to the others, the verdict ought not therefore to be set aside; but the court ought to enter a judgment of acquittal on the counts as to which the jury were silent, though a judgment of conviction may be entered on the one on which the jury had found the prisoner guilty. Thus necessarily deciding that a verdict of guilty on one count, saying nothing as to the others, operated in law a verdict of not guilty on those others. A like decision was made in the cases of Kirk v. The Commonwealth, 9 Leigh 627; and Page v. The Commonwealth, Id. 683.

If there had been in this case, therefore, one count for murder, and another for manslaughter, and there had been a verdict of guilty on the latter count, taking no notice of the former, it would seem to me that under the authority of these cases we would have had to send the case back for a new trial for manslaughter alone. Does it make any difference that the verdict in this case has been rendered under a single count—a count for murder? The weight of authority would seem to be with the proposition that it does not. In 1 Bishop on Criminal Law, § 676, in speaking of the waiver, by a prisoner in asking for a new trial, of the protection afforded by the common law maxim, adopted into the constitution of the United States, and into the constitutions of most of the states, "that no man is to be brought into jeopardy of his life more than once for the same offence," the author proceeds to say that this waiving of constitutional right is not considered by the court as extending beyond the exact matter concerning which the relief is sought. If, therefore, the verdict which finds a prisoner guilty of part of the charge against him, finds him not guilty of another part; as for example guilty on one count of the indictment, and not guilty on another count; or where there is but one count, 607 guilty of manslaughter, and *not guilty of murder; and a new trial is granted him, he cannot be convicted on the second trial, of the matter of which he was acquitted on the first. The same principle is recognized by the Supreme court of Tennessee in Slaughter v. State, 6 Humph. R. 410; in which case it was held that where a party is found guilty of manslaughter on an indictment for murder, and not guilty of murder, and obtains a new trial, he is discharged from the murder, though he may be convicted on the same indictment for manslaughter. The case of Hurt v. The State, 25 Miss. R. 378, is to the like effect. In that case, under an indictment for murder, the verdict found the prisoner guilty of manslaughter, but was silent as to his guilt or innocence of the murder. The court said, that the verdict operated as an acquittal of every crime of a higher grade, of which the prisoner might have been convicted under the indictment upon which the issue was made; otherwise, after undergoing the sentence for manslaughter, he might be put upon his trial for the charge of murder, which would thus be only postponed and not decided by the verdict of manslaughter; that the jury in such case, in contemplation of law, render two verdicts; one acquitting the accused of the higher crime charged in the indictment; the other finding him guilty of an inferior crime; and that the verdict of manslaughter was as much an acquittal of murder as a verdict pronouncing his entire innocence could be. The court further held, that on such a verdict the court below ought to have entered a judgment of acquittal as to the charge of murder, and that whether that judgment was in fact rendered or attached by mere operation of law to the verdict, it was bound to be in the prisoner's favor; and in asking a new trial, he could not be regarded as asking to disturb the verdict and judgment in his favor.

This case was followed by Brennan
608 v. The People, *15 Illinois R. 572. There, too, it was held that a verdict of guilty of manslaughter, under an indictment for murder, saying nothing as to the murder, amounted to an acquittal of the charge of murder, and that the prisoner, upon obtaining a new trial, could only be tried again for the manslaughter. The same views prevailed in the case of The People v. Gilmore, 4 Calif. R. 376; and in Jones v. The State, 13 Texas R. 168. I have seen no case in which a contrary doctrine has been declared, except the case of the United States v. Harding, Wallace, jr. R. 127; decided in the Circuit court of the United States for the third circuit.

It is true that in the case of Gwatkin, who obtained in the General court the reversal of a judgment convicting him of murder in the second degree, the order remanding the cause for a new trial was in general terms. 9 Leigh 678. And on a second trial he was convicted of murder in the first degree; and the court below rendered a judgment accordingly. The case was again brought up to the General court by a writ of error; and a new trial again obtained, on the ground of an improper refusal of the Circuit court to grant the accused a continuance. No question seems to have been raised on the first reversal, as to the character of the order to be made on awarding the new trial. Nor does it appear from the report of the case, that any other error in the proceedings at the second trial was assigned, except the refusal of the court to grant the motion for a continuance.

I do not think we can properly allow to that case the weight of an adjudication expressly deciding that a party who obtains the reversal of a judgment erroneously convicting him of murder in the second degree, may, upon his second trial, be properly convicted of murder in the first degree; inasmuch as it does not appear from the report of the case that the question was brought distinctly to the notice of the court.

609 *The same remark applies to the case of Ball v. Commonwealth, 8 Leigh 726, in which the General court granted a new trial in case of a conviction of murder in the second degree. No question of the kind seems to have been raised, and the cause was simply remanded for a new trial.

If, however, these cases could be regarded as express adjudications of the question which they are supposed to have decided, I am not prepared to say that they would necessarily furnish the rule for the case under consideration. There are considerations of a technical character, which might have entered into such decisions, but which have no application to a judgment reversing a conviction of manslaughter. It might be said, in support of such decisions, that as the indictment, according to our practice, is but an indictment in form for murder at the common law, a party, when found guilty of murder in the second degree, and not guilty of murder in the first degree, is not acquitted of any express averment which the indictment contains. You cannot, by reason of said acquittal, regard any important word in the indictment as stricken out, or treat any express allegation as negatived. If you did, you would thereby vitiate the indictment, and reduce it to something short of a charge of murder in any degree. If, therefore, the party is to be sent back to be tried for murder in any degree, it is necessary that he should be tried under the indictment as it stands, and that he should be regarded as unacquitted (as the fact is) of any one of the material allegations which the indictment contains. If this view does not present a mere technical and unsubstantial difficulty which may be gotten over by modifying the charge to the jury, so as to restrict their enquiry and finding to the grades of offence below murder in the first degree, it is obvious that there may be reasons for the supposed decisions in the cases of Gwat-610 kins and Ball, that *do not apply to this. For where a party is found guilty of manslaughter only, you may suppose him not guilty (as by legal consequence he in fact is) of some of the most important allegations of the indictment; and you may strike out, or suppose to be stricken out the most important words; as for instance, "murder," and "of malice aforethought," and still leave an indictment which would contain the charge of manslaughter.

Without going into any further speculation as to the reasons which may have possibly influenced the orders of the General court in the two cases just mentioned, I deem it sufficient to say that they do not amount to express authority requiring us, in a case like the one under consideration, to subject the party, on his new trial, to a trial for murder, and that elsewhere the weight of authority is, in my opinion, clearly the other way.

In this state of the law, I cannot undertake to say to a party who has been erroneously convicted of manslaughter, and who has appealed to this court, that we will not redress his wrong (which we admit to be manifest), except on the condition of his consenting to be again put in jeopardy for a higher offence, of which the jury have in effect once found him not guilty.

I think that for the errors of the Circuit court which have been pointed out, the judgment should be reversed, so much of the verdict set aside as finds the prisoner guilty of manslaughter, and the cause remanded for a new trial for manslaughter only. As, however, the other members of the court who concur in the other portions of this opinion, are of opinion that the order granting a new trial should be a general one, the order will be in accordance with their views.

MONCURE and SAMUELS, Js., concurred in the opinion of Daniel, J., except as to directing the new trial to be for manslaughter only.

611 *The judgment was as follows:

It seems to the court, that upon a trial for homicide, it is competent for the attorney for the commonwealth to introduce physicians or surgeons to give their opinion on a state of facts testified to by themselves or other witnesses, in respect to a wound or beating proved to have been inflicted on the deceased, as to whether such wound or beating would be a cause adequate to produce the death, or was the actual cause of the death. That this right is, however, subject to the restriction that the interrogatories to such medical persons be so framed as not to elicit, and their answers so given as not to contain any expression of opinion by them, on the credit of the witnesses, or the truth of the facts testified to by others.

And it seems to the court, that the course pursued in the examination of the witness Dr. Gibson, set out in the sixth bill of exceptions, was in violation of this restriction, and consequently that the Circuit court erred in refusing to exclude from the jury, on the motion of the prisoner's counsel, the second question put to the said witness, and his answer thereto.

And it seems further to the court, that an error of the like character was committed in the examination of the witness Dr. Waring, as set out in the second bill of exceptions.

And it seems also further to the court, that where in case of homicide it appears that a wound or beating was inflicted on the deceased which was not mortal, and the deceased, whilst laboring under the effects of the violence, becomes sick of a disease, not caused by such violence, from which disease death ensues within a year and a day, the party charged with the homicide is not criminally responsible for the death, although it should also appear that the symptoms of the disease were aggravated and its fatal progress 612 quickened by *the enfeebled or irritated condition of the deceased, caused by the violence.

And it also seems further to the court, that the ninth question propounded by the attorney for the commonwealth to the witness Waring, and his answer thereto set out in the fifth bill of exceptions, are in conflict with this rule; and consequently, that the Circuit court erred in refusing to grant the prisoner's motion to exclude said question and answer from the jury.

For these reasons, the court is of the opinion to reverse the judgment, set aside the verdict, and remand the cause for a new trial on the indictment, to be made on the indictment as it stands, and without any change in the usual charge to the jury.

613 *Bull v. The Commonwealth.

October Term, 1857, Richmond.

1. Murder—Indictment—Omission of "Deliberately."—In an indictment for murder, the omission of the word "deliberately," will not be fatal on general demurrer.

2. Same—Evidence—Dying Declarations—Consciousness of Impending Death.†—On a trial for murder, the commonwealth, to introduce the dying declarations of the deceased, proved that he was told that his physicians thought that unless he could be relieved of the shortness of breath under which he was then suffering, he would die very soon. He then made the statements which were proposed to be introduced as evidence; and he was asked if these were made as his dying declarations; to which he answered that they were. The deceased was then told that the doctors were of opinion he was certainly dying, and that he would die very soon; and what he had said was repeated to him, and he was asked if he made that statement again, and did he make it as a dying declaration; and he said he did. The statement is admissible evidence as dying declarations.

3. Appellate Practice—Certification of Evidence—When Judgment Reversed.‡—A bill of exceptions taken to the opinion of the court refusing to grant a new trial, sets out the evidence.—The appellate court will not reverse the judgment, unless, by rejecting all the parol evidence for the exceptor, and giving full faith and credit to that of the adverse party, the decision of the court below still appears to be wrong.

†Evidence—Dying Declarations—Consciousness of Impending Death.—In Jackson v. Com., 19 Gratt. 667, the principal case is cited as laying down the well-settled rule of law that to render dying declarations admissible evidence, they must be shown to have been made when the declarant is under a sense of impending death, and without any expectation or hope of recovery.

Whether the dying declarations sought to be introduced were made under a sense of impending death, without any expectation or hope of recovery is always a question to be determined by the court, not only from the proofs, but from all the circumstances of the case. Swisher v. Com., 26 Gratt. 965, 974, citing the principal case. See also, foot-note to Swisher v. Com., 26 Gratt. 963; monographic note on "Dying Declarations," appended to Jackson v. ‡Appellate Practice—Certification of Evidence—When Judgment Reversed.—The rule stated in the third headnote as to when the appellate court will reverse a judgment where the evidence is certified in the bill of exceptions is known as the old rule in Virginia. The principal case was cited as authorizing this rule in Gimmi v. Cullen, 20 Gratt. 452; Read v. Com., 22 Gratt. 929, 942; Lamberts v. Cooper, 29 Gratt. 67, and foot-note; Danville Bank v. Practice at Common Law—Refusal to Certify Facts.—Powell v. Tarry, 77 Va. 260, says: "As has been said, the facts proved are not certified in this case, the court certifies that the evidence is conflicting, and when the evidence is conflicting, the court may refuse to certify the facts proved. 4. Involuntary Manslaughter§—Case at Bar.—On a trial for murder, where the evidence repelled the idea of self-defence, the court instructed the jury, that if they believed from the evidence the deceased and the prisoner were engaged in a sudden and mutual combat, in which no weapon dangerous in itself was used, and during the progress of the fight the prisoner struck the deceased an ordinary blow or blows with his fists or feet, without any intention either to kill the deceased or to do him great bodily harm, but to repel his attack, and that the death of the deceased, was caused thereby accidentally and apart from the prisoner's intention, then the prisoner is guilty of involuntary manslaughter.—This is not error.

5. Voluntary Manslaughter‖—Case at Bar.—In such a case the court further instructs the jury, that though no weapon dangerous in itself is used, but only the fists and feet; yet if the jury are satisfied from the evidence that the manner of inflicting the blows was cruel and unusual, and exceeded in number and violence what was necessary to repel the deceased, and he died of such beating; then the prisoner is guilty of voluntary manslaughter.—This is not error.

614 *6. Instructions—Time for Exceptions—Failure to Object at Proper Time—Effect.¶—If a party be dissatisfied with an instruction, he ought to state his objection at the time. If no objection be made to an instruction at the time it is given, and no exception taken, or the point saved; but objection be made for the first time, after verdict, and in the form of a motion to set it aside; the court will consider whether, under all the circumstances, the party has been prejudiced by the instruction; and if of opinion that a just verdict has been rendered, according to the law and the evidence, will not set it aside on account of that objection.

7. Verdict—Impeachment by Jurors.*—As a general rule, the testimony of jurors is inadmissible to impeach their verdict; especially on the ground of their own misconduct.

¶Instructions—Time for Exceptions—Failure to Object at Proper Time—Effect.—If no objection be made to an instruction at the time it is given, and no exception taken nor the point saved, but objection be made for the first time, after verdict, and in the form of a motion to set it aside, the court will consider whether, under all the circumstances, the party has been prejudiced by the instruction; and if of opinion that a just verdict has been rendered according to the law and the evidence, will not set it aside on account of that objection. Stoneman v. Com., 25 Gratt. 905, citing the principal case, and Read's Case, 22 Gratt. 924. The principal case is also cited and approved as to this proposition in Thornton v. Com., 24 Gratt. 672; Mitchell v. Com., 75 Va. 865; Price v. Com., 77 Va. 395; Stevenson v. Wallace, 27 Gratt. 94. See, in accord, foot-note to Read's Case, 22 Gratt. 924.

But in Danville Bank v. Waddill, 31 Gratt. 477, JUDGE BURKS, delivering the opinion of the court, lays down the established (general) rule to be, that, in jury trials, if a party objects to a ruling, of the presiding judge during the progress of the trial, either in admitting or excluding evidence, or giving or refusing instructions, or otherwise, and intends to except to such ruling, he must make known such intention at the time of the ruling, or at least before verdict, and, if the bill of exceptions cannot be drawn up at once, liberty should be reserved to do so during the term, and if he neglect to prefer exceptions until after the verdict, he will not then be allowed to do so; and cites as his authority Washington, etc., Tel. Co. v. Hobson, 15 Gratt. 122, 138; Martz v. Martz, 25 Gratt. 361; Peery v. Peery, 26 Gratt. 320, 324; Winston v. Giles, 27 Gratt. 530; Page v. Clopton, 30 Gratt. 415. He then cited the principal case as laying down the proposition set out above in the last preceding paragraph, and said that it was not necessary to determine in the case at bar whether the general rule laid down at the beginning of this paragraph is to be regarded as modified by the principal case and Stevenson v. Wallace, 27 Gratt. 94, in its application to instructions to which objection is made for the first time by way of motion to set aside the verdict of the jury.

See foot-note to this case from a list of other cases approving the proposition laid down by it.

In Newberry v. Williams, 89 Va. 301, 15 S. E. Rep. 865, LEWIS, P., delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The rule is well established in this state, as declared by JUDGE BURKS in Danville Bank v. Waddill, 31 Gratt. 469, notwithstanding what was said in Bull's Case, 14 Gratt. 613, that if a party objects to a ruling of the court during the trial, either in admitting or excluding evidence, or giving or refusing instructions, or otherwise, and intends to except to such ruling, he must make known such intention at the time of the ruling, or at least before verdict, and if the bill of exceptions cannot be drawn up at once, liberty should be reserved to do so during the term, and if he neglect to prefer exceptions until after verdict, he will not then be allowed to do so." (Italics ours.)

Again, in Danks v. Rodeheaver, 26 W. Va. 296, JUDGE GREEN makes a review of the Virginia and West Virginia cases in point, and, after laying down the proposition of the principal case as contained in the first paragraph of this note, quotes at length from Danville Bank v. Waddill, 31 Gratt. 477, and says that, in his judgment, it is impossible to regard the ruling laid down or deducible from the decisions in the principal case, and Stevenson v. Wallace, 27 Gratt. 94 (which follows the principal case), as modifications of the general rule (i. e. the rule as above laid down from Danville Bank v. Waddill) deducible from the current of Virginia cases; but that these two cases must be regarded as in irreconcilable conflict with the general rule. In this case, the general rule as set out by by Danville v. Waddill, is expressly approved.

fully, willfully, and of their malice aforethought, violently and cruelly, with their hands, fists and feet, beat, choke, strike and kick the said Robert B. Farquhar, &c., &c.; but it omitted the word "deliberately."

When the prisoners were brought to the bar, they demurred to the indictment; but their demurrer was overruled. They then pleaded "not guilty;" and elected to be tried separately: Whereupon, Bull was put upon his trial; and was found guilty of voluntary manslaughter; and was sentenced to the penitentiary for three years.

On the trial, the commonwealth offered to prove the dying declarations of the deceased, which were objected to by the prisoner's counsel; but the objection was overruled, and the evidence admitted: To which the prisoner excepted. It appeared in evidence that on the morning of the day on which Farquhar died, his brother informed the mayor of the city that he was dying; and the mayor sent two police officers to hear his statement of the cause of his death. When they arrived at the place, they found there the physician who attended Farquhar, and the Reverend 615 T. V. Moore, *who had been conversing with him. At the instance of the policemen, Mr. Moore, having first enquired of the physician whether it might be done with propriety, undertook to inform Farquhar that he was dying; and did make the communication to him; though there is a slight variance between what he states he said, and the statement of one of the policemen. Mr. Moore stated that he said, "Mr. Farquhar, it is the opinion of the doctors that you cannot possibly recover, and in view of this fact it is necessary, for legal purposes, that your testimony should be taken in regard to the causes of the injuries under which you are now suffering." The policeman stated, that Mr. Moore told him that in the opinion of his physician, unless he could be relieved of that shortness of breath under which he was then suffering, he would die very soon, and that there were persons there sent by the mayor, to hear his last statement of what he was then suffering, and who inflicted it. They both agree that he then made the statements to which they testify; and that he was asked if the statements he had made were made as his dying declarations; to which he answered that they were. The policeman stated further, that after the statement was made Mr. Moore then informed him that the doctors were of opinion that he was certainly dying; and that he would die very soon. That Mr. Moore then requested the witness to repeat to Farquhar what he had previously said; and then Mr. Moore asked him if he made that statement again, and did he make it as a dying declaration; and he said he did. It was proved that Farquhar was entirely conscious and rational at the time he made the statement; and that he died about an hour afterwards.

After the verdict was tendered, the prisoner moved the court to set it aside, and grant him a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence. But the court overruled 616 the motion; *and the prisoner excepted. The bill of exceptions contained the evidence given on the trial and not the facts proved. But this court was of opinion that, looking at the evidence of the commonwealth and so much of the evidence on behalf of the prisoner as was not in conflict with the evidence of the commonwealth, the verdict was not contrary to the evidence.

After the court had overruled the motion for a new trial, as stated in the second bill of exceptions, and that bill had been signed and sealed, the prisoner removed the court to set aside the verdict and grant him a new trial, on the ground that the court had misdirected the jury in regard to the law, in an instruction which the court gave at the instance and request of the jury. That instruction was as follows: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the deceased and the prisoner were engaged in a sudden and mutual combat, in which no weapon dangerous in itself was used, and during the progress of the fight the prisoner struck the deceased an ordinary blow or blows with his fists or feet, without any intention either to kill the deceased or to do him any great bodily harm, but to repel his attack; and that the death of the deceased was caused thereby accidentally and apart from the prisoner's intention, then the prisoner is guilty of involuntary manslaughter. If, however, though no weapon dangerous in itself was used, but only the fists and feet, yet if the jury are satisfied from the evidence that the manner of inflicting the blows was cruel and unusual, and exceeded in number and violence what was necessary to repel the deceased, and the deceased died of such beating, then the prisoner is guilty of voluntary manslaughter."

After this instruction was given, the court, at the instance of the prisoner, instructed the jury as follows: "But if the jury shall upon the whole evidence, 617 entertain *a reasonable doubt that the deceased came to his death by violence inflicted by the prisoner at the bar, then they must acquit him."

The court overruled the motion; and the prisoner again excepted.

After this last motion was overruled, the prisoner again moved the court to set aside the verdict and grant him a new trial, upon the ground of the misconduct and irregularity of the jury. To sustain this motion, eight of the jurors were examined. The jury had been hung for six days, ten or eleven of them being in favor of a verdict of voluntary manslaughter, and one in favor of a verdict of acquittal, or at most, of involuntary manslaughter. It was proposed to this juror, that if he would concur in a verdict of voluntary manslaughter, the jury would sign a petition to the governor for the pardon of the prisoner. This he at length agreed to do, and did in fact unite in the verdict, on that understanding with the other members of the jury; though at the time, as he swore, he did not believe he was guilty of that offence. The court refused to set aside the verdict on this ground; and the prisoner again excepted. And judgment having been rendered on the verdict, he applied to this court for a writ of error; which was awarded.

Gilmer and August, for the prisoner, insisted:

1st. That the demurrer to the indictment should have been sustained; because the word "deliberately," employed in the statute to describe the offence, was not in the indictment. They cited Howel's Case, 5 Gratt. 664.

MONCURE, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The court is of opinion, that the Circuit court did not err in overruling the demurrer to the indictment. The only question which seems to be raised, or intended to be raised by the demurrer, is, Whether, in an indictment for murder, the offence should be described in the terms used in the statute defining murder in the first degree. This identical question was raised by the demurrer to the indictment in Livingston's Case, decided during the present term of this court, supra 592; and it is only necessary to refer to the opinion delivered by Judge Daniel in that case, for the reasons of the court for sustaining the judgment of the Circuit court in overruling the demurrer in this case.

The court is further of opinion, that the Circuit court did not err in overruling the objection of the prisoner to the introduction of the dying declarations of the deceased as evidence. The alleged ground of the objection is, that no sufficient foundation for their introduction had been laid. The rule of law on this subject is now well settled, that to render dying declarations admissible evidence, they must be shown to have been made when the declarant is under a sense of impending death, and without any exrectation or hope of recovery. Whether so made or not, is a preliminary question to be determined by the court on all the circumstances of the case. See 2 Russ. on Crimes 752-767; Vass' Case, 3 Leigh 786; Hill's Case, 2 Gratt. 594. There is no difficulty in the application 621 *of the rule of law just stated to the circumstances of this case; which are fully set forth in the first bill of exceptions. According to the facts as stated by the Reverend Mr. Moore, there can be no doubt of the admissibility of the evidence. The declarations were made in about an hour before the declarant's death, on being informed of the opinion of his physicians that he could not possibly recover, and when all his acts and words indicate that he had not the slightest hope of recovery. There is some variance between the facts as stated by that witness, and as stated by the witness Tyler. If the variance were material, we would have to regard that statement as true which would sustain the judgment of the Circuit court. But the variance is immaterial. When the deceased first made the declarations, according to the evidence of Tyler, he may possibly have had some faint hope of recovery. But if he had, it must have been utterly extinguished by the information subsequently received from his physicians, through Mr. Moore, that he was certainly dying, and would die very soon. After he received that information, he repeated or reaffirmed the declarations; which made them competent evidence, if they would not otherwise have been so.

The court is further of opinion, that the Circuit court did not err in overruling the motion of the prisoner to set aside the verdict, upon the ground that it was contrary to law and evidence. The bill of exceptions states the evidence of the witnesses examined on the trial, instead of the facts appearing to the court to be proved by such evidence. See Vaiden's Case, 12 Gratt. 717. This court cannot therefore, according to our well settled rule on the subject, take cognizance of the case and reverse the judgment, unless, by rejecting all the parol evidence for the exceptor, and giving full force and credit to that of the adverse party, the decision of the court below still 622 appears to *be wrong. Id. and the cases therein cited. Applying that rule to this case, it certainly does not appear that the decision is wrong; or at least that there is any error therein to the prejudice of the prisoner. Full force and effect must, according to that rule, be given to the dying declarations as proved by Tyler, that the prisoner struck and kicked the deceased without provocation, and for no cause except that the prisoner and those who joined him in the affray said the deceased had talked about a young lady in Haley's house, which the deceased said he had never done: and also to the evidence of two of the brothers of the deceased, who proved that the prisoner said he did kick the deceased, and intended and tried to kill him. Regarding these as facts, and taking them in connection with the other evidence of the commonwealth regarded in the same way, the prisoner was certainly guilty of voluntary manslaughter at least. But the result will not be varied, even if the objection to the form of the bill of exceptions be disregarded, and all the evidence therein set forth, as well for as against the prisoner, be considered. In pursuing that mode of deciding the case, it would of course be necessary to disregard all the evidence of the prisoner in conflict with the evidence against him. But there is in fact no such conflict as, in any view of the conflicting evidence, could have the effect of reducing the offence below the grade of voluntary manslaughter, if full force and effect be given to the evidence against the prisoner which is consistent with the evidence in his favor.

The court is further of opinion, that the Circuit court did not err in overruling the motion of the prisoner to set aside the verdict, upon the ground that the court had misdirected the jury in regard to the law, in an instruction which the court gave, at the instance and request of the jury. The instruction is in these words: "If the 623 jury believe from the evidence *that the deceased and the prisoner were engaged in a sudden and mutual combat, in which no weapon dangerous in itself was used, and during the progress of the fight the prisoner struck the deceased an ordinary blow or blows with his fists or feet, without any intention, either to kill the deceased or to do him any great bodily harm, but to repel his attack, and that the death of the deceased was caused thereby, accidentally and apart from the prisoner's intention; then the prisoner is guilty of involuntary manslaughter. If, however, though no weapon dangerous in itself was used, but only the fists and feet; yet if the jury are satisfied from the evidence that the manner of inflicting the blows was cruel and unusual, and exceeded in number and violence what was necessary to repel the deceased, and the deceased died of such beating; then the prisoner is guilty of voluntary manslaughter." An objection is taken to each branch of this instruction ---the first, which defines involuntary, and the second, voluntary manslaughter. The objection taken to the first branch is, that it embraces a case of excusable homicide, se defendendo, or by misadventure. The objection is based on the words "to repel his attack," used in the instruction; and it was contended that a person has a right to repel an attack, using no more force than is necessary for the purpose; and that if death be caused thereby, accidentally and apart from his intention, he is guilty of no offence. "For (in the language of writers on criminal law) no man is required by law to remain defenceless, and suffer another to beat him as long as he pleases without resistance, although it be evident that the other does not aim at his life; but he may lawfully exert so much force as is necessary to compel him to desist." Davis' Cr. Law 78; 1 East P. C. 286. The objection taken to the second branch of the instruction is, that in declaring the prisoner guilty of voluntary manslaughter, 624 *if his "manner of inflicting the blows was cruel and unusual, and they exceeded in number and violence what was necessary to repel the deceased," &c., the instruction refers to an actual necessity, and not a necessity reasonably believed by the prisoner to exist.

The court is of opinion, that whatever objection might well be taken to particular words in the instruction, detached from the context, none can properly be taken to the instruction considered altogether. The words "to repel his attack," are explained by the rest of the instruction; and especially the commencement of it, which supposes that "the deceased and the prisoner were engaged in a sudden and mutual combat," and that "during the progress of the fight, the prisoner struck the deceased an ordinary blow," &c. By the very terms of the instruction, all idea of self-defence is excluded, blame is imputed to both parties, and certainly to the prisoner, from the beginning to the end of the affray, and he must be guilty at least of manslaughter. The words "to repel his attack," construed with the context, plainly mean "to maintain the fight," and might well have been omitted, without altering the sense.—Though, if taken in their literal meaning, they would not, in their connection, render the instruction erroneous. Men engaged in a sudden and mutual combat do not often inflict blows merely to repel the attack of each other. But they may possibly do so; and if, in doing so, one kills the other, he is guilty of manslaughter; because the mutual combat, in the progress of which the mortal blow is given, is an unlawful act. The word "necessary," in the second branch of the instruction, means reasonably necessary, or what the prisoner, under all the circumstances, might reasonably believe to be necessary. The instruction, however, must be construed in reference to all the circumstances of the case; and so construed, there cannot 625 be any doubt as to its meaning *or propriety. There was no evidence on either side tending to make out a case of self-defence or misadventure. The whole evidence tended to make out a case of manslaughter at least. The jury were no doubt all satisfied that it was manslaughter; but whether voluntary or involuntary, they were in doubt, or disagreed. They therefore requested the court to define the difference between the two, and the court defined it in reference to the case which the evidence tended to prove; that is, a case in which the homicide is committed in the course of a sudden and mutual combat, by blows inflicted with fists or feet; the court telling the jury, in effect, that in such cases, if the blows were ordinary blows, inflicted without any intention to kill or do great bodily harm, the offence was involuntary manslaughter; but if the blows were cruel and unusual, and excessive in number and violence, the offence was voluntary manslaughter. It does not appear that the prisoner was dissatisfied with this instruction at the time it was given; but the contrary is to be presumed. He did not except to it, nor save the point; but asked the court further to instruct the jury, that if upon the whole evidence they should entertain a reasonable doubt that the deceased came to his death by violence inflicted by the prisoner, then they must acquit him; which further instruction the court gave, in the very words in which it was asked. It cannot be expected that a court, in the hurry of a criminal trial, can be always ready to define a crime, or discriminate between the different grades of a crime, in the same accuracy of language which would be used by a writer on criminal law. If a party be dissatisfied with an instruction, he ought to state his objections at the time, in order that the court may have an opportunity of removing them. If no objection be made at the time, nor an exception be then taken, or the point saved; but objection be made, for the first
626 time, after *verdict, and in the form of a motion to set it aside, the court will consider whether, under all the circumstances, the party has been prejudiced by the instruction; and if of opinion that a just verdict has been rendered, according to the law and the evidence, will not set it aside on account of that objection. Viewing the case in that aspect, this court certainly cannot say that the Circuit court erred in refusing to set aside the verdict for misdirection.

The court is further of opinion, that the Circuit court did not err in overruling the motion of the prisoner to set aside the verdict, upon the ground of the misconduct and irregularity of the jury. The alleged misconduct is, that McKenna, one of the jury, being of opinion that the prisoner was guilty, at most, of involuntary manslaughter, yet concurred in the verdict finding him guilty of voluntary manslaughter, upon an understanding and agreement with the rest of the jury, that all would unite in a petition to the governor to pardon him. The only evidence of the said misconduct, is the affidavit of the juror, taken the day after the jury had returned their verdict and were discharged, and his testimony, and that of seven other jurors, taken three days thereafter in court. It may be conceded, for the purposes of this case, that the said juror, and all who concurred with him in the said understanding and agreement, were guilty of a misdemeanor, for which they were liable to be punished by fine and imprisonment. And it may also be conceded, that the alleged misconduct would have been good ground for setting aside the verdict, if it had been established by admissible and sufficient testimony. But the question is, Whether the testimony of the jurors was sufficient, or even admissible evidence to prove it?

In England, the authorities were formerly unsettled and conflicting on the question, Whether the testimony *of jurors 627 is admissible to impeach their verdict? The affirmative of the question seems to have been held in Philips v. Fowler, Barnes 441; Parr v. Seames, Id. 438; Millish v. Arnold, Bunb. R. 51; and Aylett v. Jewel, 2 Wm. Black. R. 1299; and the negative, in Prior v. Powers, 1 Keb. R. 811. But in Vaise v. Delaval, 1 T. R. 11, which is considered a leading case on this subject, there was a motion for a rule to set aside a verdict upon an affidavit of two jurors, who swore that the jury, being divided in their opinion, tossed up, and that the plaintiff's friends won. Lord Mansfield, Ch. J., said, "The court cannot receive such an affidavit from any of the jurymen themselves, in all of whom such misconduct is a very high misdemeanor; but in every such case the court must derive their knowledge from some other source," &c. This case was soon followed by Owen v. Warburton, 4 Bos. & Pul. 326, in which Sir James Mansfield, Ch. J., said, "We have conversed with the other judges upon this subject, and we are all of opinion that the affidavit of a juryman cannot be received. It is singular, indeed, that almost the only evidence of which the case admits, should be shut out; but, considering the arts which might be used, if a contrary rule were to prevail, we think it necessary to exclude such evidence. If it were understood to be the law that a juryman might set aside a verdict by such evidence, it might sometimes happen that a juryman, being a friend to one of the parties, and not being able to bring over his companions to his opinion, might propose a decision by lot, with a view afterwards to set aside the verdict by his own affidavit, if the decision should be against him." The last two cases above cited have firmly settled the question in England; and the practice has never since been changed or shaken.

In the United States, there has been some conflict of judicial opinion upon the question, especially in the earlier cases; but the practice appears to be now 628 *generally settled, to reject the testimony of jurors when offered to impeach their verdict. The cases on the subject are too numerous to be cited. Most of them were referred to in the argument of this case; and are also collected and commented upon in 1 Graham & Waterman on New Trials 61-131; 2 Id. 577-594; and 3 Id. 1428-1450. Some of them, and of the English cases, are reviewed in The State v. Freeman, 5 Conn. R. 348, in which Hosmer, C. J., delivering the opinion of the court, concludes by saying, "The opinion of almost the whole legal world is adverse to the reception of the testimony in question, and in my opinion, on invincible foundations." In Johnson v. Davenport, 3 J. J. Marsh. R. 390, the court, in refusing a new trial, said, "The testimony of one or more of the jurors, to prove such misconduct of the jury as would invalidate their verdict or to question the purity of the motives by which they had been influenced in rendering it, or to explain the ground either of law or fact which influenced them, with a view to impeach the verdict which they had returned, is inadmissible, according to the whole current of modern decisions. The dangerous tendency of receiving testimony of the jurors for such a purpose, is too obvious to require comment." "It is indeed very difficult (the court further said) to lay down any precise rule, the application of which to each particular case would be sufficient to determine whether the affidavits of the jurors ought to be received to invalidate their verdict. It seems to be universally agreed, that if received at all, it should be with great caution; and we are of opinion that their admissibility should be confined to cases of mistake clearly made out, and which may be conceded as true, without subjecting the jury to any imputation of impure motives or palpable impropriety of conduct, and in relation to the proof of which there should be no reasonable ground for suspicion 629 *that they might have been tampered with." Tennessee, it is believed, is the only state in which it is now considered as settled that the testimony of jurors is admissible, and may be sufficient evidence of their misconduct to set aside their verdict. It was so held in an early case, Crawford v. The State, 2 Yerg. R. 60 (a case very similar in its features to this); which has been since followed in other cases, and especially in Cochran v. The State, 7 Humph. R. 544. But in Hudson's Case, 9 Yerg. R. 408, the court said, "It is a dangerous principle, and we are not disposed to extend it one step beyond what it has already been carried." And in Norris v. The State, 3 Humph. R. 333, the court adhering to that view, examined the prior cases, to ascertain how far the principle had been carried, and modified the rule accordingly.

In Virginia, the practice has never been settled. In several cases applications have been made to set aside verdicts on the testimony of jurors; and in one or two cases the application has prevailed. But in the latter, the testimony tended to prove mere mistake, and not misconduct of the jury. In most of the cases, the court referred to the danger of receiving such testimony, and the great caution with which it ought to be received, if at all. In Cochran v. Street, Wash. 79, the jury were divided in opinion; but the minority, believing that the opinion of the majority was to prevail, therefore concurred in the verdict. The court admitted that "to meddle with the verdict of the jury upon the evidence of some of the jurors, is a delicate business, and should be proceeded in with caution, to prevent the mischief of the jurymen being tampered with;" and referred with approbation to the decision of Lord Mansfield in Vaise v. Delaval, 1 T. R. 11; but as it was clear that the verdict was found under a mistake (the fact having been proved by a large majority of the jury, and denied by none of 630 *them, and it not appearing that there had been any tampering with them to obtain the information), the court awarded a new trial. That case was decided in 1792, when the practice was more unsettled than it now is. Since then, the tendency of judicial opinion has been more and more in favor of the exclusion of such testimony. Whether, if that were a new case, it would now be decided in the same way, is at least a doubtful question. But it rests entirely on the ground of an innocent mistake, clearly proved, showing that the verdict was never assented to by all the jurors, and was not in truth their verdict. In Bridge v. Eggleston, 14 Mass. R. 245, a similar case was decided otherwise. In Price's ex'or v. Fauqua's adm'r, 1 Hen. & Munf. 385, the court unanimously affirmed the judgment of the District court, refusing a new trial, on the affidavits of two of the jurors that they were alone influenced in finding for the plaintiff, by a fact stated in the jury room by one of the jury; the ground assigned for such refusal being "because it would be dangerous to admit a new trial on such information from the jurymen, and the new trial would be against the justice of the case." In Shobe v. Bell, 1 Rand. 39, one of the grounds of a motion for a new trial was that three of the jury were influenced to concur in the verdict by improper motives; and this ground was sustained by the affidavits of four of the jury. The Superior court overruled the motion, and this court affirmed the judgment. In Moffett v. Bowman, 6 Gratt. 219, a motion was made for a new trial, founded on the affidavit of nine of the jurors, stating that the verdict, as returned and recorded, did not contain the verdict which they intended to render, and that the same was returned by them under a mistake as to its legal effect. The manner in which the mistake was made was also stated in the affidavit. The Circuit court overruled the motion. This 631 court, being of opinion, *"from the evidence adduced on the motion for a new trial (which evidence was, under the circumstances, properly received by the Circuit court), that the intention of the jury was not accomplished by their verdict, and not being satisfied with the verdict on the merits, reversed the judgment, and awarded a new trial. In Hansbarger's adm'r v. Kinney, Id. 287, the verdict was set aside conditionally by the Circuit court, upon the evidence of some of the jury that they had been induced to concur in the verdict by a misunderstanding of an instruction of the court. This court reversed the judgment, being of opinion, "that to permit a verdict, which, in the opinion of the court that tried the cause was not contrary to the evidence, and by which, for ought that appears to this court, full justice was done, to be set aside upon the evidence of a few of the jurors, made under the circumstances described by the record, respecting their understanding of an instruction of the court upon questions of law raised at the trial, would lead to dangerous consequences, as holding out inducements to tamper with the jurors, after they had dispersed, and may have forgotten the circumstances which did actually occur." In Thompson's Case, 8 Gratt. 637, the court waived the decision of the question as to the competency of the evidence of jurors to impeach or invalidate their own verdict (it not being necessary in that case to decide it), but took occasion to say, "The question is now well settled in England against the competency, and the great preponderance of American authority is the same way." In Koiner v. Rankin's heirs, 11 Gratt. 420, Judge Lee, in his opinion, in which the other judges concurred, remarks, that "while affidavits of jurors will generally be received in support of the verdict, they will not readily be received to invalidate it." "The leaning of the courts of most approved authority is against 632 the practice of grounding *motions for new trials upon them; and a disposition has been manifested, greatly to restrict the class of cases in which, upon such affidavits, new trials will be allowed."

In view of all the authorities, and of the reason on which they are founded, we think that, as a general rule, the testimony of jurors ought not to be received to impeach their verdict, especially on the ground of their own misconduct. And, without intending to decide that there are no exceptions to the rule, we think that even in cases in which the testimony may be admissible, it ought to be received with very great caution. A contrary rule would hold out to unsuccessful parties and their friends, the strongest temptation to tamper with jurors after their discharge, and would otherwise be productive of the greatest evils. A corrupt juror, wishing to favor one of the parties, might propose to decide the case by lot, knowing that he could have the verdict set aside if it did not suit him: Or, wishing to insure the discharge of a prisoner tried for felony, might refuse to concur with the other jurors in finding a true verdict of guilty, unless they would unite with him in a petition for a pardon, believing that he could have the verdict set aside if the pardon were refused. In almost every case, especially every case of felony in which the jury is kept together for several days, a plausible ground might be shown for setting aside the verdict; upon the sufficiency of which the court would have to decide according to its own discretion. Thus, the value of jury trial would be greatly impaired, and the whole administration of justice dependent upon it would be involved in the most painful uncertainty. A juror who comes forward to impeach his verdict on the ground of his own misconduct, has little or no claim to our credit; and the safest genefal rule is to shut the door against him. A person convicted of perjury is an in-633 competent witness. *Why not a juror who denies the truth of his verdict; and, if his denial be true, thereby convicts himself of the highest moral, if not legal perjury? The verdict is surely the best evidence of his opinion of the case; and he at least should not be permitted, as a general rule, to impeach it. Little or no evil can result from the exclusion of his testimony: none in comparison with the great evils which would result from its admission. The verdict is rendered in open court, and in cases of felony, necessarily in the presence of the prisoner. The jury may be polled, and ought to be, if there is the least doubt of the free concurrence of all the jury in the verdict. In that way, any difficulty or disagreement which may be among them, can generally be discovered. In that way, it was discovered in Harden's Case, 1 Bailey's R. 3, that four of the jurors dissented from the verdict. In that way, doubtless, the same discovery might have been made in Cochran v. Street, 1 Wash. 79; and in the same way, it might have been discovered in Johnson v. Davenport, 3 J. J. Marsh. R. 390, that one of the jurors dissented from the verdict: for he stated in his affidavit, "that if his name had been called and he asked whether he agreed to the verdict, he would have answered in the negative." Is it not more reasonable that this easy legal precaution should be used, than that affidavits should be obtained of the jurors after their discharge, and made the foundation of a motion for a new trial? Again: the court, if not satisfied with the verdict, may and ought to set it aside. And if it improperly refuse to do so, the appellate court may revise and reverse the judgment. So there can be little or no danger that injustice will arise from the operation of the general rule in question.

The court is of opinion, that this case falls under the general rule, and not under any exception to it, and that the testimony of the jurors is not sufficient 634 *or admissible evidence to prove their alleged misconduct, gross as it undoubtedly was. It is not pretended that the verdict was founded on any mistake. The jury all concurred in it, perfectly understood its meaning and effect, and intended that it should operate accordingly. The Circuit court was satisfied with the verdict, as being, sustained by the law and the evidence; and this court concurs in that opinion. We therefore think the Circuit court was right in refusing to set aside the verdict on the ground of the misconduct and irregularity of the jury.

Upon the whole, the court is of opinion that there is no error in the judgment, and that it be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

635 *Tanner v. The Commonwealth.

October Term, 1857, Richmond.

1. Larceny—Lost Property.—Lost property may be the subject of larceny.
2. Same—Same—What Constitutes.—To constitute a larceny of lost property, the person finding it must know or have the means of knowing the owner, or have reason to believe that the owner may be discovered, and he must intend at the time of finding the property to appropriate it to his own use.

At the April term 1857 of the Circuit court of the city of Richmond, Floyd Tanner was indicted for larceny in stealing bank notes of the value of one hundred and twenty dollars, the property of Alfred Gwathmey. On the trial he was found guilty, and the jury fixed the term of his imprisonment in the penitentiary at one year: And he thereupon moved the court to set aside the verdict and grant him a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was not warranted by the evidence. But the court overruled the motion, and rendered a judgment upon the verdict. And the prisoner thereupon applied to this court for a writ of error; which was allowed. The facts are stated in the opinion of Judge Allen.

August, for the prisoner.

The Attorney General, for the commonwealth.

ALLEN, P. In Hunt's Case, 13 Gratt. 757, the opinion was expressed that under particular circumstances, goods actually lost might be the subject of larceny. Such was the doctrine established in the cases of Regina v. Thurborn, 5 British Crown Cas. 387; and Regina v. Preston, 6 Id.
636 353. The cases on the subject *are reviewed in a note upon the first and leading case before cited, in 2 Lead. Crim. Cas. 31. It is there shown that according to the whole current of modern authority, as well in this country as in England, with perhaps the exception of one case decided in Tennessee, Porter v. The State, Martin & Yerger 226, lost property may be the subject of larceny; and that if a taking and fraudulent intent coexist with a knowledge of the owner, the crime is complete. The correctness of this general proposition has been questioned by the prisoner's counsel, in the argument here, who has insisted that the case in which it is supposed the rule was established, were cases in which the property had been merely mislaid, where the constructive possession remained with the owner, and not to cases where the property had been actually lost by the owner; as where property was left by mistake in the prisoner's store, and he concealed and denied all knowledge of it; or where a servant found a roll of bank notes in a passage of her master's house, and did not inform her master, but denied she had the money; or where a coachman found a box in his coach, which he must have known belonged to a passenger whom he had carried; in these and other cases of a like character cited in 2 Lead. Crim. Cas. 34, the property cannot be said to be lost. For as was said by Parke, B., in Regina v. Thurborn, "Perhaps these cases might be classed amongst those in which the taker is not justified in concluding that the goods were lost, because there is little doubt he must have believed that the owner would know where to find them again, and he had no pretence to consider them abandoned or derelict."

In such case, where the owner knows where the property is, and could recover the actual possession when he desired it, if it had not been removed by the thief, the property is not lost; and not being abandoned or derelict the owner has 637 still the constructive *possession, as much so as of his horse feeding in the public highway. And so where goods are actually lost by the owner, his property is not divested; and such property draws to it the constructive possession. If in such case the original taking was felonious, with intent to take entire dominion over them at the time, and the finder at the time of taking either know the owner, or from the place where the property is found, or evidence of his previous acquaintance with the ownership of it, or the nature of the marks on it, have the means of ascertaining the owner, or have reason to believe he can be found, the taking under such circumstances with such intent and knowledge is tortious. "Such possession (the judge observes in Ransom v. The State, 22 Conn. R. 153), being tortious, the taking by which it was acquired is not a lawful taking, and therefore trespass may be maintained by the owner against the taker."

But although lost property may thus be the subject of larceny, the cases referred to show that if there are no marks on the property, or other circumstances indicating the owner as aforesaid, the appropriation to the finder's use does not amount to larceny.

In the case of Thurborn, the accused found a note which had been accidentally dropped on the high road. There was no name or mark on it indicating who was the owner, nor were there any circumstances attending the finding which would enable him to discover to whom the note belonged when he picked it up; nor had he any reason to believe that the owner knew where to find it again. But he meant to appropriate it when he picked it up. The day after, and before he had disposed of it, he was informed that the prosecutor was the owner, and had dropped it accidentally. He then changed it, and appropriated the money taken, to his own use. The jury found that he had reason to believe and did believe it to be prosecutor's property 638 *before he thus changed the note. On these facts the court held that the first taking did not amount to larceny, because the note was really lost, and there was no mark on it, or other circumstance to indicate then who was the owner, or that he might be found, nor any evidence to rebut the presumption that would arise from the finding of the note as proved, that he believed the owner could not be found, and therefore the original taking was not felonious. And although he took the note with the intention of appropriating it to his own use when he picked it up, yet the possession was lawful, the original taking was not punishable, and the subsequent conversion, though he then knew the owner, was not a trespass.

In the case of the Queen v. Dixon, 7 Cox C. C. 35, the accused found a purse of money in a public place, but which had no mark on it by which its owner could be known; the jury found that the prisoner then believed that the owner could be traced, yet it was decided not to amount to larceny.

In the case of Manson v. The State, 22 Conn. R. 153, a pocket book and money were lost on the public highway near an inn, and within two hours the property was found by the accused at the place where lost. About the time the property was so found the owner gave notice of his loss at the inn, and publicly offered a reward for its restoration. There was no mark upon the property indicating who the owner was, nor any other evidence tending to prove that the accused, at the time of the finding, knew or had the means of knowing the owner. The accused used no means of enquiry or otherwise, to ascertain who was the owner, but concealed the fact that he had found it, and converted it to his own use.

On these facts the court instructed the jury, that if the accused, at the time he found the property, knew, or had the means of knowing the owner, and did not 639 *restore it to him, but converted it to his own use, he was guilty of larceny. This was held to be a misdirection, because the conviction by the charge was made to depend on the question, whether, with a knowledge or the means of knowledge as to the owner, the accused converted the goods to his own use, after he first took them; and not upon the question, whether, at the time of such taking, he intended so to convert them. The subsequent conversion was evidence of the intention with which they were first taken, but did not of itself make that taking felonious.

It remains to apply these rules as illustrated by the facts of some of the leading cases, to the present case. The indictment charges the prisoner with having on the 19th of November 1856, stolen two bank notes of fifty dollars each, and two other bank notes of ten dollars each, the property of Alfred Gwathmey.

The jury found him guilty, and ascertained the term of his confinement in the penitentiary at twelve months. The prisoner thereupon moved the court to set the verdict aside, upon the ground that it was contrary to the law and evidence, and to grant him a new trial. The motion was overruled; to which decision the prisoner excepted; and on his motion, the court certified the facts proved on the trial. The facts were few, and are set forth with much precision in the bill of exceptions. They prove that the pocket book with the bank notes it contained were actually lost. The owner had sent a boy with his coat to a store to have it repaired, forgetting that his pocket book was in the pocket. The pocket book was dropped out and lost between the office of the owner and the store, about three squares off, in the city of Richmond. It was further proved that the owner, remembering he had left his pocket book in the coat, went in pursuit of the boy, and overtook him as he was entering the store, and it was then discovered 640 that the pocket book *had been dropped out. It was further proved that the prisoner was seen to pick up something about sixty yards from the office of the owner, and on the way between said office and the store aforesaid, on the morning of the 19th of November, about ten o'clock; what it was, the witness could not say, but he thought it was a pocket book. The accused was arrested about 8 o'clock in the evening of the same day, and while on his way to prison he denied having the money and all knowledge of it. After he was taken to the watch-house and an examination of his person made; two fifty and two ten dollar notes in a little purse were found secreted in the prisoner's cell. After the money was found he was asked what he had done with the pocket book, the other ten dollar note, and the papers that were in the pocket book; to which the prisoner replied, that that was all the money he had found; that the pocket book and papers were with his wife; and if the officer would ask his wife for them, she would give them to him. That the officer went to the house of the prisoner's wife, who did not give him any pocket book, but gave him two papers, which, to the best of the witnesses' recollection, were receipts for some small sums which had been paid; but to whom they were executed, or by whom or for what sums, the witness did not recollect.

There is no fact proved showing that the prisoner, at the time of the finding, knew the owner, or had the means of knowing him, or had reason to believe that he might be found. Nor can such fact be inferred with any reasonable degree of certainty, from any of the facts actually proved. It was not proved that there was any name or mark on the pocket book, or other circumstance to indicate then who was the owner. The interval between the loss of the pocket book and the finding was brief; as it was about ten o'clock in the morning when the coat was sent to the store, 641 the *owner overtook the boy with the coat as he was entering the store, and discovered that the pocket book had been dropped out and lost, and the prisoner about the same hour in the day was seen to pick up something on the way between the office and the store.

But these facts do not warrant the inference that the prisoner saw the pocket book drop from the pocket of the coat. The place was in the public street of the city of Richmond; and the fact that the pocket book must have been accidentally dropped and lost but a few minutes before it was found, does not indicate to the finder who was the owner. It was not proved by the witness who saw him pick it up, that he saw it drop from the coat the boy was carrying, and there is no more reason to infer that it was seen to drop from the coat by the prisoner than by the witness who saw him pick up something which he thought was a pocket book. It is not shown that there was any mark or name on the pocket book to point out the owner; he was examined and does not prove the fact to be so. The papers delivered to the officer by the prisoner's wife are not connected with the prisoner or the pocket book, by any fact proved in the cause; and if they were, it does not appear to whom or by whom the papers were executed.

We have seen from the authorities, that where there are no indicia by which the owner can be found, the appropriation to the finder's use does not amount to larceny; for as it has been held the finder of a chattel actually lost is not bound to take any means to discover the owner; he must know him immediately from marks about the property or otherwise. Of this essential fact to constitute larceny in such case, there is no direct proof, nor can it be inferred with reasonable certainty from the facts proved; the probabilities are against such inference.

The present case is weaker in some 642 respects than *the case of Regina v. Thurborn. There the prisoner meant to appropriate the note found to his own use when he picked it up, and before he had disposed of it he was informed who the owner was, and that he had dropped the note accidentally. Here there is no fact to show that the original taking was not innocent as well as legal. The time when the intention was formed to assume entire dominion over the property, is left to inference. Nor does it appear that when he formed such intention, he had any knowledge of the owner. As, however, for the purpose of arriving at the intention with which the possession was first taken, evidence of the conduct of the prisoner and the circumstances, preceding, attending and following the taking would be competent, it is unnecessary to enquire whether, if that were the sole question in this case, the facts proved would establish an original taking animo furandi. There being nothing to indicate the owner at the time, and the property being actually lost, the accused had a legal right to take it. The possession so acquired could not be said to be against the will of any individual; for being lost and having no knowledge of the owner, or means of knowing to whom it belonged at the time of taking, it was uncertain whether any owner would appear. The taking did not amount to a trespass, and so no larceny could have been committed. If these views are correct, the facts proved did not make out the larceny charged, and the verdict should have been set aside, and a new trial granted.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Allen, P.

Judgment reversed.

643 *Finch v. The Commonwealth.

January Term, 1858, Richmond.

1. Criminal Law—What Constitutes "Breaking"—Case at Bar.—An entry into a dwelling-house in the daytime, through a door that was so closed that it came within the casing, and to open which required some degree of force, constitutes in law a breaking: though there was no fastening of any other kind on the door.

2. Same — Statute — Word "Break." — The word "break," in the Code, ch. 162, § 12, p. 728, is borrowed from the law in regard to burglary, and is to be understood as it would be when used in a charge of burglary.

3. Same—Costs—Liability of Prisoner.†—A prisoner convicted of a felony, and obtaining a writ of error to the Court of appeals, where the judgment is affirmed, is not responsible for the fees of the clerk or the attorney general. See Code, ch. 211, § 10, 11, p. 782.

Allen Finch was indicted in the Circuit court of Pittsylvania county for a felony. The first count charged that he did feloniously break and enter, in the day time, the store-house of Yancey W. Ingram, adjoining and occupied with the dwelling-house of said Ingram, with intent to commit a larceny. The second count charged that he broke and entered into the dwelling-house of said Ingram, in the day time, with the same intent.

On the trial there were questions whether the prisoner was examined for the fact stated in the second count; and as to the competency of one of the jurors; but these were waived by the counsel for the prisoner in this court. The only question made in this court is, Whether there was in contemplation of law, a breaking into the premises? On that point the judge below instructed the jury, that if from the evidence they should believe that an entry was effected by the prisoner through a door which 644 was open or partially open, *that this was in law no breaking. But if they should believe from the evidence, that an entry was effected by the prisoner through a door that was so closed that it came within the casing of the door, and to open which required some degree of force, that this constituted in law a breaking, though there was no fastening of any other kind on said door. To this instruction the prisoner excepted.

The jury found the prisoner guilty, and fixed the term of his imprisonment in the penitentiary at one year; and there was judgment accordingly. And the prisoner asked for a new trial, which was refused; and at his instance the facts proved were stated on the record. Upon these facts the only question was as to the breaking. It appeared that the door through which the prisoner entered the house was a common batten door; and that it had at the time of said entry no lock, latch or fastening other than as follows: That in dry weather it fitted closely into the casing when pulled to. That it opened on the inside of the house. That there was on the inside of the door a small knob by which it was sometimes pulled open. That in any weather it required some exertion to pull it open by said knob. That the door when pulled to in any weather might be blown open by wind, but it would require a strong wind to blow it open. That on the day when the prisoner entered, the weather was warm and dry, and no wind was blowing. It was proved that the prisoner entered by this door, which was shut until he opened it; and he was found in the house kneeling at a desk, and trying with Ingram's bunch of keys to open a drawer of said desk, in which Ingram kept money. The prisoner lived in the neighborhood and had been frequently in the store. On the application of the prisoner, a supersedeas to the judgment was awarded.

SAMUELS, J. The counsel for the plaintiff in the argument here, properly omitted to rely on the error assigned, because the Circuit court refused to quash the second count in the indictment. The motion to quash was probably made because of some supposed imperfection in the record of the examining court, or of some supposed variance between that record and the said second count of the indictment. On inspection of that record, it plainly appears that the County court did examine into the criminal fact alleged in said second count.

The counsel also properly omitted to rely on the error assigned, because of the disqualification of the juror Hundley, by his opinion in regard to the case he was to try. He had not expressed his opinion; it was merely hypothetical, depending upon facts of the truth of which he had formed no opinion; he was moreover indifferent between the commonwealth and the prisoner.

No objection was made or can be made to the ruling of the court or the finding of the jury in regard to the entry into the house in the day time, with intent to commit larceny. It was said, however, that the only remaining constituent part of the offence, the breaking, did not take place, and thus the offence is incomplete.

The word "break," used in the statute, is borrowed from the law in regard to burglary, and is therefore to be understood as it would be when used in a charge of burglary.

If then, in any case, a party shall by even slight force remove or displace any thing attached to the house as part thereof, and relied upon by the occupant for safety of the house, it is housebreaking 646 within the *meaning of the statute, if the other constituent parts of the offence exist.

In our case, the door through which the entry was made, was not fastened by any lock, latch or bar, nothing of the kind being there. The door fitted closely within the casing, and when closed some degree of force was required to open it; this was its only fastening. The Circuit court ruled that the opening of the closed door thus fastened was a breaking within the statute, and the jury found accordingly. The decision of the court is sustained by adjudged cases.

In Regina v. Bird, 9 Car. & Payne 44, 38 Eng. C. L. R. 29, the glass of a widow had been cut, but every portion of the glass remained in its place until the prisoner pushed it in. This was held to be a breaking.

In Regina v. Hyams and others, 7 Car. & Payne 441, the raising of a window not fastened though it had a hasp by which it might have been fastened, was held to be a breaking.

Lifting up the flap of a cellar which is kept down by its own weight, has been held, after some difference of opinion, to be a breaking. 2 Arch. Cr. Pl. & Ev. 336, Waterman's notes. These and other cases of like kind indicate the rule in our case. The judgment should be affirmed.

A question is made as to what costs of the commonwealth, if any, shall be taxed and charged against the prisoner in this case and in this court. This question was decided by this court in the case of Anglea, &c. v. Commonwealth, 10 Gratt. 696, so far as it arises upon a taxation of costs upon a conviction of felony in a Circuit court. It was held in that case that the ordinary fees of the clerk, sheriff and attorney for the commonwealth for services in court on behalf of the commonwealth, were not to be taxed or paid by the prisoner. The several statutes referred to in the opinion in that case seem 647 to require the *same decision in this case in this court. This is in conformity with the practice under the law existing since the revisal of 1819, as administered in the late General court, and in this court since it succeeded to the jurisdiction of the General court. If a change had been intended by the Code of 1849, it would have been so declared. This Code is a revision of former laws, and should be construed in reference to them in every case, unless it appears that a change was intended. I am of opinion that no fee of the clerk or of the attorney general for services rendered to the commonwealth, is to be charged to the plaintiff.

At the October term 1857 Huff appeared; and before pleading, moved the court to quash the presentment against him; which motion the court overruled; and he excepted. He then pleaded not guilty; and there was a verdict against him for a fine of one hundred dollars, and for two months' im-

Early, for the appellant.

The Attorney General, for the commonwealth.

ALLEN, P. The Code, chap. 198, § 1, p. 742, provides, that a free person who shall keep or exhibit a gaming table commonly called A B C, or E O table, or faro bank, or a table of the like kind under any denomination, whether the game or table be played with cards, dice or otherwise, shall be confined in jail not less than two nor more than twelve months, and be fined not less than one hundred nor more than one thousand dollars. The plaintiff in error was presented for keeping and exhibiting an unlawful game played with dice, called chuckaluck, at the tavern-house of S. S. Helms in the town of Rockymount in Franklin county, within twelve months last past. Before pleading to the presentment, he moved to quash it, because it does not set forth any penal offence under either of the sections of the Code against unlawful gaming. The motion was overruled, and he then filed the plea of not guilty, and the jury found a verdict of guilty against him, assessed his fine at one hundred dollars, and ascertained the term of his imprisonment in the county jail to be two months. The court thereupon rendered judgment against him for the fine assessed and the costs of the prosecution; and on motion of the attorney for the commonwealth, awarded a capias ad audiendum, returnable to the next term.

The offence charged was treated as coming under the first section of the act against unlawful gaming; and not being one of the gaming tables named in the act, it should appear that it was one of the like kind. It was decided in Wyatt's Case, 650 6 Rand. 694, that the *distinctive feature in the character of the games enumerated is, that the chances of the game are unequal, all other things being equal, and those unequal chances are in favor of the exhibitor of the games or tables. Where the offence charged is the exhibition of any of the gaming tables enumerated, nothing more need be averred, for the statute makes exhibiting of any of the gaming tables named a penal offence; and therefore the offence is sufficiently described by the name set forth in the statute, and no further description is necessary; being one of the enumerated games, the exhibition of it is unlawful. Where the offence charged is for keeping and exhibiting a game not enumerated, there must be some averment showing it to be one of the unequal games belonging to the same class with the enumerated games. Games may be played or exhibited where the chances are equal, all other things being equal; and the playing or betting at such game at an ordinary, race-field or other public place, unless it be one of the excepted games, subjects the party to punishment, though the penalty is different from that prescribed in the 1st section against the keeper or exhibitor of one of the unequal games therein enumerated or coming within the same class. The presentment should show on its face that the offence charged comes within the definition of the statute; if not one of the enumerated games, it must be of the like kind, one of the unequal games included in the class prohibited. This distinctive character of the game is of the essence of the offence described in the 1st section; and unless substantially averred, it does not appear upon the face of the presentment that the offence set forth in the 1st section has been committed. The verdict of guilty in manner and form as in the presentment against him is alleged, may be warranted by the evidence, although the game or table exhibited may not have been unequal.
651 The charge that the game is *unlawful, does not cure the defect. The offence must be so charged as to appear to be unlawful; otherwise, the allegation that an act was unlawful, would dispense with all averments showing it was unlawful. As was held in Roberts' Case, 10 Leigh 686, and Bishop's Case, 13 Gratt. 785, the words "unlawful," or "contrary to law," do not serve to enlarge or extend the force and effect of the terms employed to describe the act, so as to make the act unlawful, when it does not appear to be so by the description itself. I think the objection was properly raised by a motion to quash the presentment. In Bell's Case, 8 Gratt. 600, it was held that a motion to quash is addressed to the discretion of the court, and the court will not on such motion quash the indictment, unless where the court has no jurisdiction; where no indictable offence is charged; or where there is some other substantial and material defect. In this case, being presented for keeping and exhibiting, under the 1st section, the presentment does not charge an offence under that section, and there is no charge for playing or betting at any game, under the 4th section of the act. I think the court erred in overruling the motion to quash the presentment, and for that error the judgment should be reversed and the presentment quashed.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Allen, P.

1. Criminal Law—Evidence—Irrelevant Matter.—On the trial of a prisoner for burning a mill, the commonwealth proves by the owner of the mill, that a short time previous to the burning the prisoner had made violent threats against him. It is not competent for the prisoner to ask him, or any other witness, whether other persons had not made threats against him.

2. Same—Same—Case at Bar.—In such case the previous threats having been proved, the commonwealth may prove that shortly after the burning, the prisoner violently abused and threatened the owner, and said as he was about to leave; "You have not yet got what I intend to give you."

3. Evidence—Confessions—Persons in Authority.—A young man living in the jailer's family, and who occasionally, in the absence of the jailer, attended on the prisoners and kept the keys of the jail, is not a person in authority, whose threat or promise will exclude the confessions of a prisoner in the jail awaiting his trial.

4. Same—Same—Inducements—Case at Bar.†—A prisoner is told, in answer to his assertion of his innocence, that the person to whom he is speaking does not believe one word he says, but that such person believes he knows all about it; and his mother too. Prisoner declares that his mother knew nothing about it. He is then told he need not say any thing more about it, for that he had to go to the penitentiary any how. He says he knows that; but that his mother is innocent of it; and he requests the person to whom he is talking to go and tell certain persons he names to come to him. The person then says, What do you mean by what you say? In the name of God and all that is holy, have you let this charge rest on your mother, and she innocent of it? Prisoner again repeats she was innocent, and requests that the persons he had named may be sent for; which is done, and he makes confessions to them. HELD: There was no inducement held out to the prisoner which will exclude his confession.

5. Appellate Practice—Change of Venue—Failure of Record to Show Indictment Found by Grand Jury.‡—Where, upon the motion of the prisoner, the venue is changed, and the record sent by the clerk of the court from whence the trial is removed, to the court to which it is sent, does not show that the indictment was found by the grand jury; but the prisoner is tried and convicted; upon a writ of error to the Court of appeals, that court may direct a certiorari to the court from whence the case was sent, for a better record: And if it appears from the record *returned, that the indictment was found by the grand jury, the judgment will not be reversed.

6. Same—Same—Trial on Indictment including Faulty Counts—Case at Bar.§—In such case, if it appears from the record returned with the certiorari, that the prisoner had appeared, and that the court had, on his motion, quashed one of the counts in the indictment; though on his trial he pleaded to the whole indictment, and was tried on the count which was quashed as well as the others, yet this is not cause for reversing the judgment.

This record, as it was when the prisoner was tried and when the writ of error was obtained, contained a paper purporting to be an indictment found by the grand jury of Greenbrier county, against Zepheniah (alias Cap) Shifflet, for that on the 19th of November 1856 he did feloniously and maliciously burn a certain saw mill and grist mill in said county, belonging to one Joseph F. Caldwell, of the value of one thousand dollars. A second count laid it as the property of another person, and not the property of Shifflet; and a third count laid it as the property of D. C. B. Caldwell. This indictment was endorsed "A true bill. Andrew Johnston, foreman."

The record further shows that at another day, to wit, the 20th of May 1857, the court, upon the application of the prisoner for a change of venue, changed it to the Circuit court of Monroe county, and recognized certain witnesses to attend the next term of that court.

At the October term of the Circuit court of Monroe, the prisoner was arraigned upon the indictment, and pleaded "not guilty." And he was thereupon put upon his trial, and the jury found him guilty, and fixed the time of his imprisonment in the penitentiary at seven years; and the court rendered judgment thereon accordingly.

On the trial several questions were saved, and they are stated in the opinion of Judge Moncure. In the petition for a writ of error, the petitioner raised another question, viz: That the record did not show *that the indictment on which the prisoner was tried, had been found by the grand jury. Upon the application of the prisoner, the court granted him a writ of error to the judgment. And after the case came into this court the attorney general obtained a writ of certiorari to the Circuit court of Greenbrier county, to send up a better record. The record which was received, and by consent made a part of the record as if regularly sent up, showed indeed that the indictment had been found; but it showed also that on the motion of the prisoner, the Circuit court of Greenbrier had quashed the second count in the indictment, and that he had pleaded not guilty.

The case was elaborately argued here, by N. Harrison and Gratton, for the prisoner, and the Attorney General, for the commonwealth.

MONCURE, J. This is a writ of error to a judgment of the Circuit court of Monroe, convicting Zepheniah Shifflet of felony in burning a mill in Greenbrier; the venue having been changed from Greenbrier to Monroe. There are six assignments of error. Five of them were made in the petition for the writ—the sixth, for the first time, in the course of the argument. Why the last was not sooner made, will hereafter appear. I will notice them in the order in which they were made.

The first is founded on the first and second bills of exception; which raise very similar questions. On the trial of the case, the commonwealth having introduced the prosecutor D. C. B. Caldwell as a witness, who, amongst other things, proved, that previous to the burning of the mill the prisoner and himself had had quarrels on different occasions, and that the prisoner had made use of threats and abusive language to him, from which he had been 655 induced to apprehend *violence both to his person and property; thereupon, on the cross-examination of said Caldwell, the prisoner asked the witness if he was not at that time on bad terms with several other of his neighbors besides the prisoner? The court, on the motion of the attorney for the commonwealth, excluded the question, and the prisoner excepted. Afterwards, the commonwealth having introduced another witness, H. F. Hunter, whose evidence tended to show that the prisoner burnt the mill which he is charged with having burnt (other evidence having also been previously introduced by the commonwealth, of a quarrel between the prisoner and prosecutor, and threats used by the former against the latter); thereupon the prisoner asked the witness if he did not know of any other neighbor or neighbors of the prosecutor who had a falling out with him shortly before the mill was burnt, and who had made use of threats of violence against him also. The court, on the motion of the attorney for the commonwealth, excluded this question also; but the prisoner was permitted, without objection, to ask the witness if particular persons had not before that time threatened to burn said mill. The prisoner again excepted. The evidence introduced by the commonwealth to prove the previous quarrels and threats of the prisoner, as mentioned in these bills of exception, was clearly admissible, to connect the prisoner with the offence charged against him, and to show the motive and intention with which it was committed. The questions asked by the prisoner were, I think, as clearly inadmissible, and were therefore properly excluded by the court. To have admitted them, would have been a violation of what is laid down as the first rule governing the introduction of evidence, that it must correspond with the allegations, and be confined to the point in issue. "This rule (as has been well said) excludes all evidence of collateral facts, or those which are 656 incapable *of affording any reasonable presumption or inference as to the principal fact or matter in dispute; and the reason is, that such evidence tends to draw away the minds of the jurors from the point in issue, and to excite prejudice, and mislead them; and moreover, the adverse party, having had no notice of such a course of evidence, is not prepared to rebut it." 1 Greenl. Evi. § 52. These observations plainly apply to this case. It does not appear that there was (and must therefore be presumed that there was not) a particle of evidence connecting any other person than the prisoner with the criminal act charged against him. Mere evidence of the quarrels or threats of any other person, certainly would not have tended to establish such a connection, but would only have tended to excite prejudice in the minds of the jury, and mislead them, and also to take the prosecutor by surprise, who might otherwise have been able to prove that such other person had no connection whatever with the burning of his mill. There is nothing in the case of Rowt's adm'r v. Kiles' adm'r, Gilm. 202, which can give any sanction to the admissibility of such evidence. The issue there was on the plea of non est factum. The defendant, in aid of other evidence tending to prove the paper a forgery, offered testimony to show that a son of the obligee had said he could counterfeit the handwriting of the obligor and imitate it well. This testimony was received without objection. The defendant then offered evidence of the infamous character of the son, which was objected to and excluded; and the defendant excepted, and appealed from the judgment which was rendered against him. His counsel in this court, Mr. Stanard, maintained that the declarations of the son having been received without objection, all accessory evidence should have been admitted; and testimony as to his character was therefore admissible. Upon this ground, it would 657 seem, the *judgment was reversed. Judge Coalter in his opinion, says, "As the first branch of the evidence was not objected to by the plaintiff, we must at present, perhaps, take it to be legally received, and that consequently the other part was improperly rejected." Id. 206. See also what he says at the conclusion of the same paragraph on p. 207. That this was the ground of reversal is, I think, confirmed by the same case reported in 1 Leigh 216, which is also an authority to sustain the propriety of the exclusion of the evidence offered and excluded in this case.

The second assignment of error is founded on the third bill of exceptions, which was taken to the opinion of the court overruling the prisoner's motion to exclude Joseph Crane's evidence of the prisoner's confession, on the ground that the witness had not heard the whole but only detached parts of it; and permitting the said evidence to go to the jury in connection with the testimony of other witnesses who were present during the whole of the conversation, and whom the commonwealth's attorney proposed to introduce, and did introduce to prove the same conversation and confession. I think this evidence was clearly admissible; and as the counsel for the prisoner, in the argument before this court, did not rely upon this assignment of error, and indeed waived it, I deem it unnecessary to say any thing more on the subject.

The third assignment of error is founded on the fourth bill of exceptions. The prosecutor Caldwell, after testifying that a few nights before the burning of his mill, the prisoner came to his house, and abused him, saying just as he left, "D—n you, I will pay you," or "You shall suffer for what you have done;" stated further, that a few days after the mill was burned, the prisoner approached him, cocked his rifle, changed his pistol from one pocket to the other, commenced abusing witness as 658 he approached him, and *continued to do so in a very violent manner, and said just as he left, "You have not yet got what I intend to give you." The prisoner moved the court to exclude so much of said evidence as related to a conversation subsequent to the burning of the mill. But the court overruled the motion, and the prisoner excepted. The evidence was relevant to the issue and plainly admissible. It tended to prove an admission of the prisoner, made a few days after the burning of the mill, that he had executed, but in part only, the threat of revenge which he had made against the prosecutor a few days before. Its competency rests on the same principle which sustains the competency of the evidence of that threat. Both tend strongly to connect the prisoner with the criminal act. The previous threat indicated a general purpose of revenge. The subsequent admission indicated that some act had been done in execution of that purpose. In the short interval between the threat and the admission, the prosecutor's mill was burned. It does not appear that during that interval he suffered in any other way.

The fourth assignment of error is founded on the fifth and last bill of exceptions, which was taken to the opinion of the court overruling the motion of the prisoner to exclude the confessions made by the prisoner to the witness Margrave, on the ground that they were not free and voluntary, within the meaning of the law. The subject of the admissibility of confessions as evidence has recently been fully considered by this court in the case of Smith v. The Commonwealth, 10 Gratt. 734. Judge Lee in his opinion in that case, in which a majority of the court concurred, comes to the following conclusion: "The rule that may be fairly deduced from authoritative decisions upon the subject is, that a confession may be given in evidence unless it appear that it was obtained from the party by some inducement of a worldly or temporal 659 character in the *nature of a threat, or promise of benefit, held out to him in respect of his escape from the consequences of the offence or the mitigation of the punishment, by a person in authority, or with the apparent sanction of such a person." Let us apply this rule to the present case, and enquire, 1st. Was Margrave a person in authority, within the meaning of the rule? 2dly. Did he hold out to the prisoner such an inducement to confess as the rule requires? 3dly. Did he thereby obtain the confessions in question? And,

First, Was he a person in authority? The only ground on which it can be contended that he was, is, that he lived in the family of the jailer of Greenbrier county while the prisoner was confined in the jail of said county; that he sometimes had the keys of the jail; that he attended about the jail; that when the jailer was absent, he carried the keys and had control of the jail, and that a son of the jailer did some things which he did; and that when he was not using the keys, the wife of the jailer kept them. He was neither a deputy sheriff or deputy jailer, or sworn officer of any kind. He was a mere menial of the jailer, and held the same, or nearly the same, relation to the jail as did the jailer's wife and son. He was not in the presence of the jailer when he held out the alleged inducement. The decisions excluding confessions have already, it has been often said, gone too far. "And in the more recent cases (says Judge Lee in Smith's Case, 10 Gratt. 739), the judges have plainly manifested a disposition not only not to carry the doctrine any further, but also, to some extent, to retrace their steps, and to adhere more closely to the proper discrimination to be made between the different kinds of inducements that may be supposed to have led to a confession, and the characters of the parties by whom the same may appear to have been held out." I know of no case in which it has been held that a person 660 *occupying such a relation to the prisoner as was occupied by the witness Margrave in this case, is a person in authority within the meaning of the rule in question. Persons in authority within the meaning of that rule, are generally, if not always persons engaged in the apprehension, prosecution or examination of the prisoner. The prosecutor, the officer who makes the arrest, and the magistrate before whom the prisoner is carried, are clearly persons in authority; and inducements held out in their presence, without their objection, are regarded as held out by them. There are others who may also be persons in authority. If a jailer in whose jail the party making the confession is confined, be such a person (as to which I express no opinion), there is, I think, neither reason nor authority for saying, that a mere member of the family of the jailer, holding no office of any kind, nor having any connection with the prisoner further than to attend about the jail, and in the absence of the jailer to have control of it and carry the keys, is a person in authority within the meaning of the rule. If he is, so also, it seems, would be the wife of the jailer in this case, who kept the keys when the witness was not using them; and the son of the jailer, who sometimes acted for him. What power could any such subordinates be reasonably supposed to have, to execute any promise or threat they might make to a prisoner, "in respect of his escape from the consequences of the offence, or the mitigation of the punishment." It has been sometimes held that the wife of a prosecutor is a person in authority. But only, it seems, where the offence, in some way or other, especially concerns her. In Hardwick's Case, 1 Carr. & Payne 98, 11 Eng. C. L. 328, in note, a confession made before a magistrate was objected to on the ground that the wife of the constable had told the prisoner previously that he had better confess. Baron Wood overruled the ob-661 jection, *and it would seem, on the ground that the constable's wife was not a person having authority. Joy 262. I think, therefore, that the witness Margrave was not a person in authority. But even if he was,

Secondly, Did he hold out to the prisoner such an inducement to confess as the rule requires? "The doctrine of inducements (says Baron Parke) has been carried to the verge of common sense." In Regina v. Baldry, 2 Denn. C. C. 430, 12 Eng. L. & E. R. 590, recently decided by the English court of criminal appeal, the same learned judge expressed the opinion, "that the rule has been extended quite too far." But I doubt whether in any case it has been extended so far as to make what was said by the witness to the prisoner in this case such a promise or threat as would amount to an inducement, within the meaning of the rule. The inducement, according to the rule before stated, must have reference to the prisoner's escape from the consequences of the offence, or to the mitigation of the punishment. And it must be calculated to lead the prisoner to suppose it would be better for him to admit himself to be guilty of the offence, though he never committed it. Joy on Confessions 13; 2 Russ. 826, 845. If the prisoner be told that it will be better for him to confess, or worse for him not to confess, or words to that effect be addressed to him, the inducement will be sufficient to exclude the confession. 1 Greenl. Evi. § 219. In such a case, the question does not turn on what may have been the precise words used, but whether the words used were such as to convey to the mind of the prisoner an intimation that it will be better for him to confess that he committed the crime, or worse for him if he does not. Wharton 259; Garner's Case, 1 Denn. C. C. 329. The apparent conflict in the cases on this subject has, no doubt, in a great degree arisen from the different constructions which judges have placed upon similar words 662 when *used under different circumstances and in a different connection. A great deal must be left to the discretion of the judge in such cases, who must decide whether, under all the circumstances, the words used express or imply a promise or threat, and were so understood by the prisoner. We see cases in the books in which it is difficult to discover a promise or a threat in the words used to induce the confessions which were excluded: And yet, the judges who decide those cases may have discovered it very plainly. It will not do, therefore, to say that because certain words have been held in certain cases to imply a promise or a threat, the same or similar words must be held in every case to imply a promise or a threat. About the rule itself there is no dispute; that there must be a promise or a threat. The only difficulty is in the application of the rule; and in that there is sometimes much difficulty: But in this case I think there is very little. Let us now see how the rule applies to the facts of the case.

The witness stated that he went into the jail where the prisoner was confined, and that prisoner said, "I do not know what they are keeping me up here for; I have never done any thing." Witness then said, "I do not believe one word you say. I believe you know all about it, and your mother too." To which prisoner replied that witness was mistaken; and that his mother knew nothing about it. Witness then remarked to prisoner, "It is not worth while for you to say any thing more to me about it, for you have got to go to the penitentiary any how." Prisoner said, "I know that. I am satisfied I will have to go, but mother is innocent of it; and there were older men than me engaged in it, and I want you to go and tell Captain Crane, and J. H. Wetzel, D. C. B. Caldwell and D. H. Stalnaker to come down here." Witness said, "What do you mean by what you 663 say? In the *name of God and all that is holy, have you let this charge rest on your mother, and she innocent of it?" "Yes (prisoner replied), she is innocent of it, but there are older men than me engaged in it, and I am determined to have those men arrested." Witness said, "Are you joking with me?" Prisoner replied, "No, sir, I am not joking with you—will you go and tell Crane, Wetzel, Caldwell and Stalnaker to come down here?" Witness stated that he accordingly went for the men thus named. He also stated that the night before the conversation above mentioned, prisoner had requested him to go and tell Captain Crane he wished to have a private talk with him; which witness had done. He then mentioned another confession made by the prisoner about two months thereafter; but it is unnecessary to set forth that more particularly. The witness also stated that the prisoner had always, previous to the said conversation, denied having committed the offence charged against him; and stated in conclusion, that he had never made use of any threat or promise to induce the prisoner to make any confession. So that if he did make any such threat or promise, expressly or by implication, it must be found in what he said to the prisoner as before set forth. Is it to be found there? I think not. Much less a threat or promise "in respect to the prisoner's escape from the consequences of the offence or to the mitigation of the punishment." But for some of the adjudged cases, I do not think there could be the least doubt or difficulty upon the question. Mills' Case, 6 Carr. & Payne, 146, 25 Eng. C. L. R. 324, was very much relied on in the argument. It was a nisi prius decision and certainly extended the rule very far. A constable, whilst he had the prisoner in custody, asked him whether he had committed the felony? He denied it. The constable then said, "It is of no use for you to deny it for there is the man and boy who will swear they 664 saw you do *it." Gurney, B., held this was an inducement, and refused to receive the statement. "These words (says Mr. Joy) seem to have been construed by the learned judge as the same, in effect, as if the constable had said, it will be better for you to confess, for they will swear against you and convict you, whether you do or not." Joy on Confessions 7.

The observations made by that author on the next case he notices, to wit, Shepherd's, seem to be alike applicable to Mills' Case. "The manner (he says) in which the words were used (meaning the words used by the constable to the prisoner in Shepherd's Case), may have been considered by the learned judge, who saw and heard the witness, to be of a threatening nature, and calculated to lead the prisoner untruly to confess himself guilty." Id. 8. He says in a note, that Shepherd's Case has been controverted. And yet it seems to be a stronger case for the exclusion of the confession than Mills.' But surely neither of those cases can justly be said to be like this. There, a constable made an arrest, and used words to the prisoner, which the judge who saw and heard the witness construed to imply that it would be better for the prisoner to confess. Here, a person attending about a jail, and having control of it in the absence of the jailer, but not being an officer of any kind, had a conversation with a prisoner confined in the jail, which seems to have been casual, and brought on by the prisoner himself, in which conversation the words used by such person do not naturally import any promise or threat, and were not so construed by the judge who saw and heard the witnesses. Griffith's Case, 2 Russ. 832, 838, was also relied on. But what was said by the prosecutor there, connected with the reply of the prisoner, plainly implied an understanding on the part of the latter, that if she would confess, she would not be taken before the 665 magistrates. On the *other hand, I would refer to Thornton's Case, 1 Moody's C. C. R. 27, in which a constable had harshly interrogated a boy of fourteen years of age, when under detention without a warrant, and accused him of telling falsehoods, and in a manner calculated to intimidate, and made him cry, but held out no promise or threat as to his escaping from the charge against him. The confession was held admissible by seven judges out of ten. Joy 13, and 2 Russ. 847–8, where the case is fully stated.

But it was argued, that the witness led the prisoner to believe that his mother would be benefited by his confession; and that, in effect, the witness not only advised, but most earnestly appealed to the prisoner to confess his guilt. I do not so construe the words of the witness; nor do I perceive how the prisoner's mother could be benefited by his confession of his own guilt, especially if he were innocent. And we have seen that the inducement, in order to exclude the evidence, must be calculated to make the prisoner believe that it would be better for him to confess his guilt, though he were innocent. But even if he could have benefited his mother by confessing his own guilt, it would not have been such a benefit as the rule contemplates. See Nolan's Case, 1 Crawf. & Dix C. C. 74, referred to in Joy 16, and Russ. 847. I therefore think the witness held out to the prisoner no such inducement to confess as the rule requires. But if he did, it remains to enquire, Thirdly, Did he thereby obtain the confessions in question? If an inducement is held out and a confession immediately made, the presumption would be conclusive, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the confession was obtained by the inducement. But the circumstances of the case may repel the presumption, and show that the confession was made irrespectively of the supposed inducement.

666 And such I *think is the case here, if it can be said that any inducement was held out by the witness. He had never, he says, made use of any threat or promise to induce the prisoner to make any confession. The night before his conversation with the prisoner, before stated, the prisoner requested him to go and tell Capt. Crane he wished to have a private talk with him. The said conversation was commenced by the prisoner; and, both in the course and at the conclusion of it, he repeated the request that witness would go and tell Capt. Crane and also three other persons to come down to the jail. These circumstances indicate that the purpose of the prisoner to make the confession, such as it was, existed prior to his said conversation with the witness, and was not induced thereby. I see nothing in that conversation, or the relation of the parties, which was adequate to induce it. What induced it, does not appear. He no doubt had a motive. "I take it, no man ever makes a confession voluntarily (says Taunton, J.), without proposing to himself in his own mind some advantage to be derived from it." Green's Case, 25 Eng. C. L. R.

581. But such an inducement cannot render the confession inadmissible. It is said in 2 Russ. 847, that if the proposal to confess comes from the prisoner, it seems his confession is admissible, although the prosecutor, in consideration of his doing so says he will do all he can for him. In support of this observation, Green's Case, supra, is cited. I therefore think the witness did not obtain the confessions by any inducements held out by him; and in every view of the case, I am of opinion that the confessions were admissible evidence.

The fifth assignment of error, and the last taken in the petition, is, that the court erred in entering up a judgment on the verdict, or in trying the case at all, because, beyond the endorsement on the indictment, there was nothing to show that the 667 grand jury had *ever found a true bill in the case. This objection was not taken in the court below, but, for the first time, in the petition. The prisoner's counsel contends, however, that it is "a fatal objection; whether made before or after verdict, whether upon a motion in arrest of judgment in the court below, or upon an assignment of errors, for the first time, in an appellate court." And for this, he cites Cawood's Case, 2 Va. Cas. 527. That case seems to sustain the position; and the objection would probably be fatal, if the finding of the grand jury was not in fact recorded. As the record originally came up to this court, it did not appear that the finding had been recorded. The prisoner had been indicted in Greenbrier, and on his motion the venue had been changed to Monroe. The clerk of the Circuit court of Greenbrier, instead of sending to the clerk of the Circuit court of Monroe a certified copy of the record of the case, as directed by the Code, ch. 208, § 24, p. 776, only sent the original indictment, with the endorsement thereon of the finding thereof, signed by the foreman of the grand jury, and a certified copy of the order changing the venue, remanding the prisoner to the jail of Greenbrier for removal to the jail of Monroe, and recognizing the witness on behalf of the commonwealth to attend as such on the first day of the next Circuit court of Monroe. At that court, the prisoner was arraigned and pleaded not guilty to the indictment, and was tried, and convicted thereon. The petition for a writ of error to the judgment was accompanied by a copy of the record of the case in the Circuit court of Monroe, which embraced only so much of the record of the case in the Circuit court of Greenbrier as had been sent or certified by the clerk of the latter to the clerk of the former as aforesaid. After the writ of error was awarded, this court, on the motion of the attorney general, awarded a certiorari, to be directed to 668 *the clerk of the Circuit court of Greenbrier, to certify the record of the case in that court more fully to this court. There has been no regular return of the certiorari by the clerk of that court to this. But he certified a copy of the record of the proceedings in the case in that court to the clerk of the Circuit court of Monroe, who has sent a certified copy to this court; which, by consent of the attorney general and the counsel for the prisoner, is to be regarded as a copy of the proceedings in the Circuit court of Greenbrier, duly certified to this court, in obedience to the certiorari. If this addition can properly be made to the record on which the case is to be determined by this court, it will remove the ground of the objection now under consideration, as it shows that in fact the finding of the indictment by the grand jury was duly recorded in the Circuit court of Greenbrier.

But it is contended on behalf of the prisoner, that this court had no right to award a certiorari to the clerk of the Circuit court of Greenbrier; and that no part of the proceedings of that court which had not been certified to, or was not before the Circuit court of Monroe when the case was tried therein, can properly be certified to and be regarded as part of the record before this court. It is said that this court has no power to award a certiorari, except where it is given by statute; and that the only statute giving such power, is the Code, ch. 182, § 7, p. 684, which provides that the appellate court "may, in any case, award a writ of certiorari to the clerk of the court below, and have brought before it, when part of a record is omitted, the whole or any part of such record:" and it is contended that the Circuit court of Monroe, and not of Greenbrier, is "the court below," within the meaning of this provision. I think that both of these courts are "the court below," according to the very terms as well as the true intent and mean-669 ing of the statute. The *law authorizing the venue to be changed for the trial of a case, makes the two courts in effect but one court, as to that case; which is proceeded with in the court to which the venue is changed, from the point to which it had proceeded in the first court, when the change was made. There is but one record of the case. But part of it is in one court and part of it in the other. The law, for the sake of convenience, makes a certified copy of the record of the case in the first court, sufficient for the purpose of further proceedings in the other court. But it does not make that copy the record itself; and whenever it is necessary to know what is the true record of the case in the first court, recourse can only be had to that court or the clerk thereof. If the prisoner had raised the objection in the Circuit court of Greenbrier, before the venue was changed, that there was no record of the finding of the grand jury, the record itself would at once have answered the objection. If he had raised it in the Circuit court of Monroe, after the venue was changed, a perfect copy of the record of the case in Greenbrier would have been ordered and obtained by the Circuit court of Monroe, and would have answered the objection. He raised it in neither of those courts, but for the first time in this court. Is this court powerless to obtain a perfect copy of the record for the purpose of ascertaining whether the objection is well founded or not? I think not. Cawood's Case shows that the certiorari was properly awarded in this case, as the venue had been changed in that case, and a certiorari was awarded to the clerk of the court in which the prosecution was commenced. It is said that that was an adjourned case, and the writ was awarded on the motion of the prisoner. I do not think these facts material to the question. The case was argued by able counsel, and with great ability. No question was raised as to the power of the court to award the writ, or as to the propriety of that 670 *mode of proceeding. It would hardly have been moved for, if it had not been considered necessary by the counsel for the prisoner, to have a full copy of the record of the court in which the indictment was found, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the finding was recorded. And yet that was not necessary, if, as now contended, this court can look only for that purpose to the record of the court which rendered the judgment. For the record of that court certainly did not show that the finding was recorded. It devolves on the plaintiff in error to show that there is error in the judgment; and he must show it by the record. In this case, he only shows that there was a chasm in the record, as it originally came up to this court, and that the finding of the indictment may or may not have been recorded. It devolved on him to fill up that chasm, and show whether or not the finding was in fact recorded. He cannot complain that the burden which devolved on him has been borne by the commonwealth. It is said that the person as to whom the finding was recorded, might have been a different person from the prisoner. I think there is nothing in that objection. An indictment was found against the prisoner in Greenbrier. He moved for and obtained a change of venue to Monroe, where, without raising the question of identity, he pleaded to the indictment, and was tried and convicted: and the copy of the record now certified to us shows that the finding of that indictment was duly recorded.

But that copy (in connection with the residue of the record) discloses another ground of objection to the judgment, which was taken, for the first time, in the argument before this court, and constitutes the sixth and last assignment of error, to wit, that the prisoner was tried and convicted upon the whole indictment, although the second count had been quashed. He was arraigned in the Circuit court of 671 Greenbrier, and *on his motion the second count of the indictment was quashed: thereupon he pleaded not guilty to the first and third counts, and moved for a change of venue; which was accordingly ordered on a subsequent day of the term. A copy of that order only, with the original indictment and endorsement thereon, having been sent to the Circuit court of Monroe, he was again arraigned in the court, and pleaded not guilty to the indictment, without taking any notice of the order which had been made in the Circuit court of Greenbrier quashing the second count. A general verdict of guilty was found against him, and judgment was rendered accordingly. If it be conceded that he did not, in effect, waive the benefit of the order quashing the second count, and that it was error to arraign and try him on the whole indictment after that count had been quashed, still I think it is not an error to his prejudice, and therefore not good ground for the reversal of the judgment. At common law, there was a settled distinction between a general verdict in civil and in criminal proceedings. In the former case, if some of the counts were bad when entire damages were given, it was necessary to arrest the judgment, because the court could not apportion the damages: while in the latter, the court ascertained the penalty, and could apply it to the good counts which were supported by the evidence; and therefore, where the defendant was found guilty of the charge in general, if there were any good counts, the verdict was sufficient, and an entire judgment might have been given. 1 Chit. Cr. Law 249, 640. At an early period in this state, the common law rule in civil cases was changed by statute, which provided, that "when there are several counts, one of which is faulty, and entire damages are given, the verdict shall be good; but the defendant may apply to the court to instruct the jury to disregard the faulty count." 1 Rev. Code of 1819, 672 *p. 251, § 104. The rule in criminal cases remained unchanged by statute until a very recent period, as will be presently noticed.

In Kirk's Case, 9 Leigh 627, it was held that the common law rule was applicable to a conviction for felony, punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary, and that the judgment should not be reversed if any count was good, even though the court below overruled the motion of the prisoner to quash the bad counts. In Mowbray's Case, 11 Leigh 643, and Clere's Case, 3 Gratt. 615, it was held, contrary to Kirk's Case, that the common law rule was not applicable to offences punishable by confinement in the penitentiary, as the reason of the rule did not apply. Thus stood the law and the adjudications upon it when the act of March 14, 1848, was passed, containing a provision (see Sess. Acts, p. 152, § 43), which has been since substantially embodied in the Code, p. 778, § 34, in these words: "When there are several counts in an indictment or information, and a general verdict of guilty is found, judgment shall be entered against the accused, if any count be good, though others be faulty. But on the trial, the court, on the motion of the accused, may instruct the jury to disregard any count that is faulty." See Rand's Case, 9 Gratt. 738, in which the cases and statutes on this subject are reviewed in the opinion of the court, delivered by Judge

Daniel. The effect of the provision in the Code is to make the common law rule applicable to all criminal cases, whatever may be the mode of punishment, and however the measure of it may be ascertained. But the accused is effectually protected from injury, by the right which is given him to have the faulty counts excluded from the consideration of the jury. If he does not avail himself of that right; if he does not move the court to instruct the jury to disregard the faulty counts, how can he 673 complain of injury? *How is he prejudiced by the judgment? Is not the presumption conclusive, that if he does not make the motion, it is because there is no evidence to sustain the faulty count, or it can do him no harm? In this case, the first and third counts are certainly good, even if the second be faulty, and a general verdict of guilty has been found. Why should not a judgment be entered against the accused according to the direction of the statute? A judgment has been entered. Why should it be reversed? Is it because it was error in the court to try the prisoner on the whole indictment, when one of the counts had been quashed? He voluntarily pleaded to the whole indictment, and had only to move the court to exclude the second count for the jury, the court having already decided it to be faulty. He would have made that motion, if he could have derived any benefit from it.

I think there is no error in the judgment, and am for affirming it.

†Sale of Ardent Spirits—Indictment—Allegations.—"In Boyle's Case (14 Gratt. 674), it was held that the indictment must state the mode in which the sale was made, as inference can never supply a total want of averment in regard to an essential part of an offence." ‡See JUDGE SAMUELS' opinion for the statute.

In June 1857 the grand jury impanneled in the Circuit court of the city of Lynchburg, found an indictment against John D. Boyle, for that on, &c., at, &c., "he did, without license so to do, sell ardent spirits, to be drunk where sold, in a room occupied by him," &c. The indictment omitted the words "by retail."

Boyle appeared and demurred to the indictment; but his demurrer was overruled. And there was a verdict and judgment against him, for the fine of thirty dollars and the costs. Whereupon he applied to this court for a writ of error; which as allowed.

The Attorney General, for the commonwealth.

SAMUELS, J. It has been long and well settled by the courts of England, and by the courts of Virginia, that an indictment for any offence must allege every fact entering into the legal definition of such offence. In cases of indictments for offences at common law, set forms and technical terms appropriate to each particular offence, have been sanctioned by long use and by adjudications of courts, as being sufficiently descriptive of the offence.
675 In case of indictment under *the statutes, it is proper always, and sometimes indispensable to use the language of the statute creating or defining the particular offence. Questions sometimes occur in cases of either class, whether the offence alleged is sufficiently described by words equivalent to, or synonymous with those in which it is described by the law.

The prosecution in this case seems to be founded on the latter clause of § 18, ch. 38, p. 209 of the Code of Virginia, in these words: "And if any person sell, by retail, wine, ardent spirits, or a mixture thereof, to be drunk in or at the store, or other place of sale, he shall, unless he be licensed to keep an ordinary at such store or place, forfeit thirty dollars." The demurrer filed by the plaintiff in error to the indictment presents the question, whether the offence is so described as to bring it within the law.

It is seen by inspection of this indictment, that it is not alleged therein, in what mode the sale was made. Yet by the statute, it is made an ingredient in the offence, that the sale be by retail. Without this constituent part, the offence is not complete. It was insisted by the attorney general, that inasmuch as the indictment alleges that the ardent spirits were sold to be drunk at the place of sale; and inasmuch as ardent spirits are necessarily drunk in such quantities as can be sold only by retail, the allegation is equivalent to an allegation of sale by retail. If we yielded to this argument, we should be going further than the courts have yet gone; at most, they have only held in some cases that a direct averment of fact was sufficient, because such fact was equivalent to the fact which is made part of the offence; they have never yet held that argument or inference may supply a total want of averment of any kind in regard to an essential part of an offence. See The Common-

I. SUBJECTS OF TREATMENT DEFINED.

A. INDICTMENT.—An indictment is a written accusation against one or more persons for a crime or misdemeanor, presented to, and preferred upon oath, or affirmation by, a grand jury legally convoked. 3 Bla. Com. 299; Co. Litt. 126; 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 152; Bac. Abr. Com. Dig.; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 168; Bouvier's Law Dict. 1018.

B. INFORMATION.—An information is a written statement filed and presented on behalf of the state by the prosecuting attorney, accusing the defendant of an offence which is by law subject to prosecution in that way, and as a general rule it must contain all the substantial requisites of an indictment. 10 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 351.

C. PRESENTMENT.—A presentment is the written notice taken by a grand jury of any offence, from their own knowledge or observation, without any bill of indictment laid before them at the suit of the government. 4 Bl. Com. 301.

"A presentment made in the ordinary way by a grand jury is regarded, in the practice at common law, as nothing more than instructions given by the grand jury to the proper officer of the court for framing an indictment for an offence which they find to have been committed. 1 Bl. Comm. 301; 1 Chitt. Cr. L. 162. When the indictment has been prepared by him, it is submitted to them; and upon their finding it a true bill, the prosecution commences upon that indictment. The presentment merging in the indictment ceases and becomes extinct. If, however, the officer prosecuting for the court, who is the representative of the Crown, and whose concurrence and co-operation in the prosecution are always required, declines framing an indictment upon these instructions, the presentment ceases to exist for any purpose." LOMAX, J., in Christian's Case, 7 Gratt. 635.

II. FINDING OF INDICTMENT.

A. NECESSITY OF GRAND JURY.—Every indictment must be found by a grand jury legally selected, duly constituted and competent for the purpose. State v. Williams, 14 W. Va. 869; Va. Code 1889, § 3990; Bell v. Com., 8 Gratt. 600; Matthew's Case, 18 Gratt. 989. See also, State v. Whitt, 39 W. Va. 468, 19 S. E. Rep. 874.

B. QUALIFICATION OF GRAND JURORS.

1. GENERALLY.—A grand jury should be composed of persons qualified to serve in that capacity under the law, such qualifications being regulated by statute. Shinn v. Com., 32 Gratt. 899; State v. Henderson, 29 W. Va. 147, 1 S. E. Rep. 225; Com. v. Burton, 4 Leigh 645; Com. v. St. Clair, 1 Gratt. 556; Kerby v. Com., 7 Leigh 747; Com. v. Cunningham, 6 Gratt. 695; Com. v. Helmondollor, 4 Gratt. 536; Com. v. Carter, 2 Va. Cas. 319; Com. v. Cherry, 2 Va. Cas. 20.

Incompetency of Persons Not Sworn on Jury.—The design of the statute in requiring courts to select from qualified voters a certain number of persons, who shall be grand jurors for a certain period thereafter, is to secure a sufficient number of grand jurors for that period. When a qualified grand jury is obtained from those thus selected, it is no valid objection to it that others on the list of venire may perchance be disqualified. The fact that any one on the list of venire is incompetent to serve is not sufficient of itself to vitiate an indictment found by a grand jury each one of which possesses every necessary qualification. Shinn v. Com., 32 Gratt. 899.

2. CONSIDERATION OF VARIOUS QUALIFICATIONS AND DISQUALIFICATIONS.

a. Householder or Freeholder.—It is sometimes required by express statute that grand jurors, to be competent—as such, shall be either householders or freeholders. Com. v. St. Clair, 1 Gratt. 556; State v. Henderson, 29 W. Va. 147, 1 S. E. Rep. 225; Kerby v. Com., 7 Leigh 747; Eastham v. Holt, 43 W. Va. 599, 27 S. E. Rep. 883; Com. v. Carter, 2 Va. Cas. 319; Wysor v. Com., 6 Gratt. 711; Com. v. Cunningham, 6 Gratt. 695; Moore v. Com., 9 Leigh 639; Com. v. Helmondollor, 4 Gratt. 536; Com. v. Burton, 4 Leigh 645; Com. v. Reynolds, 4 Leigh 663; Com. v. Burcher, 2 Rob. 826.

Freeholder—Who Is One.—A person having the equitable interest in land, and entitled to call for legal title, is a freeholder qualified to serve as a grand juror. Com. v. Helmondollor, 4 Gratt. 536.

A Purchaser in Possession under a Parol Contract.—A purchaser of land by parol contract, who is in possession, and has paid the purchase money, is a freeholder, and qualified to be a grand juror: though a writ of right brought against him by a third person, for the recovery of the land, is pending. Com. v. Cunningham, 6 Gratt. 695.

A Grantor by Deed of Trust, Remaining in Possession.—If a person has executed a deed of trust of all his land to secure the payment of a debt to his creditor; and the day of payment is past; but the land is not sold by the trustee, and the grantor continues in the possession of the land (although in strictness of law, the freehold may be vested in the trustee, yet, by the equitable construction of the act concerning juries), he is not disqualified from being a grand juror. Com. v. William Carter, 2 Va. Cas. 319.

Contract to Sell by Articles under Seal.—It seems that one who has contracted by articles under seal to sell his land, but has not yet conveyed it by deed, and therefore still holds the legal title, is a freeholder qualified to serve on a grand jury. Com. v. Reynolds, 4 Leigh 663.

A Person Whose Title Is Undetermined Not a Freeholder.—A party in possession of land under a contract of purchase, having refused to accept a conveyance tendered to him, and instituted a chancery suit in which the question as to sufficiency of the title is yet undetermined, is not a freeholder qualified to serve as a grand juror. Kerby v. Com., 7 Leigh 747.

b. Alienage.—Where a bill of indictment is found by a grand jury, one of whom is an alien, or otherwise disqualified by law, the bill of presentment may be avoided by plea. And this is by force of the common law. Com. v. Cherry, 2 Va. Cas. 20.

c. Former Service as Juror.—A plea in abatement will not lie to an indictment because two or more of the grand jury which found the indictment had served on another grand jury at the same time. Richardson v. Com., 76 Va. 1007.

d. Jury Commissioner.—Being a jury commissioner does not disqualify a man for serving on the grand jury. State v. Martin, 38 W. Va. 568, 18 S. E. Rep. 748.

e. Census Taker.—An appointment under law of congress to take the census of a county, does not disqualify the appointee from being a member of the grand jury thereof. Com. v. Strother, 1 Va. Cas. 186.

f. Persons Exempted Not Disqualified.—Persons over sixty years of age are not disqualified from serving on grand juries; though they are exempted from the service if they choose to claim the exemption. Booth v. Com., 16 Gratt. 519.

C. SELECTING, SUMMONING AND IMPANELING.

1. VENIRE FACIAS.—At common law one process of summoning a grand jury was a precept, either in the name of the king, or of two or more justices of the peace, directed to the sheriff. This was anterior to and independent of any action of the court, the object being to have the grand jury in attendance at the commencement of the term. The court, however, had power to have a grand jury summoned as occasion might require. Burton's Case, 4 Leigh 645; Curtis v. Com., 87 Va. 589, 13 S. E. Rep. 73.

Virginia Statute.—By statute in Virginia, until a comparatively recent period, the sheriff was required ex officio, to summon a grand jury, to attend on the first day of every term prescribed by law, as a substitute for the precept mentioned above. And now the statute, Code 1887, § 3976, provides that a venire facias to summon a regular grand jury shall be issued by the clerk prior to the commencement of each term at which such grand jury is required. Curtis v. Com., 87 Va. 591, 13 S. E. Rep. 73.

Award of Process—Record Thereof.—It has never been held that the award of process to summons a grand jury must affirmatively appear by the record and there is no principle for so holding. Curtis v. Com., 87 Va. 589, 13 S. E. Rep. 73. And it was decided in Robinson v. Com., 88 Va. 900, 14 S. E. Rep. 627, that "where threecord does not affirmatively show that an order to summons a grand jury was made, but is silent in respect thereto, it must be presumed that such an order was made." The order itself is not a necessary part of a record of the case, since the commencement of the case was the finding of the indictment, and that was necessarily subsequent to the making of the order. Snodgrass v. Com., 89 Va. 679, 17 S. E. Rep. 238. And it was held in Taylor v. Com., 90 Va. 109, 17 S. E. Rep. 812, that it is sufficient if the record shows that the venire was issued by order of the court.

At What Time the Venire Should Be Issued.—§ 3976 of Va. Code 1887, provides that a venire facias to summon a regular grand jury shall be issued by the clerk prior to the commencement of each term at which a grand jury is required. Curtis v. Com., 87 Va. 591, 13 S. E. Rep. 73.

Venire Facias Incorrectly Dated.—Where a venire facias for the grand jury was dated October, instead of September, by inadvertence or mistake, and afterwards corrected in accordance with the fact, and the grand jury duly summoned at the right time, it was held no ground for disturbing the judgment. Davis v. Com., 89 Va. 132, 15 S. E. Rep. 388.

Venire Facias Not Per Se Part of the Record.—The venire facias can only become part of the record by bill of exceptions. Taylor v. Com., 90 Va. 109, 17 S. E. Rep. 812.

Venire Facias Conforming to Statute Passed after Accused Was Indicted.—The venire facias having been issued on the 18th of August 1871, properly conformed to the provisions of the act of March 29, 1871, Sess. Acts 1870-71, ch. 262, p. 357, which went into operation on 1st of July 1871; though this act was not in force at the time the prisoner was arrested, committed and indicted. Price v. Com., 21 Gratt. 846.

2. NUMBER FROM WHICH JURY CHOSEN.—The number of persons summoned, from which the jury is formed, is fixed by statute. Shinn v. Com., 32 Gratt. 899; Eastham v. Holt, 43 W. Va. 599, 27 S. E. Rep. 883, Va. Code 1887, § 3976; W. Va. Code 1899, p. 1011. See also, Mesmer v. Com., 26 Gratt. 976.

3. PRESUMPTION OF RECORD EVIDENCE OF LEGAL ORGANIZATION.—As a general rule the officers charged with the organization of a grand jury are presumed to have done their duty, and the presumption is that the jury is duly and legally constituted. Mesmer v. Com., 26 Gratt. 976. And where an indictment filled the whole of a sheet of paper, and was then folded in another half sheet of the same size, on which half sheet the attorney endorsed "Commonwealth v. Joseph Burgess, Indictment," and immediately below, in the handwriting of the foreman of the grand jury, was endorsed, "A true bill," and where the record showed that the grand jury appeared in court and openly presented the indictment as a true bill, such must be considered as the indictment on which the grand jury passed and on which the jury found their verdict. Burgess v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 483.

4. NUMBER NECESSARY TO BE SWORN.—Although one of the forty-eight persons directed by the judge to be summoned to serve as grand jurors for the ensuing twelve months, may be incompetent to serve as a grand juror, a grand jury of sixteen selected from this list, all of whom are competent, is a legal and duly qualified grand jury. Shinn v. Com., 23 Gratt. 899. See also, Eastham v. Holt, 43 W. Va. 599, 27 S. E. Rep. 883.

5. EXCUSING JURORS.—A court may excuse a grand juror if it substitute one who is qualified. Eastham v. Holt, 43 W. Va. 599, 27 S. E. Rep. 883.

Supplying Deficiency.—Where a statute expressly authorizes and requires the court, if a sufficient number of jurors summoned are not in attendance to constitute a grand jury, to cause a sufficient number to be returned from the by-standers or from the county or corporation at large, it is no objection if the court, because a sufficient number of the jurors summoned are not in attendance, causes the required number to be returned from the county at large. Richardson v. Com., 76 Va. 1007; Minor's Syn. Cr. Law 247.

6. SPECIAL GRAND JURY.—Where one of the grand jury finding an indictment was incompetent, and for that reason the grand jury was dismissed and the indictment quashed, the court may direct a special grand jury of eight to be summoned and impaneled at the same term; and an indictment found by this grand jury is valid. Shinn v. Com., 32 Gratt. 899.

No Venire Facias Required to Summon.—There is no requirement that a venire facias shall issue to summon a special grand jury, as in case of a regular grand jury. Robinson v. Com., 88 Va. 903, 14 S. E. Rep. 627.

D. THE OATH.—A third count of an indictment was objected to, because it did not appear on its face, that it had been found upon the oath of the grand jury. The court held that, "that difficulty is obviated by the fact of the grand jury having been actually sworn in open court, before the indictment was found, as appears from a transcript of the record filed with the petition; and therefore, the whole indictment must necessarily have been found upon oath of the grand jury. Huffman v. Com., 6 Rand. 685.

Oath Administered by Clerk De Facto—Effect.—Upon a presentment for gaming, defendant pleads in abatement, that the clerk de facto, who administered the oath to the grand jury that made the presentment, was not clerk de jure, at the time. Held, the plea is naught. Hord v. Com., 4 Leigh 674.

E. THE CHARGE.—Failure to charge the grand jury, as provided by § 3982 of the Code, does not vitiate an indictment found by them. Porterfield v. Com., 91 Va. 801, 22 S. E. Rep. 352; Eastham v. Holt, 43 W. Va. 599, 27 S. E. Rep. 883.

Erroneous Charge.—When once the indictment has been returned "A true bill," it is immaterial whether the court erred in charging or omitting to charge the grand jury as the question then is to try the case and learn whether the accused is guilty. Eastham v. Holt, 43 W. Va. 599, 27 S. E. Rep. 883.

F. POWER OF GRAND JURY—WHENCE DERIVED.—A grand jury must derive its power from and exercise its functions under the authority of a legally constituted court. Jackson v. Com., 18 Gratt. 795.

1. TERM OF COURT.

a. Term to Which Defendant Is Held.—When a party is held to answer at a particular term and no indictment is found at that term section 4001 of Va. Code 1887, provides that if that term and another elapse without an indictment having been found against the accused he shall be discharged from his imprisonment. Waller v. Com., 84 Va. 492, 5 S. E. Rep. 364; Glover v. Com., 86 Va. 382, 18 S. E. Rep. 420. See also, Jones v. Com., 19 Gratt. 478; Bell's Case, 8 Gratt. 600; Bell's Case, 7 Gratt. 646; Com. v. Adcock, 8 Gratt. 661; Com. v. Lovett, 2 Va. Cas. 74; Wortham v. Com., 5 Rand. 669; Hall v. Com., 78 Va. 678.

Special Session Not Counted.—A special session of a superior court of law held for the trial of offences is not the third term within the meaning of the act (1 Rev. Code of 1819, ch. 169, § 28), but is a substitute for it, and therefore, where there was a failure to hold two regular terms, and then a special session was held, at which the prisoner was not tried; but being at the regular term succeeding the special session, he ought not to be discharged from the crime, but may be tried. Com. v. Lovett, 2 Va. Cas. 74.

Faulty Indictment.—Section 12, ch. 158, W. Va. Code of 1891 provides that the prisoner if not indicted before the end of a second term shall be discharged. Though an indictment for a minor grade of offence, or a faulty indictment, be found, which the state refuses to prosecute, it is equivalent to the case of no indictment found, and under the plain intent of the statute the state is allowed to detain the defendant under the mittimus by the justice until the end of the second term. Eastham v. Holt, 43 W. Va. 599, 27 S. E. Rep. 883.

Indicted in One Court, Held for Trial in Another.—In November 1893, a prisoner was indicted and remanded in a county court for trial and demanded to be tried in the circuit court, whereupon he was remanded for trial in that court; and at the next term of the circuit court, the cause was continued upon the motion of the commonwealth; and at the following term the court dismissed the said indictment of its own motion in the absence of the prisoner, and over his objection upon the ground that it had no jurisdiction to try the case, but without prejudice to the right of the commonwealth to arrest, indict, and try the accused for the offence for which he was tried. After said judgment was entered, and before the accused was actually released from custody, another warrant was issued against him for the same offence, and upon it he was committed to jail to answer an indictment in the county court. At the June term of the said court, he was again indicted for the same offence. He then pleaded "not guilty" and his cause was continued. Whereupon he sued out a writ of habeas corpus, alleging that the order of the said circuit court operated as an acquittal of the accused of the offence for which he was in custody. The prisoner also contended in this case that he was entitled to be discharged from imprisonment because no presentment or indictment was made against him before the end of the second term of the court in which he was held to answer, as is provided by section 4001 of the Code 1887. The court held that he was not entitled to be discharged from imprisonment under section 4001 of the Code, because he was under indictment during the whole time he was held to answer in the circuit court, and at no time did two terms of the county court elapse without indictment while he was held to answer in that court. After the prisoner demanded to be tried in the circuit court, and the case was removed to that court, the county court had no further jurisdiction over the case till after the indictment was dismissed in the said circuit court, and the prisoner had been rearrested under a new warrant issued for that purpose. Dulin v. Lillard, Sheriff, 91 Va. 778, 20 S. E. Rep. 821.

b. Character of Term.—But under a provision that if a person remains in custody without presentment, indictment, or information found or filed against him before the end of the second term of the court in which he is held to answer, he shall be entitled to a discharge. If the offence is one for which he can only be tried on an indictment two terms must pass at which indictments can be found, and it is not sufficient to warrant a discharge, no matter how many terms may pass at which informations may be found. Jones v. Com., 19 Gratt. 481; 10 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 384.

When Information Found before End of Second Term of No Avail.—A felony being triable on an indictment only, under section 18, ch. 207 (Acts of Assembly 1866-7, pp. 928-9), which is in part as follows, "A person in jail on a criminal charge shall be discharged from imprisonment if a presentment, indictment or information be not found or filed against him before the end of the second term of the court in which he is held to answer, unless it appear to the court, etc.," that kind of accusation must be made within the period limited by the statute; which the nature of the offence requires. Therefore, when the offence is a felony, it is necessary that an indictment shall be found against the prisoner "before the end of the second term of court in which he is held to answer, unless, etc." The filing of an information being unauthorized in such a case, is of no avail. Jones v. Com., 19 Gratt. 478.

Indictment for Different Offence.—A prisoner was arrested for housebreaking with intent to kill and rob. Subsequently he was indicted for burglary and grand larceny, and was held under this indictment until the third grand jury, which had met since his arrest, indicted him for a felonious assault. Upon the last indictment he was tried and convicted. The prisoner contended that he was entitled to his discharge because the indictment on which he was tried was not found until the third term at which a grand jury was impaneled after his arrest. Held, the simple requirement of the statute is that some indictment shall be found before the end of the second term, or else the accused shall be discharged from imprisonment. Manifestly the present case does not come within the statute, for here, the accused was indicted by the first grand jury that met after his arrest, and the commonwealth has only done what she had a right to do, exercised her election as to the indictment upon which the prisoner should be tried. Waller v. Com., 84 Va. 494, 5 S. E. Rep. 364.

c. How Calculated.—A term of the court at which a prisoner is held to answer is, within the meaning of section 4001 of Code 1881, which provides in substance that if two terms of court elapse while the prisoner is held in custody, without an indictment having been found against him, and the failure to indict is not the result of any exceptions therein enumerated, he should be discharged from his imprisonment, a term complete by commencing on the first day. Therefore, where during a term of court accused is sent on for indictment, that term is not considered one of the two terms at which he must be indicted under the above statute. Bell v. Com., 8 Gratt. 600; Jones v. Com., 19 Gratt. 478; Glover v. Com., 86 Va. 382, 10 S. E. Rep. 420.

A different doctrine from that stated in the last paragraph was held in Hall v. Com., 78 Va. 678, which to that extent is overruled by Glover v. Com., 86 Va. 382, 10 S. E. Rep. 420.

A prisoner being sent on for further trial by an examining court, which sat during the session of the circuit court to which he is sent for further trial; that term of the circuit court is not one of the two at which the statute directs that he shall be indicted, or that he shall be discharged from imprisonment. Bell's Case, 7 Gratt. 646.

Remedy for Improper Refusal to Discharge.—Where, before the indictment was found, a motion was made and improperly overruled to discharge the prisoner on the ground that two terms had elapsed since he had been held to answer, without any indictment having been found against him this remedy was not by writ of error, but by habeas corpus, which is too late after final judgment. Glover v. Com., 86 Va. 382, 10 S. E. Rep. 420.

2. SECOND OR NEW INDICTMENT.—"The simple requirement of the statute is that some indictment shall be found before the end of the second term, or else the accused shall be discharged from imprisonment, although liable to be again arrested and tried upon any indictment that may be subsequently found against him." Waller v. Com., 84 Va. 494, 5 S. E. Rep. 364.

Second Indictment When Verdict Set Aside.—A prisoner indicted for embezzling the goods of W. was at the fifth term tried and convicted of the offence; but the verdict was set aside for a variance between the allegation and the proof, as to the ownership of the goods; and the case continued. At the next term of the court the attorney for the commonwealth entered a nolle prosequi upon the indictment; and the prisoner was indicted again for the same offence; the indictment in the first count being the same as in the former indictment, and another count charging the goods embezzled to be the goods of A. Upon his arraignment he moved the court to discharge him from arrest, on the ground that three regular terms of the court had been held since he was examined and remanded for trial without his being indicted. The attorney for the commonwealth opposed the motion and offered the record of the proceedings of the circuit court upon the first indictment, to show that he had been indicted, tried and convicted; which was objected to by the prisoner. Held, that the second indictment being for the same act of embezzlement as the first, and the prisoner having been indicted, tried and convicted in time, and the verdict set aside for the variance, the second indictment was proper and in time; and the prisoner is not entitled to be discharged. Com. v. Adcock, 8 Gratt. 661.

3. SECRECY.—A grand juror cannot for any purpose be interrogated as to his action as a grand juror; nor is it an error for the court to refuse to permit a witness to be interrogated as to his action as a grand juror with a view of showing his prejudice. State v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co., 15 W. Va. 362.

a. Proof of Testimony before Grand Jury.

By Grand Jurors.—Whether a grand juror is a competent witness at the trial to prove contradictory testimony given by a witness before the grand jury, was left undecided in the case of Little v. Com., 25 Gratt. 932.

By Third Persons.—A third person who was present may be called to prove statements made by a witness before the grand jury different from those made on the trial. Little v. Com., 25 Gratt. 932.

b. Grand Jurors' Votes Cannot Be Inquired into.—Where two or more of the grand jury which found an indictment had served on another grand jury at the same time, how they voted on the indictment as members of the first grand jury, cannot properly be inquired into. Richardson v. Com., 76 Va. 1007.

G. DISCHARGE OF GRAND JURY.—It is within the discretion of a court to discharge a grand jury. It is a common-law power. Our Code recognizes this power in saying that "when one grand jury has been discharged, another may, by order of the court, be summoned to attend the same term." W. Va. Code 1891, § 10, ch. 157, and section 9 says that, when one grand jury has found an indictment not a true bill, another indictment may be sent to it, or acted on by another grand jury, showing that the state may have another grand jury, and persist in her prosecution. Of course it can do so when there is no finding at all. Eastham v. Holt, 43 W. Va. 599, 27 S. E. Rep. 883.

H. PROCEEDINGS BY AND BEFORE GRAND JURY.

1. INITIATING PROCEEDINGS.—When an indictment has been prepared by the proper officer of the court, it is submitted to the grand jury, and upon their finding it a true bill, the prosecution commences upon that indictment. Com. v. Christian, 7 Gratt. 631; Minor's Syn. Cr. Law 251.

Indictment Drawn by Counsel for Defendant.—Indictments drawn by counsel for the defendant and intended to present to the court questions in moot form will not be taken into consideration by the supreme court of appeals of this state. Peel

Splint Coal Co. v. State, 36 W. Va. 802, 15 S. E. Rep. 1000.

2. PRESENCE OF OR INTERFERENCE BY OTHERS THAN GRAND JURORS.

Prosecuting Attorney.—The prosecuting attorney may be with the grand jury up to the time of the action of the grand jury in determining the result. State v. Baker, 33 W. Va. 319, 10 S. E. Rep. 639.

A plea in abatement to an indictment which avers that the prosecuting attorney, of his own motion, without authority of the law, went into the grand jury room while the grand jury was in session, and there, in the presence of the grand jury, examined certain witnesses, upon whose testimony the indictment was found, and there talked in the presence of the grand jury about said testimony of said witnesses, and thus unlawfully conspired against the defendant to have said grand jury find said indictment, does not present cause for abating the indictment, and was properly rejected. State v. Baker, 33 W. Va. 319, 10 S. E. Rep. 639.

An Officer.—A plea in abatement will not lie to an indictment because the sheriff or a deputy were in the grand jury's room, when they were deliberating and examining the witnesses, upon whose testimony the indictment was found. Richardson v. The Commonwealth, 76 Va. 1007.

An Outsider.—A plea setting forth that after the grand jury was impaneled and sent to their room to enquire of the indictment, a person, not a member of the grand jury or a sworn officer of the court, was admitted and examined other witnesses sent before the grand jury, was rejected. Held, no error, because plea did not allege that the person was not a witness sworn and sent to the grand jury by the court, but inferentially alleges that he was a witness. Lawrence v. Com., 86 Va. 573, 10 S. E. Rep. 840.

3. CONCURRENCE ON FINDING.— It is not necessary that sixteen of the grand jury should concur to make a presentment or find a bill of indictment; but if twelve agree, it is sufficient. Com. v. Sayers, 8 Leigh 722.

I. OBJECTIONS.

1. HOW MADE.

a. Plea in Abatement.—Want of qualifications or other objections to a grand jury are to be made effective by a plea in abatement, and writ of error in case of adverse decision on it. Cherry's Case, 2 Va. Cas. 20; Long's Case, 2 Va. Cas. 318; Moore's Case, 9 Leigh 639; Kerby's Case, 7 Leigh 747; Eastham v. Holt, 43 W. Va. 599, 27 S. E. Rep. 883; Booth's Case, 16 Gratt. 520.

Grand Juror Not a Freeholder.—In a prosecution for a misdemeanor at the instance of a voluntary prosecutor, the defendant files a plea in abatement, that one of the grand jurors who found the indictment was not a freeholder; and the issue made up on that plea is found for the defendant, and the indictment quashed. Held, the court should give judgment for the costs against the prosecutor. Com. v. St. Clair, 1 Gratt. 556.

Grand Juror a Mill Owner.—A plea in abatement, that one of the grand jury is the owner of a mill, is good. The Commonwealth v. Benjamin Long, 2 Va. Cas. 318.

Grand Jury Not Summoned According to Law.—A plea in abatement lies to an indictment on the ground that the grand jury which found the indictment had not been summoned according to law, and also because one of the grand jurors was not qualified to serve as such. Early v. Commonwealth, 86 Va. 924, 11 S. E. Rep. 795.

Where a statute expressly authorizes and requires the court, if a sufficient number of the jurors summoned, are not in attendance to constitute a grand jury, to cause a sufficient number to be retained from the bystanders or from the county or corporation at large, a plea in abatement will not lie to an indictment because a sufficient number of the jurors summoned are not in attendance and the court causes the required number to be retained from the county at large. Richardson v. The Commonwealth, 76 Va. 1007. Minor's Syn. Crim. Law 247.

Mere Irregularity in Selecting No Ground for Plea.—But it was said in Eastham v. Holt, 43 W. Va. 599, 27 S. E. Rep. 883, that mere irregularity in the manner of selecting a grand jury, when objection does not go to the competency of jurors, cannot be taken advantage of even by plea of abatement.

Objection Removed by Statute in West Virginia.—No plea in abatement lies to any indictment for any objection to any grand juror arising under § 5 of Act of November, 1863, p. 109. Bradford v. State, 4 W. Va. 763.

The incompetency or disqualification of a grand juror is no ground to abate or quash the indictment. W. Va. Code 1891, ch. 157, § 12; State v. Martin, 38 W. Va. 568, 18 S. E. Rep. 748.

An indictment will not be quashed or abated on the ground that one of the grand jurors who found it was not a freeholder, for § 2, ch. 138 of the Acts of 1882, which provides that the lists from which the grand jurors shall be drawn shall contain only freeholders, is clearly modified by the 12th sec., which says, in effect, that if one drawn on the grand jury is not a freeholder, that fact shall not vitiate an indictment found by him. State v. Henderson, 29 W. Va. 147, 1 S. E. Rep. 225.

Trial of Issue.—Upon an indictment for a felony, the prisoner pleads in abatement that one of the grand jurors who found the indictment against him, was at the time a surveyor of the highway; and the attorney for the commonwealth takes issue upon the plea. The issue should be tried by a jury. Day v. Com., 2 Gratt. 562. But when the questions raised are matters of record they are tried by the court. State v. Martin, 38 W. Va. 568, 18 S. E. Rep. 748.

Waiver of Plea.—A plea in abatement raising objections to the manner of organizing the jury, or to the qualifications of grand jurors, is waived by pleading the general issue alone. Early v. Com., 86 Va. 921, 11 S. E. Rep. 795.

b. Motion to Quash.—The incompetency of one grand juror is sufficient to render an indictment found by a grand jury of which he is a member, defective, for which defect it will be quashed. Shinn v. Com., 32 Gratt. 899; Commonwealth v. Burton, 4 Leigh 645.

2. WHEN MADE.—It is well settled that objections to the mode of summoning a grand jury, or to disqualifications of particular jurors, must be made at a preliminary stage of the case before a plea to the merits, otherwise they are to be considered as waived. Curtis v. Commonwealth, 87 Va. 590, 13 S. E. Rep. 73; Early v. Commonwealth, 86 Va. 921, 11 S. E. Rep. 795; Taylor v. Com., 90 Va. 109, 17 S. E. Rep. 812. Unless indeed the proceeding be void ab initio. Curtis v. Com., 87 Va. 590, 13 S. E. Rep. 73.

Objection to the qualification of an individual grand juror can be taken after indictment found. Com. v. Long, 2 Va. Cas. 318; Day v. Com., 2 Gratt. 562; Com. v. St. Clair, 1 Gratt. 556.

Cannot Be Raised for First Time in Appellate Court.—Objection that the grand jury was not constituted, and foreman not selected and sworn as required by law, cannot be raised for the first time in the appellate court, but must be by plea in abatement. Taylor v. Com., 90 Va. 109, 17 S. E. Rep. 812.

When Too Late to Plead Irregularities before Committing Justice.—But after a prisoner has been tried by an examining court and remanded for further trial before the circuit court, and an indictment found against him, it is too late to plead in abatement that there were irregularities in his examination before the committing magistrate. Clore's Case, 8 Gratt. 606.

3. UNAVAILABLE OBJECTIONS.—Excusing a competent juror does not impair the indictment if his place is filled by a competent one. Eastham v. Holt, 43 W. Va. 599, 27 S. E. Rep. 883.

Improper Discharge of Grand Jury.—The improper discharge of a grand jury does not impair an indictment found by a subsequent jury. Eastham v. Holt, 43 W. Va. 599, 27 S. E. Rep. 883.

Deceit Practiced by Grand Juror.—A corrupt nomination of himself to the sheriff, by a citizen of the commonwealth, to serve on the grand jury; or a false conspiracy or corrupt agreement between the sheriff and himself for that purpose is sufficient to avoid an indictment or presentment found by a grand jury so constituted. Commonwealth v. Cherry, 2 Va. Cas. 20; Commonwealth v. Thompson, 4 Leigh 667.

III. RETURN OF INDICTMENT.

A. NECESSITY.—When a bill of indictment is found by the grand jury and endorsed "a true bill" by the foreman, it should be brought into court, presented by the grand jury, and then the finding should be recorded. Simmons v. Com., 89 Va. 156, 15 S. E. Rep. 386; McKinney's Case, 8 Gratt. 589; Shiffiet's Case, 14 Gratt. 652; Price's Case, 21 Gratt. 846; State v. Heaton, 23 W. Va. 778; Com. v. Cawood, 2 Va. Cas. 527; Minor's Syn. Crim. Law 249.

B. RECORD OF RETURN.—"The bill of indictment is sent or delivered to the grand jury, who, after hearing all the evidence adduced by the commonwealth, decide whether it be a true bill or not. If they find it so, the foreman of the grand jury endorses on it 'a true bill,' and signs his name as foreman, and then the bill is brought into court by the whole grand jury, and in open court it is publicly delivered to the clerk, who records the fact. It is necessary that it should be presented publicly by the grand jury; that is the evidence required by law to prove that it is sanctioned by the accusing body, and until it is so presented by the grand jury, with the endorsement aforesaid, the party charged by it is not indicted, nor is he required, or bound to answer to any charge against him, which is not so presented." Per BROCKENBROUGH, J., in Com. v. Cawood, 2 Va. Cas. 541; State v. Heaton, 23 W. Va. 778; Simmons v. Com., 89 Va. 156, 15 S. E. Rep. 386.

Record Sufficient.—Where the order book contains an entry that the grand jury returned into court and presented "an indictment against O. H. for murder—a true bill," such was held a sufficient record of the finding of an indictment. Hodges v. Com., 89 Va. 265, 15 S. E. Rep. 513.

Record Insufficient.—Where there was copied into the record, a paper, having the regular form of an indictment for murder against the prisoner, having upon it the endorsement, "a true bill," and it appeared from the certificate of the clerk, that this was the precise indictment upon which the prisoner was arraigned, to which he pleaded not guilty, and for the trial of the issue on which the jury was impanelled; but it did not appear from any part of the record, that there was any entry made, that this indictment had been presented by the grand jury as "a true bill." It was held not to be a sufficient record of the fact that the bill was brought into court by the whole grand jury and in open court publicly delivered to the clerk as was required by law. Commonwealth v. Cawood, 2 Va. Cas. 528.

Defect May Be Shown after General Issue Is Pleaded.—It was held in Commonwealth v. Cawood, 2 Va. Cas. 527, that it was not too late, after the prisoner had pleaded the general issue to the indictment, to set up the fact that the record did not show that the indictment had been brought into court by the whole grand jury, and in open court publicly delivered to the clerk.

1. RECORDING.—When a bill of indictment is found by the grand jury and endorsed "a true bill" by the foreman, it should be brought into court, presented by the grand jury, and then the finding should be recorded. An omission to record the finding, cannot be supplied by a paper purporting to be an indict ment, with an endorsement, "a true bill," signed by the person who was foreman of the grand jury at that term. Nor can it be supplied by the recital in the record that he stands indicted, nor by his arraignment, nor by his plea of not guilty. It cannot be intended that he was indicted; it must be shown by the record of the finding. The recording of the finding of the grand jury is as essential, as the recording of the verdict of the jury. Com. v. Cawood, 2 Va. Cas. 527; Simmons v. Com., 89 Va. 156, 15 S. E. Rep. 386; McKinney's Case, 8 Gratt. 589; Shiffiet's Case, 14 Gratt. 652; Price's Case, 21 Gratt. 846; State v. Gilmore, 9 W. Va. 641; State v. Fitzpatrick, 8 W. Va. 707.

An Indictment against Many Only Recorded as to One—Effect.—On the 26th day of October, 1876, the grand jury, in and for the body of the county of Ritchie, in attendance upon the circuit court of said county, then in session, upon their oaths found an indictment; and the entry on the record of the finding of the indictment was as follows, viz.: "An indictment against B. S. Compton for trespass. A true bill." The indictment appearing in the record, and certified by the clerk as being the indictment found in the cause, was against Benjamin S. Compton, J. C. Gilman, G. Slutter, John O'Brien, Patsey Ames, Martin Ames, Martin King, Thomas Faulkner, John Tate, George Tate, Charles Gilman and Henry Keneline, for willful trespass. The defendants by their attorney, moved the court to quash the indictment in the cause, upon the ground that there was no record of the finding of the same; and the court sustaining the motion to quash, as to all the defendants, except the defendant Compton. Whereupon the said B. S. Compton, by his attorney, moved the court to quash said indictment, as to him, for errors appearing on the face of the indictment, and on the ground that there was no record of the finding of said indictment as to him. This motion was overruled. Held, that if the indictment in the case at bar had been against the several persons therein charged and if there had been a record of the finding of the indictment as to all the persons therein charged, a part of them on trial before a jury might have been found guilty, and a part, not guilty. Indeed one of the parties indicted might have been found guilty, and all of the others found not guilty.

Drake & Cochren's Case, 6 Gratt. 665, determined that, although the indictment is against two persons jointly, and the record of the finding of the indictment only shows the finding as to one person, the entry is sufficient to show that the indictment was found against such one person. Upon the authority of that case the entry upon the record is sufficient to show that the indictment was found against Benjamin S. Compton, if the entry upon the record of the finding against "B. S. Compton" is sufficient to identify the indictment against "Benjamin S. Compton." And it was the opinion of the court that an entry against B. S. Compton was sufficient to identify an indictment against Benjamin S. Compton. That the quashing of the indictment for the cause aforesaid did not, under the circumstances, amount to or operate to quash the indictment as to the defendant, Compton, but in fact only operated a dismissal of the indictment as to all the defendants therein named, except said Compton. State v. Compton, 13 W. Va. 852.

Record Not Showing That Defendant Was Indicted—Effect.—An indictment against Luke McKinney, John McKinney, and Joseph McKinney was sent to the grand jury, which indictment was returned to the court with the following endorsement:

"Commonwealth v. Luke McKinney, Thomas McKinney, John McKinney.

"Indictment for wilful trespass to personal property. A true bill.

"WILLIAM ROYSE, Foreman."

The record of the court set out that the grand jury adjourned on yesterday, appeared pursuant to the order of the adjournment, and retired to their room; and after some time returned into court, and presented an indictment against Thomas McKinney, Luke McKinney, and John McKinney for wilful trespass to personal property, a true bill. A writ of venire facias was issued against the parties, which was served on Luke, John and Joseph McKinney; and thereupon Joseph McKinney appeared and moved the court to quash the said indictment as to him, or to set aside the service of venire facias upon him, and discharge him from further prosecution in the cause, for want of any sufficient record of the finding of any bill of indictment against him. The court was of opinion that the sheriff's return of the venire facias as to Joseph McKinney should be quashed, and the said Joseph discharged from further prosecution upon the indictment, because it did not appear from the record that the said Joseph had been indicted; and it was not competent for the court to alter the record in that respect. Com. v. McKinney, 8 Gratt. 589; Cawood's Case, 2 Va. Cas. 527.

Name of Defendants Not Given.—Record states, that two indictments against surveyors of roads are found true bills by grand jury, not naming the surveyors. Held, this is not a record of indictments found against any particular surveyors. Com. v. Snider, 2 Leigh 744.

Court May Look to Indictment When Record Is Uncertain.—The record of the court states that the grand jury presented the following indictments as "true bills," viz. one against M. N., one against, etc., setting out eight names, and then one against Thomas and Richard Whitehead, and one against R. H. G. C. not true bills. Though it is doubtful whether the indictment against Willis and Whitehead belongs to the first or the last class, the court may look to the indictment and the endorsement upon it by the foreman to ascertain the fact. Whitehead v. Com., 19 Gratt. 640.

Record Necessary.—The record of the finding of the grand jury is as essential as the record of the verdict of the jury, as it is the only legal proof of the finding of the indictment. State v. Gilmore, 9 W. Va. 641.

a. How the Record Should Describe the Finding.—"The recording of the finding of the grand jury on the record book need only describe the offence with which the accused is charged as a felony or a misdemeanor." State v. Heaton, 23 W. Va. 774. See also, State v. Whitt, 39 W. Va. 468, 19 S. E. Rep. 873.

The record of the finding of indictment under statute for maliciously shooting, stabbing, cutting, etc., is as follows: "An indictment against Charles W. Crookham, malicious stabbing, a true bill." There was a motion made to quash the indictment, because there was not a proper entry made of the finding thereof by the grand jury. It was insisted that the entry should have been upon the record an indictment for "a felony." It was held that all malicious stabbings are felonies, but all felonies are not malicious stabbings; that the words "malicious stabbings" used in the record of the finding of the indictment much more nearly indicate the character of the offence charged in the indictment than the word "felony" would, and therefore it is sufficient. Crookham v. State, 5 W. Va. 510.

Finding Not an Accurate Description—Effect.—If the recording of the finding by the grand jury on the record book does describe the offence particularly, and the offence so described is not an accurate description of the offence named in the indictment found by the grand jury, it will not vitiate the indictment, unless the offence, as it is recorded, is in irreconcilable conflict with the offence found by the grand jury. State v. Heaton, 23 W. Va. 773; Drake & Cochren's Case, 6 Gratt. 665; State v. Fitzpatrick, 8 W. Va. 707; State v. Gilmore, 9 W. Va. 641; State v. Geyer, 44 W. Va. 649, 29 S. E. Rep. 1020.

An Irreconcilable Conflict—Effect.—"If an entry on the record should be irreconcilably in conflict with an indictment on which an accused is to be tried, the prisoner could not be properly tried on such an indictment for the record would show that no such indictment had ever been found by the grand jury." State v. Heaton, 23 W. Va. 774; State v. Whitt, 39 W. Va. 468, 19 S. E. Rep. 874. Thus where the record showed that the finding of the grand jury was for a felony while the indictment presented was not good otherwise than for a misdemeanor, there was an irreconcilable conflict between the two, and treating the record as an absolute verity it could not be contradicted, and it therefore showed that no such indictment as was there presented had been found by the grand jury; and, there being no record of an indictment for the misdemeanor there was presented a case in which a motion in arrest of judgment if made, should have been entered and allowed to prevail. State v. Whitt, 39 W. Va. 468, 19 S. E. Rep. 874.

b. Erasure of Part of Record—Effect.—A record stated that the grand jury "returned into court, and among other things, presented an indictment against Thomas Nutter for felonious assault and battery." "A true bill." The prisoner pleaded "not guilty." He aftewards asked for leave to withdraw his plea of "not guilty" which was granted. And thereupon he moved the court to strike the cause from the docket, because the finding of the indictment was not recorded. The ground of this motion was that in the order book of the court the four words, "presented an indictment against" had been erased. It appeared from the statement of the clerk that after he had written the words, he had erased them by drawing his pen repeatedly across each of the said words and had then rubbed his finger over them causing a blot for their whole length; he intended to have interlined them, but the interlineation had never been made by him or any other person. The four words were, however, legible and the erasing marks of the pen over them were plain and the large black mark or blot extended over the words apparently made by them, whilst the ink of the erasing marks, or the words, or perhaps both were undried. The court was of the opinion that the motion to strike the case from the docket should be overruled. Com. v. Nutter, 8 Gratt. 699.

c. What Process Should Follow Indictment or Presentment for Misdemeanor.—Where an indictment or presentment is found by a grand jury against any person for a misdemeanor, to which the law has affixed an infamous or corporate punishment, the court before which such presentment or indictment is found, may, in its discretion award a capias in the first instance. Com. v. McClenegan, 3 H. & M. 575; Com. v. McClenegan, 1 Va. Cas. 155; Com. v. Goode, 2 Va. Cas. 200; and, where the punishment is of an inferior nature, and two venire facias have been returned not found, there also the court may award a capias. Com. v. McClenegan, 3 H. & M. 575; Com. v. McClenegan, 1 Va. Cas. 155.

IV. LOST INDICTMENT—CANNOT BE SUPPLIED.

In a prosecution for a felony or misdemeanor, if the indictment is lost at any time before the trial, though after arraignment and plea, the party cannot be tried. The Act, Code 1849, ch. 180, p. 679, authorizing a lost record or paper to be substituted by an authenticated copy or proof of its contents, applies only to civil cases, and does not extend to records or papers in criminal proceedings. Bradshaw v. Com., 16 Gratt. 507.

V. THE INDICTMENT.

A. NECESSARY IN CASE OF FELONIES.—No person shall be put upon trial for any felony, unless upon an indictment found by a grand jury in a court of competent jurisdiction. Va. Code of 1887, § 3090; Simmons v. Com., 89 Va. 156, 15 S. E. Rep. 386; Jones v. Com., 19 Gratt. 481; Matthews v. Com., 18 Gratt. 969; Com. v. Barrett, 9 Leigh 665; Com. v. Cawood, 2 Va. Cas. 527.

B. WHEN FOUND.—"When an indictment is preferred to a grand jury, and they endorse upon it 'A true bill,' according to 4 Blackstone 305, 'the indictment is then said to be found, and the party stands indicted,' and in the language of 1 Chitty 219, the endorsement 'A true bill,' made upon the bill, becomes a part of the indictment, and renders it a complete accusation against the prisoner." Per BARBOUR, J., in Commonwealth v. Cawood, 2 Va. Cas. 527; Price v. Com., 21 Gratt. 846.

C. GENERAL MATTERS OF FORM.

1. CAPTION—PURPOSE OF.—That which precedes the indictment in the transcript, sometimes called the caption, is a part of the record, though no part of the indictment, and may be looked to in order to ascertain whether the inferior court had jurisdiction. Robinson v. Com., 88 Va. 900, 14 S. E. Rep. 627.

Caption Sufficient.—The caption of the indictment setting forth the county, is sufficient without entitling it of the superior court. Taylor v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 94.

The caption of an indictment being "Virginia, Prince William county, to wit:" is sufficient, without its being entitled as of "the Superior Court of Law for the county of Prince William." Burgess v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 483.

Surplusage.—The caption of an indictment was: "Fourth Judicial Circuit, Mineral County Court, in the Circuit Court of Mineral County." It was held that the insertion of the word "Court" after the words "Mineral County" was a clerical error, and must be treated as mere surplusage, and is cured after verdict. State v. Gilmore, 9 W. Va. 641.

Caption Applies to Whole Indictment and Each Count Thereof.—An indictment contained two counts. The caption was "Virginia—Roanoke County, to wit." The petitioner demurred to the entire indictment alleging as to the second count that it had no caption and no venue was laid. Held, that the caption "Virginia—Roanoke County, to wit" applies to the whole indictment and to each count in it. Wright v. Com., 82 Va. 185.

Name of County in Margin Not Indispensable.—It seems that the naming of the county in the margin is not indispensable, if it be found in the body of the indictment. Tefft's Case, 8 Leigh 721; Minor's Syn. Cr. Law 252.

2. ALLEGATION OF JURISDICTION.—An indictment laying the offence as committed in the county of N., in the parish of H., without the words, within the jurisdiction of this court, or, within the county, or the district composed of the counties for which the court is held, was bad, after verdict, until the act of January 24th, 1804, which enacted "that after the verdict of twelve men, no judgment on any indictment, or information for felony, or any other offence whatsoever, shall be stayed or reversed for any supposed defect or imperfection in any such indictment or information, so as the felony, or offence therein charged to have been committed, or done, be plainly and in substance set forth with convenient certainty, so as to enable the court to give judgment thereupon according to the very right of the cause, any former law, custom, or usage, to the contrary notwithstanding." Com. v. Richards, 1 Va. Cas. 1.

The omission to charge that the offence was committed "within the jurisdiction of the court," the county itself being named, is cured by verdict. Taylor v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 94.

It is necessary to aver and to prove the place where the crime with which the accused stands charged was committed. It is not sufficient to aver that the offence was committed "within the jurisdiction of the court" which is a conclusion of law. Early v. Com., 93 Va. 767, 24 S. E. Rep. 936.

3. DATE.—It is not necessary that the indictment should show on its face, the date when it was found. Burgess v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 483; Haught v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 3.

Omitting to State Grand Jury Was Attending Court.—An indictment is not bad for its omission to state that the grand jury was attending the court. State v. Williams (W. Va.), 38 S. E. Rep. 495.

4. OMISSION IN INDICTMENT CURED BY RECORD.—In a bill of indictment with three counts, if in the third count is omitted to be stated that the grand jury "on their oath" present (the first two counts being regular in that respect), the objection is obviated by the fact, that the record states, that the grand jury were sworn in open court. Huffman v. Com., 6 Rand. 685.

5. INDORSEMENTS.

a. Indorsement of Prosecutor.—Code 1887, section 3991 does not require the name of the prosecutor to be written at the foot of the indictment for a felony, but only for a misdemeanor. Thompson v. Com., 88 Va. 45, 13 S. E. Rep. 304.

In an indictment for a trespass or misdemeanor, it is not necessary to insert the name or surname of a prosecutor at the foot of the indictment, if it appears that the indictment was found true on the evidence of a witness sent to the grand jury, either at their own request, or by direction of the court, and this whether there was a previous presentment or not. Wortham v. Com., 5 Rand. 669.

Misdescription of Prosecutor.—A plea in abatement of an indictment for a trespass, or a misdemeanor, alleging that the prosecutor is not a laborer, but an husbandman, is bad on demurrer. Haught v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 3.

Omission of Title of Prosecutor.—The omission to write the title or profession of the prosecutor at the foot of an information or indictment, is no ground of exception, either by motion to quash or plea in abatement. Com. v. Dever, 10 Leigh 685.

What Words Sufficient to Show One the Prosecutor.—At the foot of the indictment these words were written: "By the information of James Baker, laborer of Harrison County, sworn in Court, and endorsed as prosecutor at his request." The above words were held sufficient to show that James Baker was the prosecutor. Haught v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 3.

Prosecutor Insolvent.—An indictment will not be dismissed, though the prosecutor be insolvent, if the court would ex officio have directed a prosecution to be instituted. Com. v. Hill, 9 Leigh 601.

Prosecutor a Competent Witness in Support of Indictment.—On an indictment for an assault and battery on the voluntary information of the person assaulted, the informer and prosecutor, being the only witness for the prosecution, is a competent witness, though liable for costs in case defendant is acquitted. Gilliam v. Com., 4 Leigh 688.

b. Endorsement of Witnesses—Statutory.—Statutes provide that the name of the witnesses upon whose evidence the grand jury make their indictment shall be written on the foot of the indictment. Shelton v. Com., 89 Va. 450, 16 S. E. Rep. 355; Porterfield v. Com., 91 Va. 801, 22 S. E. Rep. 352; State v. Shores, 31 W. Va. 491, 7 S. E. Rep. 413; State v. Enoch, 26 W. Va. 253; Com. v. Dever, 10 Leigh 685; Com. v. Williams, 5 Gratt. 702.

Indictment—How Affected by Omission.—But these statutes are directory only, and the omission of such names does not vitiate the indictment. State v. Shores, 31 W. Va. 491, 7 S. E. Rep. 413; Shelton v. Com., 89 Va. 450, 16 S. E. Rep. 355; Porterfield v. Com., 91 Va. 801, 22 S. E. Rep. 352; State v. Enoch, 26 W. Va. 253; Com. v. Dever, 10 Leigh 685; Com. v. Williams, 5 Gratt. 702; Lawrence v. Com., 86 Va. 573, 10 S. E. Rep. 840.

Omission Does Not Exclude Witness.—The omission of the names of witnesses in the indorsement of an indictment will not operate to exclude such witnesses from testifying at the trial. Lawrence's Case, 30 Gratt. 853.

6. INDORSEMENT OF FINDING.—The only proper indorsement on an indictment is "a true bill" or, not "a true bill" with the name of the foreman; and anything more is not a part of the finding of the grand jury, but mere surplusage. Thompson v. Com., 20 Gratt. 724; State v. Heaton, 23 W. Va. 773.

If, therefore, such additions are made, and are incorrect, or even inconsistent with the indictment, they will not vitiate it, as they will be regarded as no part of the finding of the grand jury. State v. Heaton, 23 W. Va. 773; Thompson v. Com., 20 Gratt. 724.

Endorsement on Different Sheet of Paper.—An indictment filled the whole of a sheet of paper, and was then folded in another half sheet of the same size, on which half sheet the attorney endorsed "Commonwealth v. Joseph Burgess, Indictment": and immediately below, in the handwriting of the foreman of the grand jury, was endorsed, "A true bill. Robert Hamilton, foreman." Although the said half sheet of paper was blank, except the endorsements, and although it was not otherwise attached to the indictment than being folded around it, yet the indictment enveloped by it must be considered as the indictment on which the grand jury passed, and on which the jury found their verdict. If the objection were a good one, it comes too late after verdict. Burgess v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 483.

Incorrect Endorsement.—An indictment for a felony is endorsed "A true gun," which is signed by the foreman. The jury present the paper in court as an indictment, it is read to them by the clerk as their indictment, and assented to by them; it is entered on the record as an indictment, and the prisoner is tried upon the plea of not guilty. Upon a motion to arrest the judgment, held, no indorsement is necessary on the indictment to constitute it such; and the mistaken endorsement cannot invalidate it. White v. Com., 29 Gratt. 824.

Indictment with Verdict of Guilty Endorsed on It.—A prisoner was indicted and convicted of unlawful shooting, but the court set aside the verdict and awarded a new trial. He was again tried under the same indictment and convicted. He moved in arrest of judgment on the ground that the indictment was sent to the grand jury with the former verdict of guilty written thereon. The court held that the objection was not well taken, for it was not made before verdict, and certainly the court had no power to emasculate the record by erasing therefrom the former verdict. Besides, if there were any merit in the objection, a motion in arrest of judgment was not the proper remedy. Forbes v. Com., 90 Va. 550, 19 S. E. Rep. 164.

Record Not Affirmatively Showing Proper Endorsement.—A petition for rehearing for the first time made a point that it did not appear that the indictment had the indorsement, "a true bill." The record did not show that the indictment had not such an indorsement. It said that the grand jury "reported an indictment against Frank Cross for a felony, 'a true bill.'" Held, the report of the grand jury imports that it has such indorsement. The absence of a statement that there was such indorsement does not prove that there was not. It says in effect that there was. Brotherton v. People, 75 N. Y. 159; Whart Cr. Pl. & Prac., sec. 369.

But the record says that the grand jury declared it "a true bill." That is enough. JUDGE DADE in the Burgess' Case, 2 Va. Cas. 487; White's Case, 29 Gratt. 824; Price's Case, 21 Gratt. 846. There is nothing of any substance in the quære on this point in State v. Heaton, 23 W. Va. 773. If there were anything in the point, it comes too late after plea. Burgess' Case, 2 Va. Cas. 487; Whart. Cr. Pl. & Prac., sec. 369. A later certificate of the clerk shows there was such indorsement. Per BRANNON, P., in State v. Cross, 44 W. Va. 315, 29 S. E. Rep. 533.

Endorsement Not Essential.—It was said by DADE, J., in Burgess v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 483, that "in this case, it is not absolutely necessary to decide, whether the endorsement, 'a true bill,' be indispensably requisite to constitute an indictment. If it were necessary to decide this point, it might well deserve to be enquired, whether the law books, in declaring this endorsement to be necessary, to make the paper an indictment, have reference to any other than the mere inceptive stages, while the subject is in the hands of the grand jury. A written charge preferred by the attorney to the grand jury, is not, when handed to them, an indictment, nor does it become so until sanctioned by them, which sanction is indicated by the above endorsement. So far, and in this stage of the proceedings, the endorsement does indeed stamp on the paper, its character of an indictment. But when a still more solemn act has been done, when the grand jury has appeared in court, and there openly presented this charge as a true bill, of which a record has been forthwith made by the court, this higher solemnity may well be supposed to take the place of any minor one, and it would scarcely seem necessary to look beyond this." This as the opinion itself shows was mere obiter dicta. But in Price v. Com., 21 Gratt. 846, the very point was squarely presented to the court; and it was decided chiefly on the dicta in Burgess v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 483, that such endorsement though usual is not necessary and the record of the finding of the jury, upon the order book of the court is a proper evidence of that fact. See also, White v. Com., 29 Gratt. 824; Crump v. Com., 98 Va. 833, 23 S. E. Rep. 760.

It was said by GREEN, J., in State v. Heaton, 23 W. Va. 773, that, "I am not now prepared to say, that in this state the endorsing on an indictment the words 'a true bill' and the signing of such endorsement by the foreman of the grand jury, would under any circumstances be dispensed with. There is no decision binding on us, in which it has been so held. And certainly this long-established and useful practice ought to be followed as the recognized and proper mode of avoiding difficulties, even if it were held not to be absolutely necessary."

But in the later case of State v. Hill, 46 W. Va. —, 35 S. E. Rep. 831, it was expressly decided that the fact that an indictment is not endorsed "A true bill" and signed by the foreman of the grand jury, is not a fatal defect.

The record showed that the grand jury returned into court having found the following indictments, to wit: State v. Thacker Coal & Coke Company, a corporation. An indictment for a misdemeanor. A true bill. A. B. Straton, Foreman. It was claimed by the defendant's counsel that it did not appear from the record that the indictment was endorsed on the back of it, "a true bill," and signed by the foreman. The court held as follows: "The record, it is true, leaves out the word 'indorsed,' but it shows that the grand jury returned into court the indictment against the defendant, 'A true bill,' signed by A. B. Straton, foreman. The indictment is not signed on the face of it. There is but one thing it could mean,—that the indictment was returned into court with the indorsement on it as stated on the record. The indorsement is no part of the indictment, further than as a mark of identification, and it is hard to conceive how the record of the finding of the indictment by the grand jury could be made up, other than from the indorsement upon the indictment itself. It is the record of the finding as returned by the grand jury." State v. Thacker Coal & Coke Co. (W. Va.), 38 S. E. Rep. 539.

7. CONCLUSION OF INDICTMENT.

a. Contra Pacem—Necessity of Such Conclusion.- It is an old rule in the law of criminal procedure that an indictment must conclude against the peace and dignity of the government whose law has been violated, and the requirement of this conclusion, in words appropriate to our form of government has been incorporated into the constitution of Virginia and West Virginia. Brown v. Com., 86 Va. 466, 10 S. E. Rep. 745; State v. McClung, 35 W. Va. 280, 13 S. E. Rep. 654.

Omission Fatal.—The rule thus established is strictly applied and the omission thus formally to conclude an indictment, is fatal. Earley v. Com., 86 Va. 921, 11 S. E. Rep. 795; Thompson v. Com., 20 Gratt. 724; Com. v. Carney, 4 Gratt. 546.

W. Virginia Not Equivalent to West Virginia.—An indictment for larceny concluded against the peace and dignity of the state of W. Virginia. The fifth section of the first article of the constitution provides that indictments shall conclude, "against the peace and dignity of the State of West Virginia." The court held that when the constitution of the state requires an indictment to conclude in certain form and words, the indictment is not good unless it concludes in the exact language of the constitution; that in this case, there is not a literal compliance and consequently the indictment is insufficient. Lemons v. State, 4 W. Va. 755.

Prisoner Cannot Waive Defect.—And a prisoner, by failing to demur, or moving to quash, or moving in arrest of judgment, on an indictment not in the exact language required by the constitution, cannot be held to have waived his right to make objections to the indictment in the appellate court; the right being a constitutional, and not a personal right. Lemons v. State, 4 W. Va. 755.

Adding Name of State.—The constitution, adopted on the 4th Thursday of August, 1872, required all indictments to conclude "against the peace and dignity of the state," an indictment concluding "against the peace and dignity of the state of West Virginia" is not repugnant to the constitution: for the conclusion is precisely that prescribed by the constitution, and the words "of West Virginia" that are added to the conclusion should be considered as mere surplusage or additional designation, inasmuch as they do not indicate a state different from the one intended as having been offended in its peace and dignity. State v. Allen, 8 W. Va. 660; Brown v. Com., 86 Va. 466, 10 S. E. Rep. 745.

b. Contra Formam—When Necessary.—Where the offence is entirely created by statute; or where the offence at common law is made by statute a crime of a higher nature, as a misdemeanor, a felony; or where the offence existed at common law, but a different punishment is inflicted by statute, there the averment should be contra formam statuti. See note appended to the case of Chiles v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 260.

When Necessary.—But where the offence was felony at common law, but an act ousts the offender of some benefit which the common law allowed him, as of benefit of clergy, the averment is unnecessary because the statute neither creates a new offence nor adds a new penalty, and it cannot be said with propriety that the offence was committed contrary to the provisions of such an enactment. See note appended to the case of Chiles v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 260.

8. SIGNING BY PROSECUTING ATTORNEY.—It is not required at common law that the indictment be signed by a prosecuting officer, and there is no statute requiring it in Virginia. If such signature were essential to the validity of an indictment, the grand jury would be completely under control of the prosecuting officer. Thompson v. Com., 88 Va. 45, 13 S. E. Rep. 304.

VI. INFORMATION.

A. BY WHOM FILED.—"At common law, indeed, a criminal information might have been 'filed by the attorney general ex officio, upon his own discretion, without any leave of the court,' or 'by the king's crown or attorney in the court of king's bench,' usually called the master of the crown office, who is for this purpose the standing officer of the public. Neither of these methods of procedure now obtain in this state, if, indeed, they ever did, which seems at least doubtful." 1 Bish. Cr. Prac., §§ 604, 605, 606; Com. v. Ayres, 6 Gratt. 668; Christian's Case, 7 Gratt. 637.

For a long series of years, by a practice unknown to the common law in England, presentments have been allowed to stand in this state as the foundation for an information in cases of misdemeanor, or the commonwealth's attorney has been allowed, by express statute, to file an information upon a complaint in writing, verified by the oath of a competent witness. Code 1873, ch. 201, § 2; Code 1887, § 3990; Christian's Case, 7 Gratt. 637. Per HINTON, J., in Wilson v. Com., 87 Va. 95, 12 S. E. Rep. 108.

B. VERIFICATION, AFFIDAVIT OR COMPLAINT. —Under § 3990, Va. Code 1887, an information cannot be maintained unless filed upon a presentment or indictment by a grand jury or upon a complaint in writing verified by the oath of a competent witness. Wilson v. Com., 87 Va. 94, 12 S. E. Rep. 108.

Quashed Indictment Not Sufficient.—An indictment being quashed because one of the grand jurors who found it was not a freeholder, the indictment is not sufficient foundation for a rule upon the party to show cause why an information should not be filed against him. Com. v. Ayres, 6 Gratt. 668.

When Presentment Sufficient.—A presentment of a grand jury, to be a proper foundation for an information, must contain every matter necessary to render the act imputed to the defendant unlawful; and the supposed offence must be described with at least reasonable certainty. Bishop v. Commonwealth, 13 Gratt. 785.

C. AMENDMENT.

1. WHEN ALLOWED.—On an information for perjury, the attorney for the commonwealth, may be allowed to amend the information in accordance with the presentment on which it is founded, after the appearance of the defendant and a motion by him to quash it. Com. v. Lodge, 6 Gratt. 699.

2. WHEN NOT ALLOWED.—When an oath has been taken in order to procure a marriage license, and the license issued and the marriage had accordingly, the party may be indicted for a misdemeanor. But if this is not charged in the presentment, nor in either count of the information, while it is competent for the court in a proper case, to permit the attorney for the commonwealth to file an amended information, yet in this case such leave should not be given, as the offence charged in the presentment does not amount to a misdemeanor. Commonwealth v. Williamson, 4 Gratt. 554.

D. MISCELLANEOUS—SUSPENSION OF ATTORNEY FOR MALPRACTICE.—By the provision of the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 76, § 6, a court cannot, for malpractice of an attorney or counsellor, committed in its presence, suspend the license of the party offending, in a summary way, but must direct an information to be filed against him, and inflict the punishment on the verdict of guilt found on such information. Ex parte Fisher, 6 Leigh 619.

Carrying Off Line Fence.—Information charged that defendant did knowingly and wilfully, without lawful authority, cut down and carry off a line tree between his land and the land of a certain J. H. contrary to the form of the statute. Held, the offence was not so charged as to be punishable by any law in force in Virginia. Com. v. Powell, 8 Leigh 719.

Using Means to Prevent Witnesses from Attending Court.—Using means to prevent, and preventing a witness from attending court, who had been duly summoned, is a contempt of court, which may be punished by information. Com. v. Feely, 2 Va. Cas. 1.

Justice May Be Removed for Misbehavior.—A justice of the peace may be amerced and removed from office, upon an information against him, in a superior court of criminal jurisdiction, for misbehavior in office. Commonwealth v. Alexander, 4 H. & M. 522.

Information or Indictment Proper to Remove Public Officer.—Proceeding by information or indictment in the county or corporation court, or by writ of quo warranto in the circuit or corporation court, is the proper mode to remove a sheriff or other officer from office in Virginia. Alexander's Case, 1 Va. Cas. 156; Mann's Case, 1 Va. Cas. 308; Wallace's Case, 2 Va. Cas. 130; 1 Min. Inst. 110; Royall v. Thomas, 28 Gratt. 130; Va. Code 1887, ch. 145, § 3022, etc. See also, State v. Matthews, 44 W. Va. 372, 29 S. E. Rep. 994.

A Civil Proceeding.—An information in the nature of a writ of quo warranto, though in form a criminal proceeding, yet is in substance a civil proceeding, for the trial of a civil right; and, therefore, the act which limits the prosecution of informations on any penal law to one year, does not apply to any such information. Com. v. Birchett, 2 Va. Cas. 51.

Fine Going Entirely to Informer Not Recoverable by Information.—The penalty of $150 imposed by the act of 1797 on tavern keepers suffering the game of faro in their houses, could not be recovered by information for the use of the commonwealth, the penalty being given to the person suing for the same, and it being no offence at common law. Com. v. Richards, (1803), 1 Va. Cas. 133.

Soon, it was provided otherwise, by statute. See 1 Rev. Code 1803, p. 373, § 7; 1 Rev. Code 1819, p. 569, § 23. Where a fine or a part thereof goes to the commonwealth, it may be recovered in the name of the commonwealth by presentment, indictment, or information; or where no corporal punishment is prescribed, by warrant, if the fine does not exceed $20, but if exceeding that amount, by the action of debt, or action on the case, or by motion. Va. Code 1878, §§ 712, 715; So. Express Co. v. Com., at relation of Walker (1895), 92 Va. 59, 22 S. E. Rep. 809. But where the forfeiture goes entirely to the informer, as, in a proceeding for a fine against telegraph company, under § 1292 of the Code, the proceeding is by action, and need not be in the name of the commonwealth. Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Tyler (1893), 90 Va. 297, 18 S. E. Rep. 280.

When an Information Does Not Lie.—When a presentment is in a circuit court, for an offence for which the penalty prescribed by law does not exceed twenty dollars, the court cannot proceed by way of information, but only in a summary way under the statute of 1 Rev. Code, ch. 169, § 65; Webb v. Com., 2 Leigh 721; Minor's Syn. Cr. Law 250. And it was held in Hendrick v. Andrick, 1 Va. Cas. 267, that an information qui tam did not lie to recover a penalty imposed by statute which makes the penalty "recoverable on warranty, petition or action, as the case may be."

And it is declared by statute that a prisoner cannot be put on trial for a felony on an information but only on an indictment found by a grand jury of a court of competent jurisdiction. Com. v. Barrett, 9 Leigh 665; Matthews v. Com., 18 Gratt. 989; Jones v. Com., 19 Gratt. 478.

Party Waiving Filing of Information in Lower Court Cannot Complain in Appellate Court.—In December 1874, E. was elected by the legislature judge of the county courts of G. and B. counties, and on the 12th of the same month commissioned as such; the commissioner stating that he was elected to fill the unexpired term of his predecessor. In December, 1879, W. was elected judge of the same counties, and commissioned as such on the 20th of the same month. Without objection on the part of E., W. entered, at once, upon the duties of the office. On 3rd day of May, 1880, E. filed petition in the circuit court, in which after setting forth the grounds of his claim to the office of judge of the county court for the counties of G. & B., he prayed that a rule should be issued against the said W., to appear before said court and show cause why leave should not be given him to file an information in the nature of a writ of quo warranto at the relation of petitioner, to determine and test their respective rights in the premises. Upon regular proceedings taken judgment was given in favor of E. Upon writ of error it was objected that the information in the nature of a writ of quo warranto was not filed by the commonwealth, but that the proceedings were all had upon petition filed by E. It was held that the record showed that an information had been ordered by the court, but that W. by his counsel waived in open court the filing of any information; that but for this waiver, no doubt, an information in proper form, in the name of the commonwealth would have been filed at once; that having been waived in the court below he could not be heard to say, in the appellate court, that the proceedings were irregular because the information was not filed. The Bland and Giles County Judge Case, 33 Gratt. 443.

VII. PRESENTMENT.

A. GENERAL INCIDENTS.—"A presentment made in the ordinary way by a grand jury is regarded, in the practice at common law, as nothing more than instructions given by the grand jury to the proper officer of the court for framing an indictment for an offence which they find to have been committed." Per LOMAX, J., in Commonwealth v. Christian, 7 Gratt. 631.

Commencement of the Prosecution.—A presentment for a misdemeanor is the commencement of the prosecution of an offence, and if found before the running of the statute of limitations will prevent the statute from barring the prosecution although an information or indictment be not found until after the running of the statute. Commonwealth v. Christian, 7 Gratt. 631.

May Be Ground for Either an Information or an Indictment.—A presentment for a misdemeanor did not conclude "against the peace and dignity of the commonwealth." On this presentment process issued and the defendant appeared and pleaded "not guilty"; and the cause was continued. At the term he, by leave of the court, withdrew his plea; and then moved to quash the presentment for the defect aforesaid; but the attorney for the commonwealth suggesting that an information might be filed upon the presentment, the court overruled the motion to quash, and on the motion of the attorney ordered a rule upon the defendant to show cause why an information should not be filed upon the presentment. Upon this rule the defendant appeared and again moved to quash the presentment. It was said by the court: "No objection is seen in the completeness and sufficiency of this presentment, as a foundation for a rule for an information according to the Virginia practice, though it did omit the conclusion required by the constitution in indictments—'against the peace and dignity of the commonwealth.' If for that or any other technical defect or informality in the presentment, regarding it as an indictment, the commonwealth's attorney should apprehend that the prosecution might not, perhaps, be sustainable, and the real justice of the case be sacrificed, why should he be precluded by the erroneous or doubtful step which he had at first elected to take, from resorting to another course of proceeding, which was originally open to him, whereby the real justice of the prosecution would be attainable? It is not shown that the change of the mode of proceeding could cause any surprise, or any wrong to the defendant. Every matter of fair defence and exculpation, was still fully open to him under this new phase of the prosecution. Why should not the court allow, for the purpose of attaining substantial justice, the correction of pending proceedings in this case, that is allowable in other cases? No reason, therefore, can be perceived, why the commonwealth's attorney, waiving the proceedings upon the summons to answer, should not be permitted to resort to the alternative which he might have originally elected, a summons upon the presentment to show cause why an information should not be filed." Commonwealth v. Christian, 7 Gratt. 639.

The court distinguished the above case from Chichester's Case, 1 Va. Cas. 312, saying: "The prosecution was there instituted by indictment, and was proceeded upon in the only way marked out in cases of indictments. The prosecution rested upon the indictment alone; and if not sustainable upon the indictment, it could not be sustained at all; and the defendant when discharged from the indictment must, of course would, be discharged from the prosecution. The indictment was for its defectiveness quashed, and thereby that prosecution terminated. It is a well settled principle, that the court will not in any case grant an information, where the prosecutor has already preferred an indictment, and the grand jury found a true bill, although it was quashed for insufficiency (Anon. 8 Mod. 187). Here the prosecution was by presentment, which was not as was the indictment, the act of the prosecutor, at least in part, but it was the act of the grand jury. The presentment had not been quashed. It was still a pending prosecution, from which the defendant had never been discharged." Commonwealth v. Christian, 7 Gratt. 640.

When a Proper Foundation for an Information.—A presentment of a grand jury, to be a proper foundation for an information, must contain every matter necessary to render the act imputed to the defendant unlawful; and the supposed offence must be described with at least certainty. Bishop v. Com., 13 Gratt. 785.

Defective Presentment a Good Foundation for an Information.—A presentment is a good foundation for an information, though technically defective. It should not be quashed for such technical defect, if the attorney for the commonwealth asks for a rule for an information. Commonwealth v. Christian, 7 Gratt. 631.

Sufficiency of Presentment May Be Objected to in the Appellate Court.—Upon a rule to show cause why an information should not be filed, the defendant appears and moves the court to quash the presentment on the ground that it does not charge any offence against him; but the motion is overruled. The information is then filed, and he pleads "not guilty"; and on the trial there is a verdict and judgment against him. Upon a writ of error to the appellate court, he may object to the insufficiency of the presentment. Bishop v. Com., 13 Gratt. 785.

When Necessary.—In petty cases where the only punishment is a fine limited to an amount not exceeding $20, the proceedings ought to be by summons to answer the presentment, and an information is not proper. Va. Code 1873, ch. 201, § 22; Va. Code 1887, ch. 196, § 4009; Webb's Case, 2 Leigh 721; Minor's Syn. Cr. Law 250.

Trial on Presentment.—"The presentment has in Virginia the character in itself, of a criminal proceeding, until it is embodied and merged in an indictment for the same offence, or in an information filed upon it; and may stand in the place of an indictment, on which the prosecution for a misdemeanor may proceed, without indictment or information, as was decided in Towles' Case, 5 Leigh 806." Per LOMAX, J., in Commonwealth v. Christian, 7 Gratt. 631.

Regular Practice.—A presentment was subscribed by the foreman of the grand jury, with the name of the individual who was the prosecutor written at the foot, but was not endorsed "a true bill" under the signature of the foreman, nor was it signed by the commonwealth's attorney. Upon this a process was awarded and prosecution carried on without the filing of an information. It was objected that such was irregular practice. Held, practice was regular. Commonwealth v. Towles, 5 Leigh 806.

Presentment Referred to in Minutes of Court Part of the Record.—A presentment of a grand jury in a county or corporation court, referred to in the minutes of the court, but without being spread at large upon them, is a part of the records of the court. Myers v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 160.

Presentment—Does Not Have to Appear on Record in Ex Tenso.—It is not necessary to the validity of a presentment by the grand jury, that it should appear upon the record book in ex tenso. Commonwealth v. Tiernan, 4 Gratt. 545.

Statement of Time.—Since the Act, Code 1860, ch. 207, § 11, no mode of stating the time of an offence in an indictment or presentment can vitiate it. Sledd v. Com., 19 Gratt. 813.

Specifying Neither Time Nor Place.—Upon a presentment for unlawful gaming at cards at a particular place within six months next proceeding, process is issued summoning the defendant to answer a presentment for unlawful gaming at cards, generally, without specifying place or time. Held, such process is good and sufficient. Word v. Com., 3 Leigh 743.

Infant Should Defend Himself in Person or by Attorney.—Upon a presentment against an infant for a misdemeanor, the infant has a right to appear and defend himself in person or by attorney, and it is error to assign him a guardian and to try the case on a plea pleaded for him by the guardian. Word v. Com., 3 Leigh 743.

A Dismission Not a Retraxit.—A dismission of a presentment is not a retraxit, nor is a retraxit known to the criminal law, where the prosecution is carried on by the commonwealth. Wortham v. Com., 5 Rand. 669.

Proof Insufficient to Support Charge.—On a presentment for gaming, the defendant was charged with the offence committed at the booth of Price Skinner; the proof was of gaming at the booth of Clarke, the said Skinner having no right, interest, or agency in the booth. Held, this proof is insufficient to support the charge. Commonwealth v. Butts, 2 Va. Cas. 18.

Plea in Abatement.—Upon a presentment by a grand jury for gaming, defendant tenders plea in abatement, that one of the grand jurors nominated himself to the sheriff to be put on the panel of the grand jury, and thereupon the sheriff put his name on the panel, summoned him to serve, without alleging that this nomination of himself by the grand juror was corrupt, or that there was a false conspiracy between him and the sheriff for returning him on the panel. Held, the plea is naught, and the court ought not to permit it to be filed. Commonwealth v. Thompson, 4 Leigh 667. It was decided in Com. v. Long, 2 Va. Cas. 318, that two pleas in abatement to the same presentment are admissible.

Motion to Quash after Information Filed.—Quære: If a person who has been regularly summoned to show cause why an information shall not be filed upon a presentment found against him by the grand jury, and fails to appear, can he, after the information has been filed, move the court to quash the presentment. Commonwealth v. Scott, 5 Gratt. 697.

When Objection to Presentment Too Late after Verdict.—The judgment cannot be arrested, after verdict against a defendant, whether the witnesses on whose evidence it was found, were called for by the grand jury, or sent to them by the court, or because the name of the prosecutor was not written at the foot of the information. Commonwealth v. Chalmers, 2 Va. Cas. 76.

VIII. SERVICE OF COPY OF INDICTMENT.

It is provided by § 1, ch. 159, W. Va. Code 1891, that the accused shall be allowed a copy of the indictment. Eastham v. Holt, 43 W. Va. 599, 27 S. E. Rep. 888. It was decided in this case that where a judge instead of allowing the original indictment to go into the hands of the attorneys for the prisoner, ordered the clerk to furnish a copy within an hour, and it was furnished, that this was not an error, as the Code of 1891, ch. 159, § 1, does not give the accused or his counsel the original indictment, but a copy.

IX. CHARGING THE OFFENCE.

A. SUFFICIENCY OF INDICTMENT OR INFORMATION.—"Where the definition of an offence, whether it be at common law or by statute, includes generic terms, it is not sufficient that the indictment shall charge the offence in the same generic terms as in the definition; but it must state the species—it must descend to particulars." Per LEWIS, P., in Boyd v. Com., 77 Va. 55.

When an Indictment is Sufficient in Law.—An indictment is sufficient in law, which shows on its face, first, that it has been found by competent authority, in accordance with law; second, that a particular person mentioned therein, has done, within the jurisdiction of the indictors, specific acts at a specified time; third, that such acts, so done, constitute what the court can see, as a question of law, to be a crime justifying the punishment sought to be inflicted. State v. Williams, 14 W. Va. 869.

a. Degree of Certainty.—An indictment must fully and plainly inform the accused of the precise crime, for which he is to be tried, so that he may know against what to prepare his defence, and may plead the judgment in bar of another indictment against him for the same offence. State v. Schnelle, 24 W. Va. 778; Head's Case, 11 Gratt. 819; Arrington v. Com., 87 Va. 98, 12 S. E. Rep. 224.

A rule not affected by the statute now brought into § 4011 of Code of 1887, which provides that "no exception shall be allowed for any defect or want of form in any presentment, indictment, or information" for an offence against the revenue laws, but that "the court shall give judgment therein according to the very right of the case." Young's Case, 15 Gratt. 664; Arrington v. Com., 87 Va. 96, 12 S. E. Rep. 224.

Every indictment must set forth a complete offence, omitting no ingredient which enters into the composition of it. Hampton's Case, 3 Gratt. 591.

And it was said in Thomas v. Com., 2 Rob. 795, that "in all indictments, the offence charged should be averred distinctly and directly, and not by way of intendment or argument."

Libel—Innuendo.—It is an elementary rule of pleading that whatever is alleged must be alleged with certainty, and one of the means of insuring certainty in a complaint or indictment for slander or libel is an innuendo. State v. Aler, 39 W. Va. 549, 20 S. E. Rep. 585.

Violation of Public Law.—Every indictment must show upon its face that some public law of the state has been violated, and that the offender has been indicted therefor, in the manner and within the time prescribed by the law of the land. State v. Ball, 30 W. Va. 382, 4 S. E. Rep. 645.

Sufficient Certainty in an Information.—An information, which charged that "John Feely did use means to prevent, and did then and there prevent, one Samuel Wright from attending as a witness to give evidence to prove the execution of a deed of trust, which deed of trust was executed by the said John Feely to John Draper, after he, the said Samuel Wright, had been duly summoned to attend court as a witness, to prove, etc., by virtue of a summons issued by the clerk of said court who was duly authorized to issue said summons, which act of the said John Feely is contrary to the laws and usages of the commonwealth, against the peace and dignity of the commonwealth," etc., was held to set forth the offence charged with sufficient certainty. Com. v. John Feely, 2 Va. Cas. 1.

Sufficiency May Be Questioned in Appellate Court.—Upon a rule to show cause why an information should not be filed, the defendant appeared and moved the court to quash the presentment on the ground that it did not charge any offence against him, but the motion was overruled. The information was then filed, and he pleaded "not guilty"; and on trial there was a verdict and judgment against him. Upon a writ of error to the appellate court, he may object to the insufficiency of the presentment. Bishop v. Com., 13 Gratt. 785.

b. Necessity of Charging Facts.—It is a general rule that in every indictment the charge must be sufficiently explicit to support itself, for no latitude of intention can be allowed to include any thing more than is expressed. The indictment must charge the crime with such certainty and precision that it may be understood by any one, alleging all the requisites that constitute the offence, that every averment must be so stated that the party accused may know the general nature of the crime of which he is called upon to answer. 1 Chit. Crim. Law 172. State v. Ball, 30 W. Va. 382, 4 S. E. Rep. 647.

What Information for Bribery at an Election Should State.—In an information against a justice of the peace for bribery in the election of a clerk, it ought to be stated with certainty, that an election was holden, and that, at that election, the vote was given. Newell v. Com., 2 Wash. 113 (88).

When Indictment Need Not State That Prisoner Was Free.—In prosecutions under statutes, which declare that persons "being free," shall be punished in a particular manner, different from that prescribed for slaves, it is unnecessary to charge in the indictment the prisoner as being free; for the description of the person in such cases, does not enter into, nor make part of the offence. Young v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 328.

c. Matters of Judicial Notice.—Under Acts 1885-6, p. 259, § 5, it is not necessary in the indictment to allege that the magisterial district therein mentioned had voted against license, for that was a fact of which the court would take judicial notice.

Indictment May Be True and Also Insufficient.—If the indictment may be true, and still the accused may not be guilty of the offence described in the statute the indictment is insufficient. Com. v. Young, 15 Gratt. 666; Boyd v. Com., 77 Va. 55; State v. Riffe, 10 W. Va. 797.

d. Sufficiency of Inartificial Language.—Grammatical errors or the misspelling of words in an indictment are not fatal to it, where they do not affect the sense, and where from the whole context the words as well as the meaning can be determined with certainty by a person of ordinary intelligence. State v. Halida, 28 W. Va. 499.

Clerical Error Not a Fatal Defect.—An indictment charged that M. A. McGahan "on the 28th day of April, 1898, and thence continually, until the day of finding this indictment, at the county of Mineral, a certain ill-governed and disorderly house, unlawfully did keep and maintain, and in said house, for her own lucre and gain, certain evil-disposed persons, as well men as women, of evil name, fame, and conversation, to come together, on the days and times aforesaid, there unlawfully and willingly did cause and procure; and the said person in the said house at unlawful times, as well in the night as in the day on the daytimes aforesaid, there to be and remain, drinking, tippling, cursing, swearing, quarreling, and otherwise misbehaving themselves, unlawfully did permit and suffer; to the common nuisance of all people of this state, and against the peace and dignity of the state." Defendant demurred to the said indictment, assigning as grounds of demurrer that in using the language, "and the said person in the said house at unlawful times," etc., the indictment charges that but one person was disorderly: and the fact that one person only should behave badly at a hotel and saloon, by tippling, cursing swearing, etc., is not sufficient to sustain such a charge, as it is a crime which one person, acting alone, could not commit. The court held that if the sense be clear, nice exceptions ought not to be regarded; and even when the sense of the word may be ambiguous, this will not be fatal, if it is sufficiently shown by the contract in what sense the phrase or word was intended to be used. That the use of the singular word "person" instead of the plural of that word was a mere mistake in leaving off the "s" as it is clearly shown by what follows; and that the indictment would not be held bad for that defect. State v. McGahan (W. Va.), 37 S. E. Rep. 573.

Omission of Conjunction "and."—The record of an indictment showed that it was a joint indictment against Columbus Hash and Rowen Hash for a felony. But the indictment charged that the offence was committed by "Columbus Hash, Rowen Hash," omitting the copulative conjunction "and." It was claimed the indictment was insensible and uncertain as to the number of persons charged with the offence set forth. The court decided that the objection was not well taken, for in every instance in which the expression occurs in the indictment, the words "Columbus Hash" are followed by a comma, and then come the words "Rowen Hash"; that the use of the comma clearly indicated that the words "Columbus Hash" represented the name of one of the two persons jointly indicted, and the words "Rowen Hash" represented the name of the other, and that, by necessary intendment, the meaning is the same as if the expression had been written Columbus Hash and Rowen Hash. Hash v. Com., 88 Va. 174, 13 S. E. Rep. 396.

Misspelling of Name Therein.—Special verdict found the prisoner guilty of transferring a certificate of debt of the commonwealth, purporting to be signed by two auditors of public accounts, knowing it to be forged; if parol proof of the official appointment of the auditors was sufficient, and if the misspelling of the christian name of one of the auditors in the indictment was not material, held, that the law was for the defendant. Com. v. Kearns, 1 Va. Cas. 108.

B. STATUTORY OFFENCE.—An indictment upon a statute must state all the circumstances which constitute the definition of the offence in the act, so as to bring the defendant precisely within it. Com. v. Hampton, 3 Gratt. 590; Boyd v. Com., 77 Va. 52; Arrington v. Com., 87 Va. 99, 12 S. E. Rep. 224; Com. v. Peas, 2 Gratt. 629.

1. LANGUAGE OF THE STATUTE.—JUDGE MONCURE, in delivering the opinion of the court in Com. v. Young, 15 Gratt. 666, said: "In an indictment for a statutory offence, it is generally proper and safest to describe the offence in the very terms used by the statute for that purpose. But it is sufficient to use in the indictment such terms in the description, as that, if true, the accused must of necessity be guilty of the offence described in the statute; and especially so in a case, falling, as this does, in that class, concerning which the law provides, that 'no exception shall be allowed for any defect or want of form in the presentment, indictment or information, but the court shall give judgment thereon according to the very right of the case.' Code, ch. 207, sec. 24, p. 773." State v. Riffe, 10 W. Va. 797; Boyle v. Com., 14 Gratt. 674; State v. Mitchell (W. Va.), 35 S. E. Rep. 845; Dull v. Com., 25 Gratt. 974; Benton v. Com., 91 Va. 793, 21 S. E. Rep. 495; Howel v. Com., 5 Gratt. 664; Scott v. Com., 77 Va. 344; Helfrick v. Com., 29 Gratt. 845; Jones v. Com., 79 Va. 214; Whitlock v. Com., 89 Va. 338, 15 S. E. Rep. 893; State v. Boggess, 36 W. Va. 718, 15 S. E. Rep. 423; State v. Pennington, 41 W. Va. 599, 23 S. E. Rep. 918.

The allegation in the indictment, that the defendant "carried on the business of a druggist without a license thereof," using as it does the language of the statute, is sufficient. State v. Enoch, 26 W. Va. 253.

And it was decided in Bailey v. Com., 78 Va. 20, that in describing an offence under a statute, the indictment must follow the statute, and any material variance will be fatal.

An indictment charging that the accused made an assault with a rock, and did feloniously, maliciously, and unlawfully beat, wound, ill treat, and cause bodily injury, with intent in so doing to maim, disfigure, etc., sufficiently conforms to § 3671 of Code of 1887. Jones v. Com., 87 Va. 63, 12 S. E. Rep. 226.

Surplus Matter Will Not Vitiate.—An indictment, which charges an offence in the language of the statute, will not be held bad because it contains surplus matter. State v. Hall, 26 W. Va. 236.

Words of Statute When Expanded.—Though it is generally sufficient to follow the very words of the statute, "not unfrequently other rules will require it to be expanded beyond the statutory terms. It must fully state the offence, and if this cannot be done in the mere statutory words, it must be expanded beyond them." State v. Mitchell (W. Va.), 35 S. E. Rep. 845.

In indictments it is generally proper and sufficient to describe the offence in the very terms used by the statute for the purpose. Young's Case, 15 Gratt. 666; Burner's Case, 13 Gratt. 778. To this general rule there are exceptions. Thus in some cases it is necessary for the allegation in the indictment to go beyond the words used in the statute; numerous examples are given of this in Bishop's Crim. Pro., vol. 1, § 369 to 374. An instance where the words of the statute ought not to be used, though not properly an exception to this general rule, exists, where a statute on which an indictment is founded, enumerates the offences or intent necessary to constitute the offences disjunctively, the indictment is fatally defective, which uses the words of the statute charging them disjunctively. See Wharton's Crim. Law, vol. 1, § 295; 1 Bishop's Crim. Pro. § 334; State v. Charlton, 11 W. Va. 334.

2. FORMER OFFENCE OR CONVICTION—INCREASED PUNISHMENT.—Where a greater punishment may be inflicted for the second or subsequent violation of the penal law than for the first under statute (Va. Code 1849, p. 752, § 25; Va. Code 1887, § 905), the indictment must set out the time and place of the first conviction, and must show that the previous conviction was for an offence committed before the commission of that for which the prisoner is on trial. Rand v. Com., 9 Gratt. 738.

It seems that the first conviction must be a final judgment and not a judgment suspended on a writ of error. White v. Com., 79 Va. 611; Hurst's Guide & Manuel, p. 618, § 920. See also, on this subject, Stover v. Com., 92 Va. 780, 23 S. E. Rep. 874; Rider v. Com., 16 Gratt. 499; Thomas v. Com., 22 Gratt. 912; Pryor v. Com. (Va.), 26 S. E. Rep. 864.

Under Code 1887, § 3907, declaring that, whenever it is alleged in the indictment on which a person is convicted of petit larceny that he has been before sentenced for a like offence, he shall be confined in jail, etc., and for a third offence shall be sent to the penitentiary, etc., an indictment for petit larceny which, in the first of two substantially similar counts, alleges two prior convictions for a like offence charges a felony, and is therefore triable by the county court, though the second count, because of formal defects, charges only a misdemeanor. Pryor v. Com. (Va.), 26 S. E. Rep. 864.

A statute increasing the punishment for a second conviction of the same offence, passed after the commission of the first is not ex post facto, and unconstitutional. Rand v. Com., 9 Gratt. 738.

C. INTENT OR KNOWLEDGE.

1. KNOWLEDGE.—Under section 1, chapter 26, of Criminal Procedure of 1878-79, making it an indictable offence for obstructing a road, guilty knowledge is a part of the definition of the offence, and it is essential that the scienter should be charged in the indictment. Failure of the indictment to aver the scienter is fatal. Bailey v. Com., 78 Va. 19.

2. FELONIOUSLY.—The word "feloniously" must be used in every indictment for felony. Randall v. Com., 24 Gratt. 646; Barker's Case, 2 Va. Cas. 122; Trimble's Case, 2 Va. Cas. 143; State v. Whitt, 39 W. Va. 468, 19 S. E. Rep. 873; Dull v. Com., 25 Gratt. 974.

The averment that the act was done "feloniously" is so important that the omission of it is an error even after verdict for which the judgment will be arrested. Randall v. Com., 24 Gratt. 647; State v. Whitt, 39 W. Va. 468, 19 S. E. Rep. 873.

Insertion of Word "Feloniously" after Discharge of Grand Jury.—If an indictment for felony found by a grand jury omitted to charge, that the criminal act done was done feloniously, and after the grand jury was discharged the word "feloniously" was inserted in the indictment so as to render it in form a good indictment, when before it was fatally defective, and the defendant pleaded not guilty, and the jury found a verdict against him, he may then move the court to have the indictment restored to its original and true form, and when so restored judgment may be arrested for the fatal defect in the indictment. State of West Virginia v. Vest, 21 W. Va. 796.

3. FRAUDULENT.—Where an act is made an offence when fraudulently done, it must be so charged. Duff v. Com., 92 Va. 769, 23 S. E. Rep. 643.

D. EXCEPTIONS AND PROVISOS.—It is laid down in 1 Chitty Cr. Law 283, that when a statute contains provisos and exceptions in distinct clauses, it is not necessary to state in the indictment that the defendant does not come within the exceptions, or to negative the provisos it contains. 1 Sid. 330; 2 Hale 171; 1 Lev. 26; Poph. 93-4; 1 Burr. R. 148; 2 Burr. R. 137; Com. v. Hill, 5 Gratt. 691. Nor is it even necessary to allege that he is not within the benefit of the provisos (Hendricks v. Com., 75 Va. 943), though the purview should expressly notice them; as by saying that none shall do the act prohibited except in cases thereinafter excepted. Poph. 93-6; Hakw. p. 2, ch. 25, § 113. For all these are matters of defence, which the prosecutor need not anticipate, but which are more properly to come from the prisoner. But where exceptions are in the enacting part of a law, it must be charged that the defendant is not in any of them. Com. v. Hill, 5 Gratt. 688; State v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co., 15 W. Va. 390.

An indictment under the third section of the act of 1839-40, Sess. Acts, ch. 2, p. 5, is good, though it does not negative the exceptions and provisos contained in the 4th section. Com. v. Hill, 5 Gratt. 682.

X. DESCRIPTION OF PERSON.

A. DEFENDANT.

In General.—An indictment or information must name the defendant whom it is intended to charge with the offence therein alleged, and an omission in this regard will make the indictment bad. Commonwealth v. Snider, 2 Leigh 744.

Misnomer May Be Corrected.—An indictment was against John Neale Thompson and concludes: "The said John Neale not being then and there a druggist, against the peace and dignity of the state." The attorney for the state moved the court to allow him to amend the indictment by inserting the name "Thompson" instead of "Neale," where it occurred in the latter part of the indictment. To the making of this amendment the defendant excepted. The court held that the change made in the indictment by inserting the name "Thompson" instead of "Neale" was immaterial and did not prejudice the defendant. And being the mere correction of a misnomer was authorized by the statute, contained in § 10, ch. 158 of W. Va. Code, in force in 1885. State v. Thompson, 26 W. Va. 151.

The plaintiffs in error were jointly indicted under sec. 3805 of the Code 1887, for a disturbance of religious worship. A summons to answer the indictment was duly issued, and served upon them, but there was no appearance on the part of either of them. The indictment contained a misnomer, in this: That Scott Shiflett was called Scott Crawford, by which last name he was commonly known but his name was Scott Shiflett. The court ordered the indictment to be amended by striking out the name "Scott Crawford," and in its place and stead ordered to be inserted the name "Scott Shiflett alias Scott Crawford." This action on the part of the court was objected to on the ground that it was done in the absence of the defendants. The court held the objection to be without merit, in view of the statute which provides that no indictment shall be abated for any misnomer of the accused, "but the court may, in case of a misnomer appearing before or in the course of the trial, forthwith cause the indictment or accusation to be amended according to the fact," Code, § 3999, that the statute does not say the amendment shall be made when in the presence of the accused. Shiflett v. Com., 90 Va. 386, 18 S. E. Rep. 838.

Wrong Name—Correction Not Allowed.—By mistake a wrong name is inserted in an indictment for a misdemeanor; though the record of the court and the endorsement on the indictment shows the correct name. The indictment cannot be amended by striking out the wrong name and inserting the name of the person intended. Com. v. Buzzard, 5 Gratt. 694.

Description of Corporation.—In declarations in civil suits, where a corporate body is plaintiff, and in indictments where the thing stolen is alleged to be the property of a corporate body by name, it is not necessary to aver the political existence of the corporation. Its existence is matter of evidence, and, after verdict, it is inferred from its corporate name. Lithgow v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 297.

Common Law.—A corporation cannot be impleaded criminaliter by its artificial name, at common law. Com. v. Swift, etc., Co., 2 Va. Cas. 362.

B. PERSONS OTHER THAN THE DEFENDANT.—In many offences the names of third persons necessarily enter for the identification as well as material description of the offence, and under the rule in criminal pleading requiring such certainty as will notify the defendant of the nature of the charge against him, the names of such third persons should be alleged, and the defendant cannot be convicted if the names are so erroneously stated as to fail to identify the offence, though certainty to a common intent is generally sufficient. Morganstern v. Com., 27 Gratt. 1021. And if such person is equally well known by several names, either of such names is sufficient. Taylor v. Com., 20 Gratt. 825.

Person Shot Not Named.—Upon an indictment under the act concerning malicious and unlawful shooting, stabbing, etc. (Code of 1860, ch. 171, § 9), which charges that the prisoner did unlawfully shoot, etc., with set purpose and malice aforethought to kill and murder, etc., the jury find the prisoner guilty of malicious shooting, without saying whom he shot, and fix the term of his imprisonment in the penitentiary at five years. No judgment can be entered on the verdict. The indictment and the verdict being fatally defective, the judgment may be reversed by the appellate court, though no motion in arrest of judgment was made in the court below. Randall v. Com., 24 Gratt. 644.

Idem Sonans.—An indictment alleged the larceny of a watch belonging to "Edmond Bolden," while the evidence showed that the party whose property was stolen was named "Ed Bolen." The accused objected to this variance, but the court held the variance immaterial, inasmuch as the names may be sounded alike without doing violence to the power of the letters found in the variant orthography. Pitsnogle v. Com., 91 Va. 808, 22 S. E. Rep. 351.

Generally a Question for the Jury.—"Whether or not two or more names are idem sonans may be determined by the court upon a mere comparison, where the issue is free from doubt; but the modern and approved practice is to submit the question to a jury whenever there is opportunity to do so, and where the correct sound appears at all doubtful or dependent upon particular circumstances." 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 126, quoted with approval in Pitsnogle v. Com., 91 Va. 808, 22 S. E. Rep. 351. See also, Taylor v. Com., 20 Gratt. 829.

Misdescription of Ownership.—An indictment for advising slaves to escape from their masters, charged that they were the property of E. L. Proof that they were the property of an estate of which E. L. was executrix will sustain the indictment. Cole v. Com., 5 Gratt. 696.

Name of Person Must Be Proved as Laid.—If a person be indicted for shooting S. W. and acquitted thereof, and then indicted for shooting J. W., plea of autre fois acquit will not be supported although the same act of shooting is charged in each indictment. Vaughan v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 273.

Initials.—An indictment for murder which designates the person murdered by the initials of his name is sufficient. Brown v. Com., 86 Va. 467, 10 S. E. Rep. 745; Whart. Crim. Pl. & Pr. (8th Ed.) § 117.

C. NAME UNKNOWN—OF THIRD PERSONS.—If the name of the party injured be unknown he should be described as "a person to the jurors aforesaid unknown." Morgenstern v. Com., 27 Gratt. 1021.

Name in Fact Known.—It is a well-settled rule of criminal law that, where the act constituting the offence is an injury to the person, the name of the injured party must be stated, if known. If the name of the party injured be unknown he should be described as "a person to the jurors aforesaid unknown." But this is a material allegation, and if it turns out in the trial that the name of the person so described in the indictment was known to the grand jury, the variance will be fatal, and the accused must be discharged from that indictment and tried upon another charging the name of the person injured. Morgenstern v. Com., 27 Gratt. 1021.

XI. LAYING TIME.

Time must be attached to every material fact averred, but the time of committing an offence (except when time enters into the nature of the offence) may be laid on any day previous to the finding of the bill of indictment during the period within which it may be prosecuted. Rhodes v. Com., 78 Va. 696.

A. VIRGINIA STATUTE.—It is provided in Virginia by statute that "no indictment or other accusation shall be quashed or deemed invalid for omitting * * * to state, or stating imperfectly the time at which an offence was committed, when time is not the essence of the offence. Code, § 3999; Savage's Case, 84 Va. 619, 5 S. E. Rep. 565; Arrington v. Com., 87 Va. 96, 12 S. E. Rep. 224.

The time of the commission of an offence laid in the indictment is not material, as a general rule, and does not confine the proofs within the limits of that period; the indictment will be satisfied by proof of the offence on any day anterior to the finding. Rhodes v. Com., 78 Va. 696.

B. TIME—MATTER OF RECORD.—But when any time stated in an indictment is to be proved by a matter of record, a variance will be fatal, and in an indictment for perjury the day on which the perjury was committed must be truly laid. 2 Wharton Crim. Law 599; Rhodes v. Com., 78 Va. 696.

C. STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.—When the time within which an offence may be prosecuted is limited by statute, the time as averred in the indictment should appear to be within the limit; but it is not necessary to aver that it occurred within that period. 1 Chit. Crim. Law 223; Whart. Crim. Pl. & Pr. sec. 385; State v. Ball, 30 W. Va. 382, 4 S. E. Rep. 645.

If an indictment for an offence, the prosecution of which is by statute limited to a certain period after the offence was committed, show upon its face that at the time the indictment was found the prosecution of the offence was barred by such statute, it is fatally defective, and the defendant may take advantage of such defect by motion to quash the indictment or by demurrer thereto, or by motion in arrest of judgment. State v. Ball, 30 W. Va. 382, 4 S. E. Rep. 645.

Therefore an indictment found on the eighth day of April 1884, for adultery and fornication, which charged the defendant with committing the offence on the tenth day of March, 1883, upon general demurrer thereto is fatally defective. State v. Ball, 30 W. Va. 382, 4 S. E. Rep. 645.

Sec. 10, ch. 158 of W. Va. Code, in force in 1885, providing that no indictment shall be quashed or deemed invalid for omitting to state the time at which the offence was committed, where time is not of the essence of the offence, does not make valid an indictment which fails to aver any date, or that the offence charged was committed at a time within the statutory bar, when the offence is one which the statute declares shall not be prosecuted after a prescribed limitation. State v. Bruce, 26 W. Va. 157.

An indictment for a misdemeanor was found against B. on June 3d, 1879, and the evidence proved that the offence charged was committed on June 3d, 1878, the prosecution is not barred by sec. 10, ch. 152, of the W. Va. Code, in force in 1883, which provided, that "a prosecution for a misdemeanor shall be commenced within one year next after there was cause therefor," etc. State v. Beasley, 21 W. Va. 777

The indictment was found in September 1881, and it charged the offence to have been committed on the — day of ——, 1881. This was held to show on its face, that the offence was charged to have been committed within the year before the finding of the indictment. State v. Thompson, 26 W. Va. 151.

Date Changed—Presumption as to When Changed.—Where an original indictment is brought before the appellate court, and it appears upon inspection thereof that the date of the year in which the offence is charged to have been committed has been changed, the appellate court, in the absence of anything in the record to show when the change was made, will presume that the same was made before the finding of the indictment. State v. Ball, 30 W. Va. 332, 4 S. E. Rep. 646.

Indictment Found on Same Day Offence is Alleged to Have Been Committed.—An indictment found on the 6th of May charged an offence to have been committed on the same day the grand jury found the indictment. To this indictment a special plea was put in. The theory of the special plea was that where an indictment is found on the same day the offence is alleged to have been committed, it is fatally defective notwithstanding the indictment shows it was filed subsequently to the commission of the offence. Held, it is an unreasonable proposition to hold that where murder is committed in the morning and the indictment found in the evening of the same day it is bad. If the indictment charge a past offence, it is sufficient. Moreover under our statute (Code 1891, ch. 158, § 10), the omission to state, or an imperfect statement of time, does not hurt an indictment. One day can be stated and another proved. State v. Emblem, 44 W. Va. 521, 29 S. E. Rep. 1031.

No Mode of Stating Time in an Indictment Can Vitiate It.—Since the act, Code of 1860, ch. 207, sec. 11, no mode of stating the time of an offence in an indictment or presentment can vitiate it. Sledd v. Com., 19 Gratt. 813.

D. EXPRESSION OF DATE IN FIGURES.—Using figures instead of words, in setting out the dates of an indictment is not a fatal defect under sec. 11, p. 770 of Va. Code of 1849, which declares that an indictment or other accusation shall be quashed or deemed invalid for omitting to state, or stating imperfectly the time at which the offence was committed, when time is not the essence of the offence. Lazier v. Com., 10 Gratt. 713; Cady v. Com., 10 Gratt. 779.

XII. LAYING VENUE.

A. GENERAL SUFFICIENCY.—No indictment can be good without expressly showing some place wherein the offence was committed, which must appear to have been within the jurisdiction of the court in which the indictment is taken; and it is also necessary to prove that it was done in the county where the indictment is found, and the trial had. State v. Hobbs, 37 W. Va. 812, 17 S. E. Rep. 381.

It is necessary to aver and to prove the place where the crime with which the accused stands charged was committed. It is not sufficient to aver that the offence was committed "within the jurisdiction of the court" which is a conclusion of law. Early v. Com., 93 Va. 767, 24 S. E. Rep. 986.

Name of County in Body Sufficient.—Though the name of the county be left blank in the margin of an indictment for misdemeanor, it is enough if the county be stated in the body of the indictment. Tefft v. Com., 8 Leigh 721.

Sufficient Averment of Place.—An indictment, which in express terms avers that an offence was committed "at the said city of Richmond and within the jurisdiction of the said hustings court of the city of Richmond" is sufficient; and it is not necessary to state the place in the city where the assault was made. Baccigalupo v. Com., 33 Gratt. 807.

Hiring Out Convicts—Where Indictable for Crime.—A convict who has been sentenced to a term of imprisonment in the penitentiary is, in contemplation of law, still in the penitentiary, although he may have been hired out, in accordance with statutory provisions. Hence he may be indicted and tried in the county in which the penitentiary is located for an offence, e. g., the murder of his guard committed in another county. Ruffin v. Com., 21 Gratt. 790.

Venue of Accessorial Act.—An indictment which fails to lay the venue of the accessorial act of counseling, advising, abetting, hiring, etc., according to the fact is bad on demurrer for uncertainty. State v. Ellison (W. Va.), 38 S. E. Rep. 574.

Proof That the Offence Was Laid in the County of Venue.—An indictment cannot be sustained without proof that the offence was committed within the county or corporation where the venue is laid. But a strong presumption raised thereof by the evidence is sufficient. Richardson's Case, 80 Va. 124; Butler v. Com., 81 Va. 159.

Two Places Previously Mentioned.—Where the indictment in the caption names one county and in the body of it speaks of the defendant as of another county, the charging the offence to have been committed in the county aforesaid, is error, it not being alleged with sufficient certainty that the offence was committed in the county in which the indictment was found. Bell v. Com., 8 Gratt. 600.

XIII. SURPLUSAGE AND REPUGNANCY.

The objection made to the first count of an indictment that it is insensible, or contradictory and repugnant, in speaking of the "aforesaid 14th day of December" when no other day than the 9th of December is before mentioned, is not a fatal defect under sec. 11, p. 770, of Va. Code of 1849, which declares that no indictment or other accusations shall be quashed or deemed invalid for omitting to state or stating imperfectly the time, etc., or for the omission or insertion of words of mere form or surplusage. The word "aforesaid" before "the 14th of December" is mere surplusage. Lazier v. Com., 10 Gratt. 713.

Indictment.—An indictment cannot be quashed because it alleges the weapon in the alternative, as a "pistol or revolver," the expression "or revolver" was mere surplusage, and could be rejected, and therefore need not be proved. State v. Newsom, 13 W. Va. 859.

XIV. DUPLICITY.

A. THE GENERAL RULE FORBIDDING DUPLICITY.—Duplicity, or double pleading, consists in alleging for one single purpose or object, two or more distinct grounds of complaint, when one of them would be as effectual in law as both or all. A defendant cannot be charged in one and the same court with two or more independent offences, as such, subject to different penalties. Sprouse v. Com., 81 Va. 374.

This is a fault in all pleading, because it produces useless prolixity, and tends to confusion and to the multiplication of issues. Sprouse v. Com., 81 Va. 376.

Where opening (1) a barroom, and (2) selling intoxicating liquors therein, are charged in the same indictment, in the language of the statute, and as being done at the same time and place, they constitute together only one offence, and there can be but one punishment, and the indictment so charging is not bad for duplicity. Morganstern v. Com., 94 Va. 787, 26 S. E. Rep. 403.

An indictment which charges that defendant knowingly and willfully removed a fence from the lands of P. and did injure and expose the growing crop of P, then on said land, charges but one offence: and is valid. Ratcliffe v. Com., 5 Gratt. 657.

B. MULTIFARIOUSNESS.—"The rule is well settled that no matters, however multifarious, will operate to make an indictment double, provided, that all taken together constitute but one connected charge, or one transaction." LEWIS, P., in Early v. Com., 86 Va. 921, 11 S. E. Rep. 795; Sprouse v. Com., 81 Va. 374.

It is well supported by authority that where several articles of property are stolen at the same time and place, though the stolen goods belong to different persons, the stealing is regarded as one transaction, and, therefore, as one offence, which may be charged in a single count. Alexander v. Com., 90 Va. 810, 20 S. E. Rep. 782.

C. DISTINCT OFFENCES AS STAGES OF ONE CRIME.—Where several distinct acts are connected with the same general offence though they are subject to the same penalties and might be distinct crimes, if committed by different persons, or at different times, when they are committed by the same person, at the same time, they may be considered as representing stages of the same offence, and may be joined in the same count of an indictment as constituting a single violation of the law. Alexander v. Com., 90 Va. 809, 20 S. E. Rep. 782; Early v. Com., 86 Va. 922, 11 S. E. Rep. 795; Sprouse v. Com., 81 Va. 376.

D. GREATER INCLUDING LESSER OFFENCE.—When the offence charged includes or embraces another or smaller constituent offence, the charge of such other offence will not render an indictment double. Hardy v. Com., 17 Gratt. 592; Miller v. Com. (Va.), 21 S. E. Rep. 500. Thus where an indictment containing one count charged both an attempt to kill and murder and a felonious assault, the court held that the charge of felonious assault was an ingredient of the felony which the accused was indicted for attempting to commit, and was embraced in the substantive offence, so that there was in reality only one offence charged. Miller v. Com. (Va.), 21 S. E. Rep. 500.

E. CONJUNCTIVE AND DISJUNCTIVE AVERMENTS.

1. CONJUNCTIVE AVERMENTS.—Where a statute enumerates several acts in the alternative, the doing of any of which is subjected to the same punishment, all of such acts may be charged cumulatively as one offence. Morganstern v. Com., 94 Va. 787, 26 S. E. Rep. 402.

2. DISJUNCTIVE AVERMENTS.—It is not an error to use the word "or" instead of the word "and" in describing the various kinds of spirituous liquors and drinks charged to have been sold in the indictment. Morgan v. Com., 7 Gratt. 592; Cunningham v. State, 5 W. Va. 508.

XV. COUNTS.

A. GENERAL INCIDENTS.

1. COUNT—EACH COUNT A SEPARATE INDICTMENT.—Each count in an indictment is considered to all intents and purposes a separate indictment. Linkous v. Com., 9 Leigh 608; State v. Shores, 31 W. Va. 491, 7 S. E. Rep. 413; State v. Smith, 24 W. Va. 814; Dowdy v. Com., 9 Gratt. 727; Kirk v. Com., 9 Leigh 627.

Same—Venue in Second Count.—The venue of the second count of an indictment is laid by the words "in the said county." The caption of the indictment is "Virginia, Roanoke Co., to wit." It is objected that had the first count been quashed, the other count would have no caption, and no venue would have been laid. The court held that the caption of the indictment applies to the whole indictment and to each count in it. Wright v. Com., 82 Va. 185.

Same—Count Pursuing Language of Statute.—An indictment which charges a prisoner with the offences of falsely making, forging and counterfeiting; of causing and procuring to be falsely made, forged and counterfeited, and of willingly acting and assisting in the said false making, forging and counterfeiting, is a good indictment, though all these charges are contained in a single count: the words of the statute being pursued, and there being a general verdict of guilty, judgment ought not to be arrested on the ground that the offences are distinct. Rasnick v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 356.

2. CONVICTION OF LESSER OFFENCE—EFFECT.—Where there is but one count in an indictment, upon which the accused may be convicted of one of several offences which are covered by the indictment, the verdict of the jury finding the accused guilty of one of the said offences is a verdict of acquittal of all the others of a higher grade: as on an indictment for murder, a verdict finding the accused guilty of manslaughter, is a verdict of acquittal as to the murder. Quære: If this rule applies where on an indictment for murder the jury find the prisoner guilty of murder in the second degree. While the practice had always been, in this state, to frame indictments for murder with a single count, it was otherwise until recently with respect to indictments for malicious assaults. Under the Code of 1819, the course uniformly pursued was to insert two counts—one for malicious and the other for an unlawful assault. At the revisal of 1849 a change was introduced, so that the commonwealth may now proceed upon a single count for malicious shooting, stabbing or cutting with intent to kill, and under it may convict the accused of the offence charged or unlawful doing such acts, or, indeed, of any other offence, felony or misdemeanor which is substantially charged in the indictment. Canada's Case, 22 Gratt. 905. It can hardly be supposed it was the design of the legislature, even if it were competent to do so, to deprive the accused of any important right which appertained to an indictment framed under the old law. If, upon an indictment containing two counts, the defendant, being convicted of the lesser offence, could not again be tried for the greater, he ought not to be deprived of that privilege, because, as a matter of convenience the commonwealth may now proceed upon a single count in an indictment. Therefore on an indictment for malicious stabbing with intent to kill, a verdict finding the accused guilty of unlawfully stabbing with intent to kill is an acquittal of malicious stabbing and on a new trial the accused can be tried for unlawful stabbing only. Stuart v. Com., 28 Gratt. 964; State v. Cross, 44 W. Va. 315, 29 S. E. Rep. 527. See also, Canada v. Com., 22 Gratt. 899.

Accused on Second Trial Cannot Be Tried for a Higher Offence.—When an accused is convicted of an offence and applies for and obtains a new trial, he thereby waives his former jeopardy and subjects himself to further trial. And where more than one offence is distinctly or substantially charged in one count of an indictment, and there has been a verdict thereon, which has been set aside, and a new trial awarded, on such trial the accused shall remain liable to be convicted of any offence charged in the indictment for which there is no severer penalty than for the offence of which he was convicted. Benton v. Com., 91 Va. 782, 21 S. E. Rep. 495.

3. COUNT DEFECTIVE FOR UNCERTAINTY.—An indictment contained two counts, the second of which was as follows: "And the jurors aforesaid, on their oaths aforesaid, do further present, that the said John C. Richards, Benjamin F. Fry, and Addison Buchanan Fauver, on a certain day, to wit: on the 18th day of October, in the year 1881, in the nighttime of that day, in the county aforesaid, a certain other building then and there of great value, to wit: of the value of $1,000, being the property of," etc. A motion to quash was addressed to the second count. The court held the second count defective for uncertainty, and said as follows: "There must be certainty in every indictment touching the thing wherein or of which the offence is committed. This certainty consists in the special description of the persons, places and things mentioned in the indictment, with their respective names, situation, extent, nature, quantity, number, value and ownership." The count was also held bad as charging no offence under sec. 5, ch. 3 (Acts 1877-8, p. 287; Amended Acts 1881-2, p. 401) of Criminal Code. Richards v. Com., 81 Va. 110.

4. CONCLUSION OF COUNTS.—In Virginia each count in an indictment must conclude "against the peace and dignity of the commonwealth;" and the count which omits it, is fatally defective. Thompson v. Com., 20 Gratt. 724; Carney's Case, 4 Gratt. 546; Early v. Com., 86 Va. 921, 11 S. E. Rep. 795. And in West Virginia each count must have the conclusion "against the peace and dignity of the estate" else it is fatally defective. Lemons' Case, 4 W. Va. 755; State v. McClung, 35 W. Va. 280, 13 S. E. Rep. 654. And it was held in the latter case that advantage of this defect might be taken for the first time in the appellate court.

B. JOINDER OF COUNTS AND OFFENCES.

1. IN GENERAL.—In all cases where there are two or more counts in the indictment, whether there is actually one offence or several, each count is regarded as a separate indictment, and is supposed to represent a distinct offence. Linkous v. Com., 9 Leigh 608; State v. Shores, 31 W. Va. 491, 7 S. E. Rep. 413; State v. Smith, 24 W. Va. 814; Dowdy v. Com., 9 Gratt. 727; Kirk v. Com., 9 Leigh 627.

Counts Connected by Words of Reference.—"The general rule is, that each count in an indictment must be sufficient in itself to make a complete indictment, and averments in one count cannot aid defects in another. To some extent the pleader may avoid repetitions by referring from one count to another. But the reference must be so full and distinct, as in effect to corporate the matter going before with that in the count in which it is made." Per SNYDER, J., in State v. Bruce, 26 W. Va. 155.

2. GREATER INCLUDING LESSER OFFENCE—GENERAL RULE.—The charge of an offence of a lower grade may be embraced in the charge of a higher offence, when the higher involves the commission of the lower, and when the indictment contains all the substantial allegations necessary to let in evidence of the lower grade. Wright v. Com., 82 Va. 189; Stuart v. Com., 28 Gratt. 964; State v. Cross, 44 W. Va. 315, 29 S. E. Rep. 527.

Felonies and Misdemeanors.—The Code of 1860, ch. 208, sec. 27, p. 838, declared that "if the person indicted for felony by the jury be acquitted of part and convicted of part of the offence charged, he shall be sentenced for such part as he is so convicted of, if the same be substantially charged, whether it be felony or misdemeanor." Hardy and Curry v. Com., 17 Gratt. 592; Canada's Case, 22 Gratt. 902; Stuart v. Com., 28 Gratt. 964.

3. JOINDER OF COUETS CHARGING ONE OFFENCE.—It is not error for an indictment to contain more than one count charging the commission of the same offence with such varied description of the person or property which is the subject of the offence, or of the title of the ownership of the property, or of the means, instruments, and agencies by which the offence was committed as will meet the various aspects in which the evidence may present itself upon the trial. State v. Shores, 31 W. Va. 491, 7 S. E. Rep. 413; State v. Smith, 24 W. Va. 814; Speers v. Com., 17 Gratt. 570; Dowdy v. Com., 9 Gratt. 731.

And where the charges are of the same general nature and the counts are manifestly inserted to meet different phases of the evidence, the indictment will not be quashed; neither will the prosecutor be required to elect on which count he will proceed to trial. State v. Shores, 31 W. Va. 491, 7 S. E. Rep. 413; State v. Smith, 24 W. Va. 814; State v. Halida, 28 W. Va. 502.

4. JOINDER OF COUNTS FOR DISTINCT OFFENCES AND ELECTION.

a. Joinder in General.—If an indictment contain different counts which are in fact for separate and distinct offences the prisoner can neither demur nor move in arrest of judgment. Mowbray v. Com., 11 Leigh 649. As the only mode of objection to them before plea is "by an application of the court to quash the indictment lest they might confound the prisoner in his defence, or prejudice him in his challenge of the jury" in such case, if the defect is discovered after the jury are sworn and before the verdict is found the court may require the prosecutor to make his election on which charge he will proceed. Dowdy v. Com., 9 Gratt. 731; Lazier v. Com., 10 Gratt. 712; State v. Smith, 24 W. Va. 814; State v. Shores, 31 W. Va. 491, 7 S. E. Rep. 413; Mowbray v. Com., 11 Leigh 649. But the court will only listen to such request when they see that the charges are actually distinct, and may confound the prisoner, or distract the attention of the jury. Mowbray v. Com., 11 Leigh 649. If a prosecutor in any case be put to his election he should be required to make such election before the prisoner opens to the jury his defence. State v. Smith, 24 W. Va. 814.

b. Offences of Same Kind.—Where offences of the same character, differing only in degree, are united in the same indictment, the prisoner may and ought to be tried on both charges at the same time. Dowdy v. Com., 9 Gratt. 732; Mowbray v. Com., 11 Leigh 650.

c. Joinder of Felonies.—In cases of felony, where two or more distinct and separate offences are contained in the same indictment, the court, in its discretion, may quash the indictment or compel the prosecutor to elect upon which he will proceed; but in point of law, it is no objection that two or more offences of the same nature and upon which the same or similar judgment may be given, are contained in different counts of the same indictment. Dowdy v. Com., 9 Gratt. 731. JUDGE HARRISON, in Mitchell v. Com., 93 Va. 775, 20 S. E. Rep. 892, said, in speaking of the joinder of felonies in different counts of an indictment, that, "if the court sees that the charges are so distinct that to try them together would confound the prisoner, or distract the attention of the jury, it will require the commonwealth's attorney to elect which count he will try first." There are some cases of felony in which, even though the charges are distinct the prisoner will not be confounded or the attention of the jury distracted; and in which, therefore, the charge may probably be included in the same indictment and tried together: as, for example, the case of forging and uttering the same indictment, which are distinct offences and yet are often charged in the different counts of the same indictment. Com. v. Ervin, 2 Va. Cas. 337; Huffman's Case, 6 Rand. 685; Page's Case, 9 Leigh 683; Mowbray's Case, 11 Leigh 643; Dowdy v. Com., 9 Gratt. 731.

d. Joinder of Misdemeanor.—In point of law it is no objection that several misdemeanors of the same nature, and upon which the same, and a similar judgment may be given, are contained in different counts of the same indictment. This has been long the general and well-settled rule of the common law, and cannot now be disturbed. 1 Chitty Cr. Law 249; Dowdy v. Com., 9 Gratt. 727; Scott's Case, 14 Gratt. 687; 1 Bishop's Cr. Pro. sec. 452; Mitchell v. Com., 93 Va. 776, 20 S. E. Rep. 892. In the case, however, of mere misdemeanors, which are only punished by fine and imprisonment, the prosecutor is permitted to join and try several distinct offences in the same indictment, and without being required to elect on which charge he will proceed. 1 Chitty Cr. Law 249; Dowdy v. Com., 9 Gratt. 727; Mitchell v. Com., 93 Va. 775, 20 S. E. Rep. 892.

e. Joinder of Felonies and Misdemeanors.—The general rule of the common-law practice is to allow several felonies or several misdemeanors to be charged in several counts in one indictment, but not to allow the joinder of a felony with a misdemeanor and it appears that this rule is still in force in Virginia, although in several other states the common-law doctrine has been extended so as to admit of the joinder of felonies and misdemeanors, where the misdemeanor is a constituent of the felony. Scott v. Com., 14 Gratt. 687; Hardy v. Com., 17 Gratt. 594.

f. Motion to Elect—Discretion of Court.—In cases of felony where two or more separate and distinct offences are charged in the same indictment, the court in its discretion may quash the indictment, or compel the prosecutor to elect upon which charge he will proceed. State v. Smith, 24 W. Va. 819.

An indictment contained several counts, one for larceny, others for receiving stolen goods, knowing them to have been stolen; and others for aiding another person to conceal stolen goods knowing them to have been stolen. The charges in all the counts, however, relate to the same goods, which in different counts are laid to be goods of different persons, or of a person unknown. On the trial of the case under this indictment, before the jury was sworn and before they were charged, the prisoner moved the court to compel the attorney for the commonwealth to elect under which count or counts of the indictment he would prosecute the prisoner; but the court overruled the motion, and permitted the said attorney to prosecute under the whole indictment. To this ruling the prisoner excepted. The appellate court held that while, in case of felony, where two or more distinct offences are contained in the same indictment, the court, in its discretion, may quash the indictment or compel the prosecutor to elect upon which charge he will proceed, it knew of no case in which the several counts of the indictment were all for the same offence, and were in themselves good counts, where the indictment or any of the counts had been quashed, or the prosecutor compelled to elect on which of them he would proceed. Dowdy v. Com., 9 Gratt. 731, 733, 60 Am. Dec. 314.

"But I have been unable to find in Virginia or in this state any case in which more than one criminal transaction was embraced in a single indictment for felony, although in many cases where the offences are of the same character, differing only in degree, the indictments have contained two or more counts, in which the same transaction in the form of distinct and separate felonies, are represented. But as in every such case the separate counts are regarded as separate indictments for distinct offences, it will in most cases be impossible for the court from an inspection of an indictment to determine, whether the various counts represent the same transaction under different forms, or whether they in fact represent wholly different and distinct offences. If all, or any of such counts are perfect upon their face, a demurrer to or motion to quash the indictment for the supposed misjoinder of counts must be overruled, although some of these counts may in fact represent separate and distinct offences, for the reason that this fact can only be made to appear from the evidence introduced on the trial. 'If, however, it appear before the defendant has pleaded, or the jury are sworn, that he is to be tried for separate offences, it has been the disposition of the judges to quash the indictment lest it should confound the prisoner in his defence, or prejudice him in his challenge of the jury, for he might object to a juryman trying one of the offences, though he might have no reason to do so in the other.' Young v. The King, 3 T. R. 106, and Dowdy v. Com., 9 Gratt. 729. And if the judge who tries the cause does not discover the defect in time to quash the indictment, he may put the prosecutor to make his election on which charge he will proceed, but if the case has gone to the length of a verdict, it is no objection in arrest of judgment." Per WOODS, J., in State v. Smith, 24 W. Va. 818.

Distinct Felonies.—While the foregoing rules apply to offences generally, it will be seen upon an inspection of the cases cited that many of the transactions involved felonies; and distinct questions have been raised upon the joinder of separate felonies in the same indictment; and while it has been held that the court in the exercise of its discretion may compel an election when separate felonies are charged in the same indictment and such a course is necessary to prevent prejudice or embarrassment to defendant in his defence. State v. Smith, 24 W. Va. 814; Dowdy v. Com., 9 Gratt. 727.

Different Misdemeanors.—When different misdemeanors of the same nature are joined in separate counts of an indictment, the defendant has no right to compel an election as a general rule. Mitchell v. Com., 93 Va. 775, 20 S. E. Rep. 892.

Misjoinder of Counts and Offences—How Taken Advantage of.—"It is no objection either upon demurrer or in arrest of judgment that separate offences of the same nature are joined against the same defendant, and the only mode of objection to a joinder of such offences in cases of felony, is a motion to quash or to compel the prosecutor to elect on which charge he will proceed, which motion the court should grant if the charges grew out of different transactions, or are not only distinct but may confound the prisoner, or distract the attention of the jury. But if the charges are merely distinct, without such prejudice, or relate to the same transaction, and describe it in different and even inconsistent ways, so as to meet the evidence as it may transpire, the motion should be denied. And in misdemeanor cases, even greater freedom is allowed, for the court will not quash or compel election even though several separate and distinct misdemeanors, arising out of different transactions, be joined against a single defendant; yet, if against several defendants, the court should quash the indictment. Dowdy v. Com., 9 Gratt. 727, 730-33. See Mowbray v. Com., 11 Leigh 643, 649." Hurst's Criminal Digest, 351-2.

C. CONVICTION UNDER ONE COUNT—EFFECT. --"It is well-settled law in this state," said STAPLES, J., in Stuart v. Com., 28 Gratt. 953, "that where there are several counts in an indictment, and the jury find the accused guilty upon one of the counts, saying nothing as to the others, the verdict operates as an acquittal upon the counts of which the verdict takes no notice, and the court should enter a judgment accordingly. Lithgow v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 297; Page v. Com., 9 Leigh 683; Canada's Case, 22 Gratt. 899; Page's Case, 26 Gratt. 943"; Commonwealth v. Bennet, 2 Va. Cas. 235; Kirk v. Com., 9 Leigh 627; Hawley v. Com., 75 Va. 847; Gibson v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 111.

Accused Cannot Be Tried a Second Time on the Counts on Which He Was Acquitted.—Where there are several counts in an indictment and the jury finds the accused guilty upon one of the counts and acquits him on the others, if the accused applies for and obtains a new trial he does not thereby waive the advantage of the acquittal thus obtained. But he must be tried, and can only be tried again on the count on which he was convicted, and not on the count of which he had been before acquitted. The reason is, that the accused having been rightfully acquitted of one or more of several offences which have been joined in the said indictment, he cannot again be brought into jeopardy for these alleged offences, because having been wrongfully convicted on another, he seeks and obtains redress against the wrong done him. Stuart v. Com., 28 Gratt. 954; State v. Cross, 44 W. Va. 315, 29 S. E. Rep. 527; Lithgow v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 298.

Where a prisoner was indicted for malicious assault and acquitted, found guilty and convicted of unlawful assault he cannot object to being tried under another indictment for the same offence of which he was convicted. For having moved for a new trial he is conclusively presumed to waive any objection to being put the second time in jeopardy for that offence. In such a case the accused may be tried on either the old or a new indictment but cannot be tried on both. The better practice is to withdraw the first and proceed to trial on the second. Stuart v. Com., 28 Gratt. 966.

Conviction under Bad Count in an Indictment.—An indictment contained two counts. The prisoner was tried thereon and a general verdict of guilty found against him. The punishment fixed by the verdict was not such as could be ascertained under the first count. The second count was defective. The court decided that the finding of the jury was under the second count, and was an acquittal upon the first count and as the second count was defective the verdict should be set aside and a new trial awarded. Richards v. Com., 81 Va. 115.

Defect of Some of Counts—Effect.—The defect of some of the counts in an indictment does not affect the validity of the rest, and if any count is good, judgment may be given against the accused. Kirk v. Com., 9 Leigh 627.

General Verdict—Bad Counts.—The rule of practice in criminal cases, that if an indictment contain several counts, some good and others faulty, and a general verdict of guilty be found, the bad counts will not affect the validity of the good, and judgment will be given on those which are good, is not applicable to cases of penitentiary crimes in Virginia, where the jury is to ascertain the term of imprisonment, since the evidence on the bad counts may aggravate the punishment imposed by the verdict. Mowbray v. Com., 11 Leigh 643; Clere v Com., 3 Gratt. 615. A statute was passed on this subject in Virginia, March 14, 1848. The 43rd section of ch. 21, of which with some slight change in phraseology, was carried into the Code of 1849 and formed the 34th section of ch. 209, p. 778. One of the manifest designs of this statute was to furnish a prisoner arraigned on an indictment containing various counts, some of which were faulty, a means of protecting himself against any prejudice or injury that might arise from such faulty counts, to wit, by a motion, on his trial, to the court, to instruct the jury to disregard them; and that if the court should refuse, to the prejudice of the prisoner, to give such instruction, it would be an error which he would have a right to have redressed by appeal. Rand v. Com., 9 Gratt. 738.

A prisoner being arraigned on an indictment containing three counts, moved and obtained the quashal of the second. Having obtained a change of venue, he was put on trial on the whole indictment and pleaded not guilty thereto, without taking any notice of the quashing of the second count by the court in which he was first arraigned.

A general verdict of guilty was found against him and judgment rendered thereon. Held, that even if it be conceded that the prisoner did not in effect waive the benefit of the order quashing the second count, and that it was an error to arraign and try him on the whole indictment after that count had been quashed, still it was not an error to his prejudice, and therefore not a good ground for a reversal of the judgment. Shiffiet v. Com., 14 Gratt. 652.

XVI. NOLLE PROSEQUI.

A. BY WHOM ENTERED.—The commonwealth's attorney has not a right to enter a nolle prosequi, in any case without the consent of the court first had. Hurst's Crim. Dig. 613.

It was decided in a case marked "Anonymous" reported in 1 Va. Cas. 139, that the attorney for the district court of Fredericksburg has not a right to enter a nolle prosequi in any case without the consent of the court first had. See also, Randall v. Com., 24 Gratt. 644.

The dismissal of a presentment by the court, at the instance of the attorney for the commonwealth, is not an acquittal. It is an informal nolle prosequi. There are only three ways by which even a felon can be acquitted. They are: the judgment of the examining court, the verdict of the jury, or the failure to indict after three terms of the superior court have passed. Wortham v. Com., 5 Rand. 669.

Digitized by Google

May Be Entered after Reversal upon Appeal.—A nolle prosequi may be entered after verdict and judgment against the prisoner has been reversed, upon an appeal taken; and a new indictment may then be found against him. In this case the indictment charged the ownership of the property, which was stolen, to be in a married woman, which charge was held insufficient. Hughes v. Com., 17 Gratt. 565.

B. EFFECT.—An indictment for felony did not charge the offence to have been done "feloniously." It was held by the court that the prisoner could not be convicted of felony on the indictment; but in order to his being tried for the felony, a nolle prosequi may be entered by attorney for the commonwealth with the consent that the court on the said indictment and a new and proper indictment may be exhibited and found against the accused for the felony; on which new and proper indictment he may be tried, notwithstanding the proceedings had upon the old and defective indictment. 2 Rob. Pr. (old ed.) 127.; 2 Va. Cas. 70-111; Randall v. Com., 24 Gratt. 644.

On a trial of a prisoner on an indictment upon a plea of not guilty, the evidence for the commonwealth disclosed that the denomination of certain notes were in fact known to the grand jurors, while the indictment charged that they were "to the jurors unknown." Held, it would certainly at this stage of the proceedings, have been competent for the attorney of the commonwealth to have entered a nolle prosequi, under this indictment, and preferred another indictment, by the same or other grand jury, against the prisoner leaving out the words "the denomination of which said notes are to the jurors unknown"; and certainly to the second indictment it could not be pleaded in bar that the prisoner had once before been tried for the same offence, or, in other words, was put twice in jeopardy. Robinson v. Com., 32 Gratt. 870.

To an indictment against him for stealing, the prisoner pleaded autre fois acquit. The court held that a nolle prosequi entered by the attorney for the commonwealth, and a consequent discharge from custody, is not an acquittal, or discharge from further prosecution, and therefore does not support the plea of autre fois acquit. Lindsay v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 345.

XVII. OBJECTIONS.

A. HOW MADE GENERALLY.—Where an indictment is so defective that any judgment thereon rendered against the defendant would be erroneous, he may take advantage of such defect by motion to quash the indictment, or by demurrer thereto, or by motion in arrest of judgment. State v. Ball, 30 W. Va. 382, 4 S. E. Rep. 646.

Errors Cured by Statute of Jeofails.—In an indictment for malicious and voluntary shooting, the term willfully being used for voluntarily, is cured by the statute of jeofails. A conclusion against the acts of the general assembly, when there is but one act, is also cured. The omission to state that the grand jury was impanelled in the superior court of the county (the county itself being mentioned), if an error, is also cured. Trimble v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 143.

Omission of Contra Formam Statuti Cured by Statute of Jeofails.—Indictments for horse stealing need not conclude contra formam statuti, and even if it were proper that they should, the omission is cured by the Virginia statute of jeofails. Chiles v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 260.

Defective Indictment Cured by Statute of Jeofails.—An indictment for grand larceny, charged the goods to have been stolen on the "21st of December, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-thee," leaving out the "r" in the last word. Held, this is cured by the statute of jeofails. Aldridge v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 447.

B. MOTION TO QUASH.

1. GENERAL RULES—AS AN EXERCISE OF DISCRETION.—The motion to quash is not a proceeding as of right, but the power is vested in the discretion of the court to refuse to quash and to compel the defendant to resort to his other remedies by demurrer or by motion in arrest of judgment. Richards v. Com., 81 Va. 115; Bell v. Com., 8 Gratt. 603; Commonwealth v. Lodge, 6 Gratt. 699; Commonwealth v. Foggy, 6 Leigh 638; Litton's Case, 6 Gratt. 691; Minor's Syn. Cr. Law 266; Commonwealth v. McCaul, 1 Va. Cas. 272.

2. FOR WHAT DEFECT A COURT WILL QUASH.—In prosecution for felonies and other serious offences, the court will not, on the motion of the prisoner, quash the indictment, unless where the court has no jurisdiction; where no indictable offence is charged; or where there is some other substantial and material defect. In other cases he will be left to his demurrer, motion in arrest of judgment, or writ of error. Bell v. Com. (1851), 8 Gratt. 600; Com. v. Litton (1849), 6 Gratt. 691; Huff v. Com. (1858), 14 Gratt. 648, 651.

And in State v. Ball, 30 W. Va. 382, 4 S. E. Rep. 649, it is said that the court will not quash an indictment except in a very clear case, but in doubtful cases will leave the party to his demurrer or motion in arrest of judgment.

After an indictment for a felony, the indictment will not be quashed, because the clerk of the examining court has not inserted the justice's warrant of commitment of the prisoner in the record. Kemp v. Com., 18 Gratt. 969.

3. SPECIAL INSTANCES OF QUASHING.—A person examined in a county court on a charge of forging an order, and committed by that court for trial in circuit superior court for the forgery only, cannot be tried there for uttering and publishing the order. Therefore, if the indictment against the prisoner contains counts for the forgery, and counts for uttering and publishing, the circuit superior court ought to quash these latter counts. Mowbray v. Com., 11 Leigh 643.

Quære, if a person who has been regularly summoned to show cause why an information shall not be filed upon a presentment found against him by the grand jury, and fails to appear, can, after the information has been filed, move the court to quash the presentment. Com. v. Scott, 5 Gratt. 697.

After an indictment for a felony, the indictment will not be quashed, because the clerk of the examining court has not inserted the justice's warrant of commitment of the prisoner in the record. Kemp v. Com., 18 Gratt. 969.

An indictment cannot be quashed on the ground that improper evidence was given before the grand jury. Wadley v. Com., 98 Va. 803, 35 S. E. Rep. 452.

4. SCOPE OF MOTION.—A motion to quash for defects on its face, where the motion is general, will be overruled, if the indictment contains one good count. State v. Cartright, 20 W. Va. 32.

5. ORDER OF MOTION—WHEN RECEIVED.—A motion to quash, not being one of right but of privilege granted by the court to the defendant, will not be received when presented at an unreasonable time.

Digitized by Google

If delayed until after plea of not guilty, its reception or rejection is within the trial court's discretion. Richards v. Com., 81 Va. 115.

The proper course is to move to quash before pleading, but the court may, at any time before the trial, permit the plea to be withdrawn, and enter the motion to quash at the instance of the defendant State v. Riffe, 10 W. Va. 794.

After a prisoner has been tried by an examining court and remanded for further trial before the circuit court, and an indictment has been found against him, it is too late to move to quash the indictment, because there were irregularities in his examination before the committing magistrate. Clore's Case, 8 Gratt. 606.

6. EFFECT OF QUASHAL.—A prisoner was indicted and remanded in a county court for murder in November, 1893. He demanded to be tried in the circuit court, whereupon he was remanded for trial in that court. At the next term of the circuit court, the cause was continued upon the motion of the commonwealth. At the following term of the circuit court, the court dismissed the said indictment of its own motion, in the absence of the prisoner, and over his objection upon the ground that it had no jurisdiction to try the case, but without prejudice of the right of the commonwealth to arrest, indict, and try the accused for the offence with which he was charged. After said judgment was entered, and before the accused was actually released from custody, another warrant was issued against him for the same offence, and upon it he was committed to jail to answer an indictment in the county court. At the June term of the said court, he was again indicted for the same offence. He then pleaded "not guilty" and his cause was continued. Whereupon he sued out a writ of habeas corpus, alleging that the order of the said circuit court operated as an acquittal of the accused of the offence for which he was in custody. The court held as follows: "The circuit court dismissed the indictment without a trial of the accused, and without prejudice to the commonwealth's right to arrest, indict, and try him for the offence with which he was charged. If the court had jurisdiction of the case, the order of dismissal would have the effect of ending the proceedings commenced in November, 1893, in the same manner as if the indictment had been quashed, or a nolle prosequi entered. The accused would be discharged from liability on that indictment, but not acquitted of the offence charged in the indictment. Inasmuch as there is no limitation to prosecutions for murder, a new proceeding upon the part of the commonwealth could be instituted for the same offence at any subsequent time, either by the presentment of a grand jury, or by a complaint before a justice." Dulin v. Lillard, 91 Va. 718, 20 S. E. Rep. 821.

Motion Overruled.—It is not an error to overrule a motion to quash an indictment because the record does not set forth the appointment and oath of the foreman; nor to reject a plea that the names of the witnesses or grand jurors upon whose information the indictment was found are not written at the foot of the indictment as required by law. These errors are cured by sec. 4011 of the Code which provides that, "No exceptions shall be allowed for any defect or want of form in any presentment, indictment, or information mentioned in either of the two preceding sections (sec. 4009, petty offences limited to a fine not exceeding $20; sec. 4010, Gaming Act), but the court shall give judgment thereon according to the very right of the case. Lawrence v. Com., 86 Va. 573, 10 S. E. Rep. 840.

C. DEMURRER.

1. NATURE.—The demurrer admits the facts demurred to, and refers their legal sufficiency to the court. It puts in issue the legality of the whole proceedings, and compels the court to examine the validity of the whole record. State v. Ball, 30 W. Va. 382, 4 S. E. Rep. 649.

2. FOR WHAT DEFECTS PROPER.—But a party indicted may also demur to the indictment against him wherever it is defective in form or substance, and upon such demurrer he may take advantage of any error to the same extent as he might by motion in arrest of judgment; and because of the efficiency of the latter remedy the demurrer at common law was seldom resorted to; but since many of the errors which were formerly sufficient to arrest the judgment are no longer available for that purpose, the demurrer in this state is a more efficient remedy than a motion to quash the indictment, or a motion in arrest of judgment. State v. Ball, 30 W. Va. 382, 4 S. E. Rep. 649.

Where one count in an indictment fails to state that the offence charged occurred in the county wherein the indictment was found, a demurrer to the indictment and each count thereof should be sustained. Jones v. Com., 86 Va. 951, 12 S. E. Rep. 950.

Rendered More Effectual in West Virginia by Statute.—At common law a demurrer to the indictment was seldom resorted to, for the reason that any objection which would have been fatal on demurrer (with few exceptions) was equally fatal on motion in arrest of judgment. Whart. Crim. Pl. § 759; Archb. Crim. Pl. 115. But the remedy by motion in arrest of judgment is now rendered much less effectual by statutes in many of the states which now require certain objections formerly available on motion in arrest of judgment, to be made before verdict found. By § 11, ch. 158, Code of 1887, it is declared that, "judgment in any criminal case, after a verdict, shall not be arrested or reversed upon any exception to the indictment or other accusation, if the offence be charged therein with sufficient certainty for judgment to be given thereon according to the very right of the case." While the motion in arrest of judgment has by this statutory provision been rendered less effectual than it was at common law, the remedy by demurrer to the indictment remains unimpaired, and may be resorted to in all cases where the defendant would be entitled to move in arrest of judgment. State v. Ball, 30 W. Va. 382, 4 S. E. Rep. 648.

3. SCOPE.—Where an indictment contains more than one count, and the demurrer is general, and one count is found good, the demurrer must be overruled. State v. McClung, 35 W. Va. 280, 13 S. E. Rep. 654; State v. Cartright, 20 W. Va. 32; Hendricks v. Commonwealth, 75 Va. 934.

4. EFFECT.—Upon a general demurrer to an indictment all defects both as to form and substance, are put in issue. Com. v. Jackson, 2 Va. Cas. 501; Thomas v. Com., 2 Rob. 795.

Effect of Overruling.—Upon a demurrer to an indictment for unlawful gaming being overruled, the defendant cannot have leave to plead not guilty without offering to withdraw his demurrer; the court may, in its discretion, give him leave to withdraw his demurrer, and to plead; but if he does not withdraw his demurrer and obtain leave to plead, judgment should be given for the fine and costs, not that the defendant shall answer over. Com. v. Foggy, 6 Leigh 638.

Pleading Over No Waiver of Errors.—Pleading over to an indictment after demurrer overruled does not waive error in the action of the court in overruling a demurrer. State v. Ball, 30 W. Va. 382, 4 S. E. Rep. 649.

Three Ways of Acquittal.—There are only three ways by which a felon can be acquitted. They are: the judgment of examining court, the verdict of the jury, or the failure to indict after the three terms of the court have passed. Wortham v. Com., 5 Rand. 669. Therefore where the court had no jurisdiction to try an indictment for felony and discharge the prisoner therefor, he may be again indicted and tried for the same offence. Marshall v. Com., 20 Gratt. 845.

And where a verdict is rendered in favor of the prisoner because of a variance between the allegations and the proof under § 16, ch. 199 of the Va. Code of 1860, such verdict is no bar to a new indictment. Robinson v. Com., 32 Gratt. 866.

FOR SPECIFIC OFFENCES.

XVIII. ARBITRATORS.

The grand jury of Wyoming county, found the following indictment against Boyd E. Lusk: "The jurors of the state of West Virginia in and for the body of the county of Wyoming, and now attending the said court, upon their oath present that on the 28th day of January, in the year 1876, a certain cause in which Boyd E. Lusk was plaintiff and Drury Halsey was defendant, was pending and undetermined in the county court of said county, and that at the January term of said court, on the 28th day of January, 1876, by agreement of parties, the matters in controversy in said cause were submitted to the arbitration and award of Martin G. Clay, Henry Ellis and Smith Trent, selected and chosen by the parties, and duly qualified according to law to act as such arbitrators: and that on the 29th day of January, 1876, while the said matters of controversy in said cause were before the said arbitrators, the said Boyd E. Lusk, in the said county, with the intent to bias the opinion and influence the decision of the said Martin G. Clay, one of the said arbitrators to whom was submitted the matters in controversy in said cause, pending as aforesaid, did then and there unlawfully, willfully and corruptly, promise to give, and offer to pay, to him, the said Martin G. Clay, as such arbitrator as aforesaid, a certain sum of money, to wit, the sum of five dollars, as a pecuniary reward to influence and induce him, the said Martin G. Clay, as such arbitrator as aforesaid, to prostitute and betray the duties devolving on him as such arbitrator as aforesaid, by giving his opinion and deciding the said matters in controversy in said cause then pending before said arbitrators as aforesaid, in favor of the said Boyd E. Lusk, against the peace and dignity of the state. Upon the evidence of Martin G. Clay, sworn in open court to give testimony before the grand jury."

To this indictment various objections were made by counsel for defendant, but without avail, for the court held that, although there was, doubtless, in the description of the offence as well as on the balance of the indictment, a good deal of surplusage yet it and the balance of the indictment seem to have in them a sufficiently clear and explicit allegation of every material fact necessary to constitute the offence charged in sec. 7, ch. 147, p. 688 of W. Va. Code, in force in 1880, on which the indictment was based. State v. Lusk, 16 W. Va. 767.

XIX. ARSON.

Form.—An indictment for arson, according to the form at common law, is sufficient in a case of arson, in the daytime. Curran's Case, 7 Gratt. 619.

Necessary Allegations.—In an indictment for arson under 1 Rev. Code, ch. 160, sec. 4, p. 587, relating to arson, it is not sufficient to use the words "set fire to" the house; but the word "burn" must be used: that being the word employed in that section of the statute defining the offence. Howel v. Com., 5 Gratt. 664. See generally, Earhart v. Com., 9 Leigh 671.

Moreover, an indictment for arson must charge the burning in the night in order to convict of the offence of burning in the nighttime. Curran's Case, 7 Gratt. 619.

Dwelling House—Meaning.—"A dwelling house," in the meaning of § 1, ch. 188, Code of 1873, embraces all its parcels including such an outhouse as is parcel thereof. The burning of such an outhouse is the burning of a dwelling house, in the meaning of this law and may be so described in the indictment; and the proof of the burning of the outhouse, will as much sustain the indictment, as would proof of the burning of the principal part of the dwelling house, or the whole of it including all the parcels. Page v. Com., 26 Gratt. 943.

Description of Building or Other Thing Burned.—The Criminal Code in force in 1885, ch. 3, § 5 (Acts 1877-78, p. 287; Amended Acts 1881-82 p. 401), provided punishment for burning "any building, the burning whereof is not punishable under any other section" of said chapter. An indictment under this section must describe the building with such particularity as will inform accused what building is meant. Richards v. Com., 81 Va. 110.

But in an indictment at common law, it is not necessary to state that the house burned was a dwelling house: for the word "house" imports it: and, if under trial, it appears, that it was not a house upon which arson could be committed, it is the duty of the judges to direct the jury to acquit the prisoner. "Common gaol and county prison in the county of A. B." is also sufficient description. Commonwealth v. Posey, 4 Call 109.

So an indictment for the burning of "a certain store house, not adjoining or occupied with the dwelling house of one S.," sufficiently describes the store house as the property of S. Butler v. Com., 81 Va. 159; Speers' Case, 17 Gratt. 570.

And in Wolf v. Com., 30 Gratt. 833, an indictment charged that the accused "did feloniously and maliciously burn a certain barn and the property therein, said barn and the property therein being the property of one H. H. Dulaney, and situated in the county aforesaid, and which said barn and the property therein was then and there of the value of $1,500." The indictment was held sufficient under Va. Code 1873, ch. 188, § 6.

Charging Offence—Sufficiency.—And a count in an indictment, which charges that the prisoner at night did burn "a certain other house called a barn or stable of one R., there situate, the same being an outhouse not adjoining the dwelling house, nor under the same roof, but some persons usually lodging therein at night, to wit," etc., does not set out an offence for which the punishment is death. Page v. Com., 26 Gratt. 943.

Indictment—Attempt to Commit Arson.—But in the case of Uhl v. Com., 6 Gratt. 706, on an indictment for an attempt to burn a barn, it was held that the indictment charging that the defendants, "did, about twelve o'clock of the night of the said day, attempt to set fire to the said barn by then and there carrying live coals of fire in a certain tin cup, then and there held by them, and then and there putting and placing the said live coals of fire, which they, then and there had in their possession, in manner aforesaid, to, at, and against the straw, chaff, and other combustible matter in, about and against said barn, with a wicked intention, by means thereof, unlawfully, willfully and maliciously to burn and consume said barn," was a good indictment under § 3888 of Va. Code 1887.

Surplusage.—In Stevens v. Com., 4 Leigh 683, an indictment for arson described the house burned as "the county jail and prison of the county H. being the house of L. J., the sheriff and jailer of the said county." The court held that the burning of such jail was a felony by the statute 1 Rev. Code, ch. 160, § 4. But whether the jail could be properly alleged to be the house of the sheriff and jailer or not, that part of the description was unnecessary and could be rejected as surplusage.

XX. ASSAULT AND BATTERY.

A. PRESENTMENT.—Upon a presentment of a grand jury for an assault and battery charging the offence with certainty, it is not irregular to summon the defendant to answer the presentment, and to try the case upon the presentment, without filing any information. Com. v. Towles, 5 Leigh 806.

B. INFORMATION.

Information Cannot Be Filed after More Than One Year from Commission of Assault.—Under the act of 25th January, 1805, sec. 2, to amend the penal laws of this commonwealth, an information for an assault cannot be filed after more than one year from the commission of the assault. Com. v. Chichester, 1 Va. Cas. 312.

C. INDICTMENT.

Finding Lesser Offence Than That Charged in the Indictment—Indictment for Robbery.—An indictment may be fatally defective as an indictment for robbery, yet good for an assault. And if such indictment attempts to charge the offence of robbery and is bad for that offence and charges an assault, it is good for the lesser offence, and a motion to quash such indictment is properly overruled. State v. Howes, 26 W. Va. 110.

So in Hardy v. Com., 17 Gratt. 592, an indictment for robbery charged that the prisoners "did make an assault" upon a certain described person, and one gold watch, etc., from the person and against the will of such persons described, etc., "feloniously and violently did steal," etc. The jury acquitted the prisoners of the felony charged but under the indictment found them guilty of "assault and battery." On motion in arrest of judgment, the court held that the finding was valid under Va. Code 1860, § 27.

Joint Indictment—Taxing Attorney's Fee.—And if in an indictment against four persons for an assault, they plead severally, and there is a verdict that they are guilty assessing several fines on each, an attorney's fee is not to be taxed against each, but only one attorney's fee against all the defendants. Com. v. Sprinkles, 4 Leigh 650.

Necessary Averments.—An indictment charging that the prisoner, "at the county and within the jurisdiction of the court, feloniously and maliciously did stab one P. T. with intention to maim, etc., and kill him," will not be quashed, upon objection that it does not allege any assault, striking or wounding, nor that P. T. was within the county or jurisdiction, nor that the intent was felonious or malicious. Com. v. Woodson, 9 Leigh 669.

Malicious Assault—Stating Weapon Unnecessary.—Moreover, in an indictment for malicious assault with intent to kill, it is unnecessary to state the weapon with which the assault was made. Jackson v. Com., 96 Va. 107, 30 S. E. Rep. 452.

Sufficiency.—And an indictment charging that the accused made an assault with a stone, and did feloniously, maliciously and unlawfully beat, wound, ill treat and cause bodily injury, etc., sufficiently conforms to Va. Code 1887, § 3071. Jones v. Com., 87 Va. 63, 12 S. E. Rep. 226.

So where, in an indictment under § 9, ch. 144, W. Va. Code 1891, the word "feloniously" is used in characterizing the assault in the first part of the indictment and is joined by the copulative, and the words, "then and there," to the subsequent clause which charges the shooting or giving the wound, it is sufficient; and it is not essential that the word "feloniously" shall be again repeated before the allegation of the shooting or wounding in order to make it a good indictment for a felony. State v. Yates, 21 W. Va. 761.

Surplusage.—And mere surplusage in an indictment for assault and battery will not vitiate it, and therefore where an indictment alleges facts, which constitute a misdemeanor, it will be good for that offence, although it states other facts, which go to constitute a felony but falls short of stating sufficient facts to constitute that crime. State v. Howes, 26 W. Va. 110.

Variance.—But an indictment charging an assault, is abatable by reason of no addition being made to the name of the defendant, of his estate, degree, or mystery. Sims' Case, 2 Va. Cas. 374.

Inadmissible Evidence under Indictment.—If on the trial of an indictment for an assault, defendant offers evidence, in mitigation of fine, that the prosecutor was on bad terms with him, and had on days previous to the assault, used provoking and abusive language of and to him, such evidence is inadmissible. Rawlings v. Com., 1 Leigh 581.

Moreover, on an indictment for assault and battery on the voluntary information of the person assaulted, the informer and prosecutor, being the only witness for the prosecution, is a competent witness, though liable for costs in case defendant is acquitted. Gilliam v. Com., 4 Leigh 668.

False Prosecution Presents No Bar to Indictment.—And, it should be observed that if a person charged with an assault and battery be recognized to appear at the next superior court, to answer an indictment to be then and there preferred against him for the said offence, in the meantime fraudulently procure himself to be indicted for the same offence in the county court, and confess his guilt, and a small amercement be thereupon assessed on him, such fraudulent prosecution and conviction, present no bar to the indictment preferred against him in the superior court. Com. v. Jackson, 2 Va. Cas. 501.

XXI. ATTEMPTS.

Elements.—An attempt to commit a crime consists of (1) the intent; (2) a direct ineffectual act towards its commission; and that act must reach far enough towards the accomplishment of the desired result to amount to the commencement of the consummation. Hicks v. Com., 86 Va. 223, 9 S. E. Rep. 1024. See generally, Uhl v. Com., 6 Gratt. 706; Commonwealth v. Nutter, 8 Gratt. 699.

And an indictment for an attempt to commit an offence, ought to allege some act done by the defendant, of such a nature as to constitute an attempt to commit the offence mentioned in the indictment. Commonwealth v. Clark, 6 Gratt. 675.

Under an Indictment for a Felony Accused May Be Found Guilty of Attempt to Commit Such Felony.—It is not error for a court to instruct a jury on an indictment for maliciously or unlawfully shooting a person with intent to disfigure, disable and kill, that under section 22, ch. 159, W. Va. Code of 1851, they can acquit of the felony and find him guilty of the attempt to commit such felony. State v. Meadows, 18 W. Va. 658.

Attempt to Burn Barn—Averment.—Thus in Uhl v. Com., 6 Gratt. 706, George Uhl, Robert Hugh and Mary Hugh, his wife, and six other persons, were indicted in the circuit court of Wood county at its May term, 1849, for an attempt to burn the barn of George W. Henderson. The indictment contained four counts. The first count charged that G. U., etc., of the county of Wood being persons of wicked disposition and unlawfully and maliciously devising, contriving and intending to feloniously set fire to, and burn and consume a certain barn belonging to G. W. H., of said county, on the 20th day of August, 1848, at the county aforesaid, unlawfully, wilfully, and maliciously did, about 12 o'clock in the night of the said day, attempt to set fire to the said barn of the said G. W. H., by then and there carrying live coals of fire in a certain tin cup, then and there held by them, the said G. U., etc., and then and there putting and placing the said live coals of fire, which they, the said G. U., etc., then and there had in their possession, in manner aforesaid, to, at, and against the straw, chaff, and other combustible matter in, about and against said barn, with a wicked intention by means thereof, unlawfully, wilfully, and maliciously to burn and consume said barn of him, the said G. W. H., to the great damage, etc. The second and third counts were substantially the same with the first, except that they charged a felonious intent to set fire to the barn and to burn the same. The fourth count charged that G. U., etc., a certain other barn did, on, etc., unlawfully, wickedly and maliciously, attempt then and there, feloniously to set fire to, burn and consume, to the great terror and fear of all the citizens of the commonwealth and to the great damage, etc. The defendants appeared and moved the court to quash the indictment, and each count thereof, for errors apparent upon its face; but the court overruled the motion and held the indictment good. It is to be questioned in this case, whether the fourth count be good under the ruling in Clark's Case, 6 Gratt. 675, where it is held that in an indictment for an attempt to commit an offence, the indictment ought to allege some act done by the defendant, of such a nature as to constitute an attempt to commit the offence mentioned in the indictment. And furthermore when an indictment does not charge a criminal offence, the court may, upon the motion of the defendant, quash it.

Attempt to Commit Rape—Words Necessary to Constitute Charge.—It seems, that in an indictment for an attempt to commit a rape, the word "ravish," as descriptive of the offence attempted is not necessary, but the words attempting "feloniously carnally to know," are sufficient. Christian v. Com., 23 Gratt. 954.

Alleging Color of Victim.—And in an indictment against a black man, for feloniously attempting to ravish a white woman, the indictment is bad, even after verdict, unless it aver that she is a white woman. Com. v. Mann, 2 Va. Cas. 210.

Attempt to Murder—Sufficiency of Charge Set Forth.—In Commonwealth v. Nutter, 8 Gratt. 699, the prisoner was indicted in the circuit court of Richie county, Virginia (now W. Va.), in 1852, for an attempt to commit a felony. The indictment contained five counts. The first charged that the prisoner on a certain day, in the county aforesaid with malice aforethought, in and upon one D. K., then and there being, feloniously, unlawfully and wilfully did make an assault and with a certain knife which he the said T. N. (the prisoner) in his hand then and there had and held, and had drawn and opened, feloniously, wilfully and unlawfully did attempt to stab, strike at and cut with said knife, with intent in so doing, wilfully and of his malice aforethought to kill and murder the said D. K., contrary to the form of the statute, etc. The second count charged an assault with the knife with intent feloniously, wilfully and unlawfully and of his malice aforethought to kill and murder the said D. K. The third count charged the assault with the club as in the first count; and the fourth count charged the assault with the club as in the second count. The fifth count charged that the said T. N. with malice aforethought in and upon D. K., then and there being, feloniously, wilfully and unlawfully did make an assault, and with a certain knife which he the said T. N. in his left hand then and there had and held, being drawn and opened, feloniously, wilfully and unlawfully did attempt to stab, strike at and cut with said knife, with intent then and there feloniously, and unlawfully to commit the crime of murder upon the body of the said D. K., had he not been prevented and arrested from so doing, contrary to the form of the statute, etc.

The defendant demurred to the whole indictment and each count thereof. The principal question for the consideration of the court at this stage was whether the first and fifth counts, or either of them, set forth such an attempt to murder as to make the attempt of murder set forth in either of them a felony. And again, if either of them did set forth such an attempt to murder as to make the attempt a felony, were the matters therein contained set forth in such legal and orderly manner as that the demurrer for the first and fourth counts ought to be overruled? The court held that the indictment was good, sufficiently setting forth an attempt to commit a felony.

Attempt to Maim and Kill.—And if A is indicted for shooting C with intent to maim, disfigure, disable and kill, and the proof is, that he shot at B and missed him and accidentally hit C he can be convicted on such indictment for shooting C with intent to maim, disfigure and kill him.

However, if A be indicted for an attempt to shoot C with intent to maim, disfigure, disable and kill him, and C is not in fact shot, and the proof is, that the attempt was to shoot B and not C, he cannot be convicted of an attempt to shoot C. State v. Meadows, 18 W. Va. 658.

XXII. BURGLARY AND HOUSEBREAKING.

A. IN GENERAL.

Joinder of Counts—Surplusage.—Two counts, one for "breaking and entering," and another for "entering without breaking," may be joined in the same indictment. State v. Flanagan (W. Va.), 35 S. E. Rep. 862.

Digitized by Google

And the use of the word "burglariously" in the second count should be regarded as surplusage. State v. Flanagan (W. Va.), 35 S. E. Rep. 862.

Variance in Counts—Demurrer Properly Overruled.—In State v. McClung, 35 W. Va. 280, 13 S. E. Rep. 654, a demurrer to an indictment containing two counts, the first one of which charged a burglary and larceny and the second larceny, was held properly overruled, if either count was correctly alleged.

Larceny Twice Charged.—And on an indictment charging in the first count both burglary and larceny, and in the second count larceny, a verdict of guilty on each count was pronounced, and sentence passed in conformity therewith. It was objected that the prisoner was twice sentenced for the same offence, that of larceny. Held, that the objection was not well taken. Speers v. Com., 17 Gratt. 573.

Several Burglaries—Relating to Same Offence.—So where an indictment contained two counts, one for burglary in the dwelling house of S and a second charging the same in the store house of S, both charging offences of the same general character, and so put in order to meet different phases of the evidence, the joinder was held good. State v. Shores, 31 W. Va. 491, 7 S. E. Rep. 413.

No Election Necessary.—And where two burglaries relating to the same offence are joined in the same indictment, the prosecutor need not elect on which to proceed. State v. Shores, 31 W. Va. 491, 7 S. E. Rep. 413.

Variance between Endorsement on Indictment, and Charge within—Effect.—On an indictment for breaking into a house in the daytime and stealing money therefrom, the grand jury endorsed upon it: "An indictment for larceny. A true bill." The prisoner was tried upon it, and there was a general verdict of guilty; whereupon, he moved the court in arrest of judgment, on the ground that the grand jury only found an indictment against him for larceny; whilst the indictment charged him with housebreaking and larceny. Held, no error. Hall's Case, 3 Gratt. 593.

Waiver of Jeopardy—Subsequent Trial under Whole Indictment.—In Benton v. Com., 91 Va. 782, 21 S. E. Rep. 495, there was a verdict for housebreaking with intent to commit larceny only, and, in effect, an acquittal of the charge of larceny; and, consequently, that the prisoner had been acquitted of both the felonies charged, and was not liable to be again put upon trial for either of the said offences, although at no time had a verdict of "not guilty" been rendered in his favor, but he had been convicted at separate times, and by different juries of each of said offences. The court held as follows: "In the revision of the civil and criminal laws made by the Code of 1887, the rule prescribed by the act of 1877-78, was modified, and this provision, 'if the verdict be set aside, and a new trial granted the accused, he shall not be tried for any higher offence than that of which he was convicted on the last trial,' was enacted in its stead." As a general rule, what is a "higher offence" within the meaning of section 4040 of the Code is to be determined by the maximum of the penalty affixed to the offence. Applying this rule to the case at bar, housebreaking in the nighttime with intent to commit larceny, and grand larceny are of equal degree, and a conviction of either, when set aside at the instance of the accused, is a waiver of his jeopardy as to both, and upon a new trial he may be put upon trial upon the whole indictment in which both are tried.

Conviction for Part of the Offence—Housebreaking.—And it is to be noted that under an indictment for burglary a conviction for housebreaking is proper. Taliaferro v. Com., 77 Va. 411. In this connection there was a count in an indictment for burglary which was defective for want of the word "burglariously," and the accused was found guilty and sentenced for housebreaking. The indictment contained a good count charging housebreaking. It was held, however, that a person found guilty by the verdict of a jury, under a bad count for burglary, cannot be sentenced for housebreaking, although the indictment contain a good count, charging the latter offence, for the jury having found their verdict on such bad count, the judgment should be arrested and the count quashed, for the reason that there is no punishment prescribed by the statute for the offence charged. State v. Meadows, 22 W. Va. 766; State v. Cottrell, 45 W. Va. 837, 32 S. E. Rep. 162.

Conviction of Grand and Petit Larceny.—And where an indictment charged, "that Joseph Reece on December 21, 1883, in said county, a certain store house not adjoining to or occupied with the dwelling house of one Robert Buster, there situate in the nighttime, did feloniously break and enter with intent the goods and chattels of the said Robert Buster, in the store house then and there being, feloniously to steal, take and carry away, and one overcoat," etc. (specifying various articles of goods and stating their aggregate value at $70), "of the goods and chattels of the said Robert Buster, in said store house then and there found, then and there feloniously did steal, take and carry away, against," etc., it was held that, the indictment failed to state the ownership of the store house so broken and entered, and was fatally defective so far as it attempted to charge an offence under §§ 12, 13, of ch. 145, of the W. Va. Code, in force in 1886, as amended by ch. 148, Acts of 1882. But treating that part of the indictment as surplusage, it was a good and sufficient indictment for grand larceny under the fourteenth section of said chapter. State v. Reece, 27 W. Va. 375.

And it was held in State v. Hupp, 31 W. Va. 355, 6 S. E. Rep. 919, that an allegation in an indictment that "the prisoner a certain outhouse and cellar not adjoining to nor occupied with the dwelling house of J. W. Hale, there situated, in the nighttime feloniously did break and enter," etc., did not allege the ownership of the outhouse and cellar to be in any one, and the indictment, as an indictment for "housebreaking," was fatally defective. But as the indictment alleged that the prisoner did break and enter the cellar "and one keg of wine of the value of $15, of the goods and chattels of J. W. Hale in the said house and cellar then and there being found, then and there feloniously did steal," etc., it was good as an indictment for petit larceny.

When Charge Sufficient to Constitute the Crime.—And an indictment which charged that, "Lewis Wright, on the first day of September, 1885, in the said county, in the nighttime of that day, feloniously and burglariously did break and enter into the dwelling house of one Andrew Johnson, situated in said county, with intent the goods and chattels of him, the said Andrew Johnson, in the said dwelling house then and there being, then and there feloniously and burglariously to steal, take, and carry away, and certain tickets (commonly called 'labor tickets') of the value, to wit: six of the value of ninety cents each, one of the value of fifteen cents, one of the value of fifty cents, and one of the value of seventy-five cents—the whole of the value of six dollars and eighty-five cents of the goods and chattels of the said Andrew Johnson, in the said dwelling house, in the county aforesaid, then and there being found," etc., was held a good indictment for burglary. Wright v. Com., 82 Va. 183.

Concluding Clause.—In State v. McClung, 35 W. Va. 280, 13 S. E. Rep. 654, an indictment contained two counts, the first one of which charged burglary and larceny, and the second larceny. The first was defective in that it did not conclude "against the peace and dignity of the state." The verdict found the prisoner guilty of burglary. It was held that the second count could not support the finding, as it was not good for burglary, and, though otherwise good for burglary, the first count could not support it, because it was bad for want of a proper conclusion. Thus neither count was good for burglary and therefore the judgment was reversed.

Conviction of Both Offences.—If the burglary and larceny relate to the same transaction, there may be a conviction of both offences on a general verdict of guilty, and a sentence for both. Speers v. Com., 17 Gratt. 573; State v. McClung, 35 W. Va. 280, 13 S. E. Rep. 654.

Burglary and Larceny on Same Count, Joinder Permissible.—And the joinder of burglary and larceny in the same count of an indictment is commonly employed, and is permissible. Speers v. Com., 17 Gratt. 570; Vaughan v. Com., 17 Gratt. 576; Clarke v. Com., 25 Gratt. 920; Wright v. Com., 82 Va. 183; State v. McClung, 35 W. Va. 280, 13 S. E. Rep. 654; State v. Flanagan (W. Va.), 35 S. E. Rep. 862.

For Larceny.—Under such an indictment, however, a conviction for the larceny alone, with an acquittal of the burglary is permitted. Speers v. Com., 17 Gratt. 570; Clarke v. Com., 25 Gratt. 920.

Conviction for Both Offences.—But there cannot be a conviction for both offences, when joined in same count. State v. McClung, 35 W. Va. 280, 13 S. E. Rep. 655; State v. Williams, 40 W. Va. 268, 21 S. E. Rep. 721. But if joined in separate counts it seems that there may be a conviction of both offences. State v. McClung, 35 W. Va. 280, 13 S. E. Rep. 655; Speers' Case, 17 Gratt. 570.

General Verdict—Sentence for Burglary Only.—But on a general verdict of guilty, a sentence can be for the burglary or housebreaking only, and not for both burglary and larceny, where there is a joinder of the offences in separate counts. Speers v. Com., 17 Gratt. 574; Vaughan v. Com., 17 Gratt. 578; State v. McClung, 35 W. Va. 280, 13 S. E. Rep. 654; State v. Williams, 40 W. Va. 268, 21 S. E. Rep. 721.

But in State v. Hupp, 31 W. Va. 355, 6 S. E. Rep. 919, the court held that, on an indictment for burglary and larceny in the same count, a sentence for petit larceny on a verdict of "guilty," as charged in the indictment, was proper. And in State v. Reece, 27 W. Va. 375, a sentence for grand larceny was held correct and sustained.

B. NECESSARY AVERMENTS.

1. IN GENERAL.

Defect Not Fatal.—Any defect of uncertainty or vagueness in the averment of larceny is not fatal, it being only in aid of the allegation of intent. Vaughan v. Com., 17 Gratt. 576; Wright v. Com., 82 Va. 183; State v. McClung, 35 W. Va. 280, 13 S. E. Rep. 654.

No Conviction if Defectively Averred.—But if the larceny is defectively averred there can be no conviction therefor. Vaughan v. Com., 17 Gratt. 576; Wright v. Com., 82 Va. 183; State v. McClung, 35 W. Va. 280, 13 S. E. Rep. 654.

Construction of Phrase Relating to Time of Night.—However, where an indictment alleges that a burglary was committed "on the 10th of November, 1891, about the hour of 12 o'clock in the night of that day," this clearly means in the night after sundown of that day. Shelton v. Com., 89 Va. 450, 16 S. E. Rep. 365.

When Burglary Sufficiently Charged.—And an indictment which alleges that the prisoner did "on the 2d of October, 1832, between the hours of twelve and four in the night of that day, feloniously and burglariously break and enter the dwelling house, etc., and certain articles of property then and there found of the value of $30, did feloniously steal, take and carry away therefrom," charges a burglary, in most technical form. Mark's Case, 4 Leigh 660.

Jurisdiction as an Essential Allegation.—But an indictment laying the offence as committed in the county of N., in the parish of H., without the words, "within the jurisdiction of this court," or, "within the county, or the district composed of the counties for which the court is held," was bad, after verdict, until the act of January 24th, 1804. Com. v. Richards, 1 Va. Cas. 1.

Averment of Intent to Commit Larceny.—Yet an indictment charging the statutory offence of housebreaking, with averment of intent to steal is sufficient under §§ 12, 13, of ch. 192, of Code 1860. Speers v. Com., 17 Gratt. 570. And the allegation of the actual larceny in such indictment is only in aid of the allegation of intent, and the effect of a general verdict of guilty upon such counts is to convict a prisoner of the crime of breaking and entering with intent to commit larceny and not the crime of larceny also. Speers v. Com., 17 Gratt. 570; Vaughan v. Com., 17 Gratt. 576; Butler v. Com., 81 Va. 159; Wright v. Com., 82 Va. 185.

Averment of Time—Nighttime.—But in burglary the offence must be committed in the nighttime, and in every indictment for burglary, it must distinctly and plainly appear, that the offence was committed in the nighttime. Moreover, if the allegation that it was committed in the nighttime be omitted, it will still be defective though it was indeed charged that the offence was burglariously committed. Mark's Case, 4 Leigh 660.

Date.—And an indictment found in 1895, charging defendant with breaking and entering a "mill house" with intent to commit larceny, but not specifying the "date" of said act, was held bad, since the offence was not a felony if committed subsequent to act of February 12, 1894, which amended the Code, §§ 3705, 3706, and made it a crime to break and enter "any office, shop, storehouse, warehouse, or other house," with intent to commit larceny, by omitting the words "or other house." Cool v. Com., 94 Va. 799, 26 S. E. Rep. 411.

Averment of Breaking and Entering.—And it is important to notice that an indictment for common-law burglary must charge the breaking and entering to have been done "feloniously and burglariously." State v. McDonald, 9 W. Va. 456; State v. Vest, 21 W. Va. 796; State v. McClung, 35 W. Va. 280, 13 S. E. Rep. 655. So in State v. Meadows, 22 W. Va. 766, an indictment for burglary must charge that the offence was "burglariously" committed. See also, State v. Cottrell, 45 W. Va. 837, 32 S. E. Rep. 162. And a verdict does not cure this defect. Randall's Case, 24 Gratt. 644; State v. McClung, 35 W. Va. 280, 13 S. E. Rep. 654.

In this connection, the West Virginia statutes, relating to burglary, housebreaking and larceny, came before the court for construction in State v. McDonald, 9 W. Va. 456, the West Virginia Code 1868, ch. 145, § 11, providing that "if a person break and enter the house of another in the nighttime with intent to commit larceny he shall be deemed guilty of burglary," and shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than five nor more than ten years. Section 12 provided that "if a person shall in the nighttime enter without breaking, or shall in the daytime break and enter, a dwelling house * * * or shall in the nighttime enter without breaking, or break and enter either in the daytime or nighttime any office, shop * * * or other house * * * with intent to commit murder, rape or robbery, he shall be confined in the penitentiary" between five and ten years; while section 13 provided "if any person do any of the acts mentioned in the preceding section with intent to commit larceny or any felony other than murder, rape, or robbery he shall be confined in the penitentiary" between two and ten years. The indictment charged that "McDonald," and two others, on the first day of January, 1874, in said county, a certain dwelling house of John T. Reynolds there situate in the nighttime, feloniously, did break and enter," with intent to commit larceny. Held, that the words "or other house" as used in section 12, include a dwelling house; therefore the indictment was good under section 12, as punishable under section 13, and not demurrable, as an indictment under section 11, for failure to charge that the breaking was "feloniously and burglariously" done.

Ownership—Averment of Ownership of Building—How Alleged.—But an indictment for breaking and entering a store house not adjoining a dwelling house with intent to commit larceny, which fails to state the ownership of the store house so broken and entered is fatally defective. State v. Reece, 27 W. Va. 377; State v. Hupp, 31 W. Va. 355, 6 S. E. Rep. 919.

The usual averment of ownership of the property alleged to have been intended to be stolen is that "of one B," but it is not necessary to lay the ownership with the same formality as in an indictment for the larceny itself. Vaughan v. Com., 17 Gratt. 576; Wright v. Com., 82 Va. 188.

And an indictment which charges that a prisoner on a certain day, etc., "a certain mill-house not adjoining to or occupied with the dwelling house of F., etc., did break and enter, etc.," sufficiently alleges the ownership of the mill-house to be in F., and is sufficient in law. Webster v. Com., 80 Va. 598. See also, Butler's Case, 81 Va. 162.

Bad Punctuation.—So the ownership of a store house was sufficiently alleged as "a certain store house adjoined or occupied with a dwelling house of one David A. Studds," although there was no comma after "dwelling house." Butler v. Com., 81 Va. 162.

But in State v. Hupp, 31 W. Va. 355, 6 S. E. Rep. 919, it was held that an allegation in an indictment that "the prisoner a certain outhouse and cellar not adjoining to nor occupied with the dwelling house of J. W. Hale, there situated, in the nighttime feloniously did break and enter, with intent," etc., did not allege the ownership of the outhouse and cellar to be in any one, and the indictment was fatally defective. And in State v. Reece, 27 W. Va. 375, an indictment stated "that Joseph Reece on December 21, 1823, in said county, a certain store house, not adjoining to or occupied with the dwelling house of one Robert Buster, there situate, in the nighttime, did feloniously break and enter with intent the goods and chattels of the said Robert Buster, in the store house then and there being, feloniously to steal, take and carry away, etc., of the goods and chattels of the said Robert Buster, in the said store house then and there found, then and there did feloniously steal take and carry away," etc. The court was of opinion that such statement of the ownership of the store house though broken and entered, was fatally defective.

Landlord and Tenant.—And the tenant is the proper person to be averred as owner in the indictment, where he is in exclusive possession, without any interference on the part of the proper owner. State v. Betsall, 11 W. Va. 729.

Common Entrance.—But where the owner and the tenant use a common entrance or outer door, the ownership of the building should be laid in the former. State v. Betsall, 11 W. Va. 729.

Both Having Keys.—So where A, the lessee of the premises, hired to B the privilege of keeping his horse and feed in the stable, for which he paid him, both using a common outer door and carrying keys thereto, the ownership was held properly laid in A. State v. Betsall, 11 W. Va. 729.

Ownership Must Be Proved as Alleged.—An indictment charged that the accused did break and enter into a sealed box railroad freight car, the property of the Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Chicago and St. Louis Railroad Company in the custody of the Baltimore and Ohio Company, and stole a hog therefrom. The evidence showed that the car was marked "P., C., C. & St. L.," in the custody of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, and one of the witnesses stated that he understood that the letters stood for the Pittsburg, Cleveland, Chicago, and St. Louis Railroad Company. Another witness stated that the car was marked "C., C. & St. L." No witness testified, as alleged in the indictment, that the car was the property of the Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Chicago and St. Louis Railroad Company. The court held as follows: "The car being in the special custody of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, it was not necessary to allege its general ownership, but an allegation of special ownership would have been sufficient; but, having alleged the ownership, it must be proven accordingly, for the protection of the prisoner; otherwise, he could be again indicted for the same offence proven, as being a different offence from that alleged. The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company may have in its care and custody at the same time many cars of various roads. An indictment for the breaking into the house of one person cannot be sustained by proof of breaking into the house of another. And an indictment for breaking into the car of a given railroad company cannot be sustained by proof of breaking into the car of another company." State v. Hill (W. Va.), 35 S. E. Rep. 831.

Variance in Averment of Ownership.—And where two counts in an indictment, in each of which the ownership of the house entered was described to be in different persons and in each of them the accused was charged with having broken and entered the said house, not only with intent to commit a larceny therein, but with also having actually committed such larceny, to wit: of one trunk and its contents of certain specific value respectively set out, and all of the aggregate value of $85.85 of the goods and chattels of the said Joseph Dabney, in the said dwelling house then and there being found, it was held that the person could be acquitted of the felonious and burglarious breaking and entering in of the dwelling house, but convicted of the larceny as charged in the indictment. Clarke v. Com., 25 Gratt. 919.

XXIII. CHEATS.

The false passing as a true note, a false, and forged note, purporting to be a note of a bank (which bank never existed), and procuring goods by means thereof, is not such an offence as comes within the act to prevent the deceitfully obtaining goods, etc., by privy tokens or counterfeit letters; but it is a public cheat indictable at common law, if the defendant knew that it was such a false note. And it is necessary in such case to aver the scienter in the indictment. Com. v. Speer, 2 Va. Cas. 65.

XXIV. CONSPIRACY.

Boycotting.—The first count of an indictment for boycotting charged, directly that the defendant and others "did unlawfully and maliciously, wickedly and corruptly, knowingly, and intentionally, combine, conspire, and confederate together, to injure, ruin, break up and destroy Baughman Brothers in their business as printers and stationers"; that they did this by unlawfully, wickedly maliciously, knowingly, intentionally and corruptly making threats to a great number of persons mentioned, and others unknown to the grand jurors, all of whom had been, and were at the time, regular customers and patrons of the said Baughman Brothers; and that they did, then and there, by their said unlawful, malicious, wicked and corrupt threats, by their said unlawful acts as therein set forth, do a serious injury to the business of the said Baughman Brothers, and a still greater injury to the peace, dignity and good name of the commonwealth of Virginia—to the evil example of all of her people. The above count was demurred to on the ground that it did not charge a conspiracy to do any unlawful act, and did not in particular state the means to be used by the conspirators to break up and destroy the business of Baughman Brothers, nor show that the means to be used were unlawful. The court held that the objection could not be sustained. It was wholly groundless and gratuitous; that the count specifically and exactly charged a criminal conspiracy unprovoked, wanton and unlawful, both as to the end aimed at and the means used to accomplish it; that it charged a combination of the defendant and his co-conspirators to ruin, break up, and destroy the business of Baughman Brothers, and it charged the means used, and the success of the unlawful endeavor operated upon the peaceful and honest industries of the customers and patrons of Baughman Brothers; that the particular means employed need not be alleged, for the offence does not consist in doing the acts by which the mischief is affected but in conspiring with a view to effect the intended mischief by any means. Crump v. Com., 84 Va. 927, 6 S. E. Rep. 620.

XXV. COUPONS.

Selling Tax-Receivable Coupons without License.—A person indicted for doing business as a stock-broker without a license in violation of sections 58 and 60 of Acts 1883-84, cannot be convicted upon proof of his having sold tax-receivable coupons only. The two classes of offences are widely different. Com. v. Lucas, 84 Va. 306, 4 S. E. Rep. 695.

Moreover, the offence of selling tax-receivable coupons under section 65 is not charged by an indictment alleging that defendant "did deal in certificates of debt commonly called 'Virginia coupons' * * * * without license under sections 58 and 60 of the act of assembly * * * for the years 1883 and 1884, page 588," as the court must take cognizance that there are Virginia coupons outstanding that are not tax receivable. Commonwealth v. Lucas, 84 Va. 303, 4 S. E. Rep. 695.

XXVI. CORPORATIONS.

A corporation cannot be impleaded criminaliter by its artificial name, at common law. Thus, in Commonwealth v. Swift Run Gap Turnpike Co., 2 Va. Cas. 362, an information charged the corporation in its corporate name, with a nuisance in obstructing a common public highway and road, by digging it up, and placing therein large quantities of stone and dirt, whereby the citizens of the commonwealth were hindered from passing and traveling on the same to their great damage and common nuisance, etc. It was a proceeding at common law. The court was unanimously of the opinion, that a corporation, such as the president, directors, and company of the description given, could not be impleaded by its artificial name, for the criminal offence stated in the information.

XXVII. DUELLING.

An indictment at common law charging that the defendant did fight a duel with pistols, is bad on demurrer. Com. v. Lambert, 9 Leigh 603. See Va. Code 1887, §§ 3683-92; W. Va. Code 1899, ch. 144, §§ 19-27.

But an indictment for sending a challenge, in the form of a letter, to fight a duel, need not set out the words of the letter, nor the substance thereof. Brown v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 516.

Moreover, in Dudley v. Com., 6 Leigh 613, an indictment for aiding and abetting in fighting a duel, not charging with clearness and certainty that a duel was fought, was for that reason, held bad on general demurrer.

XXVIII. FALSE PRETENSES.

A. IN GENERAL.

Form of Indictment.—Virginia Code of 1887, § 3721, provides that "if any person obtain, by any false pretense or token, from any person, with intent to defraud money or other property, which may be the subject of larceny, he shall be deemed guilty of the larceny thereof; or if he obtain by any false pretense or token, with such intent, the signature of any person to a writing, the making whereof would be forgery, he shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than one nor more than five years." The offence, therefore, of false pretense is by this statute made larceny, and an indictment for the offence may be, either in the form of an indictment for larceny at common law, or by charging the specific facts which the act declares shall be deemed larceny. Leftwich v. Com., 20 Gratt. 716.

When Indictment for Not Barred.—And an acquittal of the felony of forging an order, and of uttering as true a forged order, is no bar to an indictment and prosecution for the misdemeanor of fraudulently obtaining goods by means of a false privy token, a counterfeit letter, the said privy token being the same order, of the forgery and uttering, of which the prisoner had been acquitted. Com. v. Quann, 2 Va. Cas. 89.

Description of Property Obtained.—But in an indictment for obtaining money by false pretenses the same particularity is required in describing the property obtained, as in an indictment for larceny. State v. Hurst, 11 W. Va. 54.

Thus in an indictment under the Virginia Code 1887, § 3721, for obtaining money upon a false pretense, it is not sufficient to describe it as "$90 in United States currency"; but it should show what kind of United States currency was obtained. Leftwich v. Com., 20 Gratt. 716.

B. ALLEGATIONS.—And in an indictment for obtaining money by false pretenses it is necessary to prove that the prosecutor was induced to part with his money by relying on the false pretenses of the prisoner; but the allegation in the indictment that the prisoner, by means of specified false pretenses, obtained such money is a sufficient allegation of these facts so required to be proven. Or such knowledge is sufficiently alleged in the indictment by saying that the prisoner knowingly, designedly, falsely and feloniously pretended these matters of fact, constituting the false pretenses specifying them. State v. Hurst, 11 W. Va. 54.

When Defective, and Properly Quashed for Insufficiency in Allegation.—But in State v. Baller, 26 W. Va. 90, an indictment alleged that C. B., unlawfully furnished one A. R., for the use of P. E., money to unlawfully induce P. E., to absent himself from the circuit court of the county at a certain time, to which he, P. E., had been summoned as a witness against C. B., in a trial on an indictment against C. B., then pending in said court, whereby the said C. B., attempted to obstruct and impede the administration of justice. The court held that, the indictment was fatally defective in not alleging that A. R. paid or offered to pay the sum of money to the witness P. E., to induce him to absent himself as such witness at said time from the circuit court. Without this the act done by the defendant is not of such a nature as to constitute an attempt to commit the offence mentioned in the indictment, therefore on motion of the defendant the court ought to have quashed this indictment.

XXIX. FELONIOUS HOMICIDES.

On an indictment for felonious homicide, the jury may find the accused not guilty of the felony, but guilty of involuntary manslaughter. Va. Code 1887, § 4042; Canada v. Com., 22 Gratt. 899; Hoback v. Com., 28 Gratt. 922; Hardy v. Com., 17 Gratt. 592.

XXX. PENCES.

An indictment which charges that defendant knowingly and wilfully removed a fence from the lands of P. and did injure and expose the growing crop of P. then on said land, charges but one offence; and is valid. Ratcliffe v. Com., 5 Gratt. 657.

XXXI. FORGERY AND COUNTERFEITING.

A. IN GENERAL.

When Indictable.—Upon an indictment for passing a counterfeit check or order of a president of a branch of the bank of the United States, on the cashier of the bank, payable to T. R., or order, and indorsed by T. R., to bearer, the court held that, whether the charter of the bank of the United States be constitutional or not, and whether the charter authorized the issue of such checks or orders or not, the counterfeiting or passing counterfeits for such checks or orders, is felony by the statute, 1 Rev. Code ch. 154, § 4. Hendricks' Case, 5 Leigh 707. It is therefore indictable. Moreover, an indictment for passing a counterfeit bank note to a slave with intent to defraud a bank, is good. Brown v. Com., 2 Leigh 769.

Indictable in State and Federal Courts.—And though the offender be indictable in the courts of the United States, for an offence against the laws of the United States, he is also indictable in the courts of Virginia for an offence against the laws of the state. Hendricks' Case, 5 Leigh 707.

Form.—The form of an indictment for forgery and uttering forged instruments, found in Mayo's Guide (Ed. 1860), p. 537, is good as to both counts. Neither in an indictment for uttering or attempting to employ as true a forged instrument, nor one for forgery, is it necessary to name the person intended to be defrauded, as sec. 8, ch. 158, Code 1887, dispenses with that in both such cases. It is not necessary in such indictment to allege that the act was to the prejudice of another's right, but it must appear from the description of the writing in the indictment that it is such as might prejudice his right. State v. Tingler, 32 W. Va. 546, 9 S. E. Rep. 935.

What a Good Indictment for Forgery.—The description of the writing in the indictment, as the indorsement of the person whose name is forged, will not vitiate the indictment, though the simulated liability might not be that of technical endorser, but of a different character. Powell v. Com., 11 Gratt. 822.

And under sec. 6, of ch. 158, of the W. Va. Code in force in 1886, an indictment for uttering, and attempting to employ as true, a forged writing, need not set out the whole writing, but it is sufficient to give its purport an effect. State v. Henderson, 29 W. Va. 147, 1 S. E. Rep. 225.

And in Perkins v. Com., 7 Gratt. 651, an indictment for forgery charged the forgery of a negotiable note, and set it out in haec verba, without setting out the endorsements upon the back of it. On the trial when the note was offered in evidence, it was objected to on the ground of variance. Held, it was not necessary to set out in the indictment the endorsements upon the note, or any other matter written upon the same paper, constituting no part of the note itself, and not entering into the essential description of that instrument.

Examination—When Sufficient to Warrant Indictment.—A prisoner committed for examination, is examined, and remanded by the examining court for trial for felony in forging and uttering a promissory note purporting to be drawn by A. D. (no intention to defraud A. D. or any other person being charged). The court held that the examination was sufficient and would warrant an indictment for forging and uttering the note with intentions to defraud A. D. Bogart v. Com., 10 Leigh 693.

Same—Variance between Finding on Examination and Indictment.—But if a prisoner is examined for forgery and having twenty-four pieces of silver, and sent on to the circuit court for further trial, he cannot be indicted for feloniously having in his possession ten or more pieces of coin with intent to alter and employ the same as true. Scott v. Com., 14 Gratt. 687.

Two Counts—Conviction of Forgery Thereunder.—An indictment (described in the record of the finding, and in the entry of the arraignment, as an indictment for forgery) contains: 1. A count for forging and counterfeiting a note, and 2. A count for feloniously using and employing as true a counterfeit note. Verdict finds the prisoner guilty of forgery, as alleged in the indictment. Held, an acquittal must be entered on the second count. Page v. Com., 9 Leigh 683.

Accessories—Indictment of Same.—If the procurers or aiders are not present at the time, they must be indicted specifically as accessories, nor could they be convicted under a form of indictment charging them as principals. But if they are aiders and abettors of the act, the indictment will not be liable to this objection, viz., uniting accessory guilt with the guilt of the principal. Law makes the aiders and procurers equally guilty with the actual offender, and where they are charged with the words of an indictment, they are to be taken as principals in the second degree, i. e., as present at the time, and in this case no objection can be perceived to uniting in one count such an offence with the offence of principal in the first degree. Rasnick v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 356.

Joinder of Counts.—If an indictment against a prisoner contains counts for the forgery, and counts for uttering and publishing, the superior court ought to quash the latter counts. Mowbray v. Com., 11 Leigh 643.

Joinder of Felony and Misdemeanor—Effect.—So in Scott v. Com., 14 Gratt. 687, there were counts in an indictment for forging and counterfeiting coin; also a count for feloniously having in his possession twenty pieces of forged coin, not saying, "at the same time." The prisoner having moved the court to quash the last count, which was overruled, there was a verdict and judgment against him, and he obtained a writ of error. The appellate court holding that the count was bad as an indictment for a felony, would not permit it to stand as a count for misdemeanor, but reversed the judgment and quashed the count. The further question was suggested in this case, but was not decided, therefore left open, as to whether in an indictment counts for a felony and for a misdemeanor could be joined. The inclination was indicated to negative the joining of such counts.

Duplicity.—But a joinder of two or more offences in one count is not permitted. However, if the whole transaction be only parts of one fact of endeavor, all the parts may be stated together as one offence. Thus, an indictment charging in one count forgery of a check and of an endorsement thereon, is not liable to the objection of duplicity or misjoinder. Sprouse v. Com., 81 Va. 374.

Multifariousness.—An indictment which charges a prisoner with the offences of falsely making, forging and counterfeiting; of causing and procuring to be falsely made, forged and counterfeited, and of willingly aiding and assisting in the said false making, forging and counterfeiting, is a good indictment though all of these charges are contained in a single count: the words of the statute being pursued, and there being a general verdict of guilty, judgment ought not to be arrested on the ground that the offences are distinct. Rasnick v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 356.

Rule of Practice When Some Counts Are Faulty, Others Good.—The rule of practice in criminal cases, that if an indictment contain several counts, some good and others faulty, and a general verdict of guilty be found, the bad counts will not affect the validity of the good, and judgment will be given on those which are good,—is not applicable to cases of penitentiary crimes in Virginia, where the jury is to ascertain the term of imprisonment, since the evidence on the bad counts may aggravate the punishment imposed by verdict. Mowbray v. Com., 11 Leigh 643.

Variance.

Immaterial—Variance between Certificate and Indictment.—The only variance between a forged order as set out in a certificate, and as set out in an indictment consisted of the following: that "Thos." in the latter was written "Thomas" in the former; "23c" in the latter was written "twenty-three cents" in the former; "Resp't'y" in the latter was written "Respectively" in the former. Such variances as these are immaterial, and are not such as require the accused to be sent back to a justice for examination. Burress v. Com., 27 Gratt. 934.

Same—Account—Acc't.—So the difference between "account" as set out in the indictment and "acc't" as written in the order is not a material variance, which will exclude the order as evidence. Burress v. Com., 27 Gratt. 934.

Same—Forged Indorsement.—And in State v. Duffield (W. Va.), 38 S. E. Rep. 577, there was an indictment for forged endorsements on the notes which were set out in haec verba, which note as it appeared in the indictment, purporting to be signed, "J. F. C. Duffield," as maker. But a similar note signed by J. F. C. Duffield as maker was offered in evidence in support of the indictment. The court held that such a variance as this is immaterial.

Material Variance.—But when the alleged forged note is set out in haec verba, and in the body thereof are the words "with 6 per cent. int. from date," and the note offered in evidence contains no such words, this is a variance, both in substance and legal effect, fatal to the introduction of such last-mentioned note as evidence in support of the allegations of the indictment. State v. Fleshman, 40 W. Va. 726, 22 S. E. Rep. 309.

B. DESCRIPTION, AND NECESSARY AVERMENTS.

Forged Instrument—How Described.—In a prosecution for forging, or attempting to employ as true any forged instrument, it is sufficient to describe the same in the indictment in such manner as would sustain an indictment for the larceny of such instrument. State v. Duffield (W. Va.), 38 S. E. Rep. 577.

And it is not necessary to set forth in the count, the persons whom the prisoner procured to forge the instrument, or with whom he acted and assisted in the forgery. A general description, in the words of the statute, is sufficient. Huffman v. Com., 6 Rand. 685.

And, if in an indictment for a forgery, the document alleged to have been forged is described in such manner as would sustain an indictment for stealing it supposing it to be the subject of larceny, the indictment is sufficient. Coleman v. Com., 25 Gratt. 865.

However, the words "to the prejudice of another's right," in the Code, ch. 193, sec. 5, p. 733, in relation to forgeries, are descriptive not of the offence, but of the writings of which forgery may be committed; and it is not therefore necessary that they shall be inserted in the indictment in describing the offence charged. Powell v. Com., 11 Gratt. 822.

Averring Extrinsic Circumstances.—Forgery is the making of the false writing which, if genuine, would be apparently of legal efficacy. Writings, invalid on their face, are not subject to forgery. If extrinsic circumstances are essential to the efficacy of the instruments, they must be averred in the indictment. Terry v. Com., 87 Va. 672, 13 S. E. Rep. 104.

Alleging Possession and Time.—And an indictment under the statute, Va. Code 1849, ch. 193, § 6, p. 733, for feloniously having in his possession more than ten pieces of forged or base coin, must allege that the prisoner had them in his possession at the same time; and the charge that on a certain day he had them in his possession, is not sufficient. Scott v. Com., 14 Gratt. 687.

Indictment for Attempting to Employ as True a Forged Instrument—Not Necessary to Name Person Defrauded.—But under § 8, ch. 158, Code of 1887, which provided that "where intent to injure, defraud, or cheat is required to constitute an offence, it shall be sufficient, in an indictment or accusation therefor, to allege generally an intent to injure, defraud, or cheat, without naming the person intended to be injured, defrauded or cheated." It is not necessary in an indictment for attempting to pass as true a forged instrument, to name the person intended to be defrauded. State v. Tingler, 32 W. Va. 546, 9 S. E. Rep. 935.

Instrument Need Not Be Set Out.—And while in an indictment for forgery it is unnecessary to set forth a copy or facsimile of the instrument forged, yet if this is done, and there is a material variance between the copy so set out and the paper offered in evidence, such paper, on motion of the accused, should be excluded from the consideration of the jury. State v. Fleshman, 40 W. Va. 726, 22 S. E. Rep. 309.

Specifying Particular Part of Note.—However, it is not necessary in an indictment for forgery to specify the particular part of the note forged. A forged note, being false in one material part or signature, is false in toto, and must be so regarded as to the person against whom the fraud is aimed. State v. Fleshman, 40 W. Va. 726, 22 S. E. Rep. 309.

Alleging Act to Be "To the Prejudice of Another's Rights."—Moreover, it is not necessary in an indictment for forgery to allege in the indictment that the act was to the prejudice of any one's right. For the words "to the prejudice of another's right" found in the statute against forgery, are descriptive, not of the offence, but of the instrument. State v. Tingler, 32 W. Va. 546, 9 S. E. Rep. 935; Powell's Case, 11 Gratt. 822.

Sufficiency—The Act Charged Must Be to the Prejudice of Another.— The Virginia Code 1887, § 3737, predicates the offence of forgery only of such writings as are, or may be, to the prejudice of another. If it be not so, the indictment does not charge the offence. Terry v. Com., 87 Va. 672, 13 S. E. Rep. 104.

However, in Murry v. Com., 5 Leigh 720, upon an indictment for passing a counterfeit note of the bank of Louisville, without alleging that the bank was a chartered bank, or that there was no such bank, and without alleging that the note was passed "to the prejudice of another's right," or "for the prisoner's own benefit, or for the benefit of another," the court held, that the offence so charged was a felony within the meaning of the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 154, § 4, and that the indictment was good and sufficient.

Same—Description of the Die or Other Instrument.—And an indictment under the statute of 1834, § 35, ch. 66, charging that the prisoner did knowingly have in his custody, without lawful authority or excuse, "one die or instrument" for the purpose of producing and impressing the stamp and similitude to the current silver coin called a half dollar (no further description of the die or instrument being given), is insufficient. Commonwealth v. Scott, 1 Rob. 695 (1842).

Same—Procuring Act to Be Done.—But an indictment for causing and procuring a counterfeit bank note to be offered to be passed, without stating by whom or how the accused caused and procured it to be done, is sufficiently certain and good. Brown v. Com., 2 Leigh 769.

Same—Time and Place.—An indictment for passing a counterfeit note charged that "John Buckland, late of Monroe county, on the 14th day of September, 1836, at the said county of Monroe and within the jurisdiction of the circuit court, being possessed of a certain false, forged and counterfeited bank note, purporting to be a bank note of the bank of the United States, of the denomination of 20 dollars, which said false, forged and counterfeited bank note is in the words and figures following, that is to say," (setting out a note in haec verba) "on which said note was the following endorsement: 'Pay the bearer, M. Robinson.'—feloniously did pass to one William Adair the said false, forged and counterfeited note, purporting, etc., with intention to injure and defraud the said William Adair, he the said John Buckland well knowing the said note to be false, forged and counterfeited, at the time he passed the same to the said William Adair, against the form of section 1, ch. 154, 1 Rev. Code." Held, the time and place of passing the note and of the scienter are set forth with sufficient certainty. Buckland v. Com., 8 Leigh 732.

Moreover, in a prosecution for uttering or attempting to employ as true a forged note purporting to be on the Bank of Delaware in Pennsylvania, a banking company authorized by the laws of Pennsylvania, the existence of such a bank may be proved by parol evidence. The averment that it was authorized by the laws of Pennsylvania is surplusage, and need not be proved. Moreover, the time when the offence is alleged in the indictment to have been committed, being stated in figures is no error. Cady v. Com., 10 Gratt. 776.

Same—Note—Specifying Amount, Date, Maker, and Place Payable.—And if an indictment charges the forgery of an endorsement on a negotiable note, which is described as to the amount, the date, to whom payable and when due, but does not state who is the maker of the note or where it is payable, the indictment nevertheless will be held good. Cocke v. Com., 13 Gratt. 750.

Same—Misnomer.—In Com. v. Kearns, 1 Va. Cas. 109, the jury rendered a special verdict finding the prisoner guilty of transferring a certificate of the commonwealth, purporting to be signed by two auditors of public accounts knowing it to be forged. This verdict was rendered subject to the ruling of the court on the two following propositions, viz.: first, the sufficiency of parol proof to establish an official appointment of the auditors; secondly, the immateriality of an error in misspelling the Christian name of one of the auditors in the indictment. However the law was found to be for the defendant.

C. PROCEDURE.

Evidence Admissible in Support of Indictment.—A forged paper is passed by a prisoner bearing date in 1828: immediately after, with the knowledge of the holder, the prisoner alters the date to 1827. The indictment sets forth its tenor, and describes it as dated in 1827. The paper is proper evidence to go to the jury in support of the indictment, notwithstanding the proof that it bore date in 1828, when passed. Huffman v. Com., 6 Rand. 685.

And on a trial of an indictment for the passing of a counterfeit bank note or check, after evidence that the prisoner passed the note, and that it was counterfeit, evidence that the prisoner had in his possession and attempted to pass other counterfeit notes of the same kind to other persons, the day after he passed those in the indictment mentioned, is admissible to prove the scienter. Hendricks' Case, 5 Leigh 707.

Moreover, upon the trial of an indictment for passing counterfeit bank notes, proof that prisoner had, about the same time, passed another note of that kind, which was thought to be a counterfeit and which he took back, though this note is not produced at the trial, it is admissible evidence to prove the scienter. And upon the trial of an indictment against M for passing counterfeit bank notes, if the prisoner 'appears clearly to have been confederated with one L in passing counterfeit notes, and present when L passed such notes, the notes so passed by L can be produced in evidence against the prisoner, as they are proper evidence. Martin v. Com., 2 Leigh 745.

Let it be observed, in this connection, that it is necessary to the support of an allegation in an indictment that the bank notes purport on their faces to be notes of certain banks, that the notes produced in evidence correspond therewith. Pomeroy v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 342.

Defects Cured by Verdict.—A charge that a forgery of bank notes was committed, with intent to injure "divers good citizens of the commonwealth and others, to the jurors unknown," without setting out an intent to injure the president, directors, and company of those banks, or of any particular person, or body politic, by name, is good after verdict. So, to charge that the prisoners willingly acted and assisted in falsely making and forging, without setting out in particular any person who was assisted. So, to charge them with causing and procuring the forged notes to be passed, without setting out the person whom the prisoners caused and procured to pass them, nor to whom. So, to charge them with passing them to W. S., with intent to defraud the said W. S. and others. So, also, to charge them with causing and procuring them to be passed or exchanged: are all good after verdict. Com. v. Ervin, 2 Va. Cas. 337. Moreover, in an indictment for the forgery of bank notes, instead of setting out the tenor of the forged notes, the attorney "for greater certainty as to their identity," referred to them as "being annexed" hereto, and actually did annex them. The prisoner did not move to quash the indictment, nor did he plead in abatement, but pleaded the general issue, and a verdict was rendered against him. Although this is a careless and irregular mode of counting, yet after verdict the irregularity is cured by the act of jeofails. Com. v. Ervin, 2 Va. Cas. 337.

When Verdict Too Uncertain under Indictment with Two Counts.—In Cocke v. Com., 13 Gratt. 750, an indictment charged in one count forgery of a note, and in another count forgery of an indorsement upon a note. The jury nevertheless found the prisoner not guilty on the first count; and then said, "on the second count, namely, that of uttering a negotiable note knowing it to be forged, we find the prisoner guilty, and affix the term of his imprisonment for the term of two years." The verdict upon the second count is too uncertain to authorize any judgment upon it; and a venire facias de novo on that count should be awarded.

XXXII. FORNICATION.

See post, "Lewd and Lascivious Cohabitation and Conduct."

The offence of fornication cannot be punished by information as a common-law offence, unless accompanied with other circumstances which, per se, constitute a misdemeanor, such as the public commission of the act. Isaacs v. Com., 5 Rand. 634. Those guilty of fornication are liable to indictment for lewd and lascivious cohabitation. See Lafferty v. Com., 6 Gratt. 672; also, Va. Code 1887, § 3787, and Anderson v. Com., 5 Rand. 627.

XXXIII. GAMING.

A. IN GENERAL.

Plea of Misnomer.—A misnomer cannot be pleaded to a presentment, indictment, or information, for unlawful gaming under the 20th and 21st sections of the act against gaming, in force in 1826. Com. v. Adkinson, 2 Va. Cas. 513.

License of Tavern Keeper as Condition Precedent to Condition.—Moreover, if a party indicted for suffering an unlawful game to be played in his tavern, was keeper of the tavern at the time of such playing, his having a license at the time is not necessary to his conviction. Com. v. Price, 8 Leigh 757.

Description of Offence.—An omission to charge any offence against the statute is not cured by a general allegation that the act was unlawful. The offence must be so charged as to appear to be unlawful; otherwise, the allegation that an act was unlawful, would dispense with all averments showing it was unlawful. Huff v. Com., 14 Gratt. 648.

Description of Device—Statutory Name.—Where the statute makes the exhibition of any of the gaming tables therein enumerated a penal offence, it is sufficient to mention the same by name without further description. Huff v. Com., 14 Gratt. 648.

Offence Not Specifically Mentioned in Statute.—Where the offence charged is not specifically mentioned in the statute, there must be some averment showing it to be one of the unequal games belonging to the same class with those mentioned. Huff v. Com., 14 Gratt. 648.

Person with Whom the Gambling Was Done Must Be Named.—The person with whom the bet was made must be stated. Bish. St. Cr. § 944; State v. Griggs, 34 W. Va. 78, 11 S. E. Rep. 740; State v. Snider, 34 W. Va. 83, 11 S. E. Rep. 742.

Statutory Penalty Not Recoverable by Information.—The penalty of $150 imposed by the act of 1797 on tavern keepers suffering the game of faro in their houses could not be recovered by information for the use of the commonwealth; the penalty being given to the person suing for the same, and it being no offence at common law. Commonwealth v. Richards, 1 Va. Cas. 133.

B. PRESENTMENT FOR GAMING.

Character of Place at the Time.—It was held in Bishop v. Com., 13 Gratt. 785, that a presentment for playing cards must charge that the place at which it occurred was a public place at the time of such playing, where the name of the place did not of itself import that it was at the time a public place.

Thus, as held in Roberts v. Com., 10 Leigh 686, a presentment "for unlawfully playing cards at the grocery of D and C" is defective in substance for not alleging the grocery to be a public place, or a place of public resort.

And in Hord v. Com., 4 Leigh 674, a presentment for gaming charged the def- laying at an unlawful game "at the h , in the county of P. William." H t was fatally defective in not c use where, etc., was an ordi ce.

Digitized by Google

Uncertainty of Place.—Moreover, a presentment for playing cards, "at or near" a place, is objectionable for uncertainty. Bishop v. Com., 13 Gratt. 785.

Information Not Necessary for Trial.—But where a tavern keeper is presented for suffering faro and loo to be played at his house, he may be tried on the presentment alone, without any information: and if he refuses to answer to the presentment, judgment by default may be rendered against him. Com. v. Maddox, 2 Va. Cas. 19.

Right to Trial by Jury.—However, a defendant presented for unlawful gaming is entitled to trial by jury. Com. v. Horton, 1 Va. Cas. 335; Com. v. McGuire, 1 Va. Cas. 119.

Sufficient Record.—If the record says "A persentment for unlawful gaming against J. T.," it is sufficient. Com. v. Tiernan, 4 Gratt. 545.

Variance—Between Presentment and Proof.—On a presentment for gaming, the defendant was charged with the offence committed at the booth of Price Skinner. The proof was of gaming at the booth of Clarke, the said Skinner having no right, interest, or agency in the booth; this proof is insufficient to support the charge. Com. v. Butts, 2 Va. Cas. 18.

Duplicity.—A presentment for unlawful gaming by playing at cards, and betting on the sides and hands of those that then and there did play, is not objectionable for duplicity. Com. v. Tiernan, 4 Gratt. 545.

De Facto Clerk—Effect.—If upon a presentment for gaming, the defendant pleads in abatement, that the clerk de facto, who administered the oath to the grand jury that made the presentment, is not clerk de jure at the time, the plea is naught. Hord v. Com., 4 Leigh 674.

C. INDICTMENT FOR GAMING.

1. IN GENERAL.

Mere Formal Defects.—Under § 4011 of the Va. Code of 1887, which provides that no exception shall be allowed for any defect or want of form in an indictment under the gaming act, but the court shall give judgment thereon according to the very right of the case, objections that the record did not set forth the appointment and oath of the foreman, and that the names of the witnesses upon whose evidence the indictment was found, were not written at the foot of the indictment, were held properly overruled. Lawrence v. Com., 86 Va. 575, 10 S. E. Rep. 840.

Following Language of Statute.—An indictment which follows the language of the statute is sufficient in most cases, and such rule may be laid down as specially applicable to the subject under discussion. Leath v. Com., 32 Gratt. 873.

Indictment Charging Several Acts.—An indictment under the statute, Code of 1873, ch. 194, § 1, for gaming pursues the language of the statute, except that it uses the word "and" in place of "or," thus charging the accused with exhibiting all the games mentioned in said statute. This is correct. It charges but one offence, and is supported by proof of the keeping or exhibiting of any one of the games or tables mentioned, and on conviction there would be but one fine, and one term of imprisonment. Leath v. Com., 32 Gratt. 873.

Joint Indictment.—Two or more persons may be jointly indicted for gaming. State v. Snider, 34 W. Va. 83, 11 S. E. Rep. 742.

So where an indictment was against two defendants jointly, and alleged that they "did unlawfully wager and bet $50 in money" on an election for presidential electors, yet did not allege that they bet with another person, and name that person: nor did it say that they bet with each other, nevertheless the court held, that in common speech and understanding, when we say that A and B bet on an election and other things we mean that they bet with each other, the one against the other, and that the plain import of the charge in the indictment was that they bet with each other; that it would be very technical to overrule the indictment on this ground. State v. Griggs, 34 W. Va. 78, 11 S. E. Rep. 740.

And where an indictment was for three different offences against different persons, viz.: one for exhibiting a faro bank by one of the accused; one for playing at such bank by the other two accused, and one for knowingly suffering such conduct in his house by another accused, it was held good and sufficient in law. Com. v. McGuire, 1 Va. Cas. 119.

2. NECESSARY ALLEGATIONS AND SUFFICIENCY OF SAME.

As to Jurisdiction.—An indictment for gaming under the statute, Va. Code of 1873, ch. 194, § 1, charged the offence to have been committed in the city of Richmond and within the jurisdiction of the court. Such allegation is sufficiently certain. This is not a case in which place enters into the offence: it is an offence without regard to the particular house, building, or other particular locality where it is committed. Leath v. Com., 32 Gratt. 873.

Alleging Place.—Where the element of the offence consists in playing cards at a public place, the indictment should show that the place at which the game was carried on was a public place or partook of such nature. Hord v. Com., 4 Leigh 674; Roberts v. Com., 10 Leigh 686; Bishop v. Com., 13 Gratt. 785.

Public Resort Alleged.—But if the indictment charges that unlawful gaming is carried on at a house of public resort, it is good. Wortham v. Com., 5 Rand. 669.

And an indictment charging that the defendant "on the 10th day of February, 1827, unlawfully did game by playing a game called faro, a game played with cards, at a house of public resort called the Chocolate House, on 12th street in the said city of Richmond," is good. Wortham v. Com., 5 Rand. 669.

"House of Entertainment."—So an indictment charging the defendant with unlawful gaming at the house of J. N., the same being a house of entertainment, is sufficient. Linkous v. Com., 9 Leigh 608.

Needless Allegations—Purpose of Gaming.—It was objected to an indictment for gaming that the indictment did not charge that the games or tables were exhibited for gain. The court said: "It is a sufficient answer, that the indictment follows the language of the statute, and further charges that the accused did unlawfully keep and exhibit," etc. Leath v. Com., 32 Gratt. 873.

3. PROCEDURE.

Proof Necessary to Support Indictment.—An indictment against a tavern keeper, for suffering the game of loo to be played in his tavern by certain persons named, will be supported by proof of his having suffered that game to be played therein, though by other persons than those named in the indictment. Com. v. Price, 8 Leigh 757.

And an indictment for playing at cards at a public place, may be sustained by proof that the party bet at faro at the time and place stated in the indictment. Gibboney v. Com., 14 Gratt. 582.

However, if an indictment for gaming charges defendant with unlawful playing with cards, to wit, at the game of all fours, of loo, and of whist, at a public place, to wit, at the store house of G. H. & Co.; in order to convict the defendant, it is incumbent on the prosecutor to prove, that he played at some one of the games specified in the indictment. Windsor v. Com., 4 Leigh 680.

When Judgment for Revocation of License Proper.—And on conviction of a tavern keeper upon an indictment for permitting unlawful gaming in his tavern, judgment cannot be rendered for revocation of defendant's license, acquired since the commission of the offence. Com. v. Price, 8 Leigh 757.

Rule When Demurrer to Indictment is Overruled.—Upon a demurrer to an indictment for unlawful gaming being overruled, the defendant cannot have leave to plead not guilty without offering to withdraw his demurrer; the court may, in its discretion, give him leave to withdraw his demurrer and to plead; but if he does not withdraw his demurrer and obtain leave to plead, judgment should be given for the fine and costs, not that the defendant shall answer over. Com. v. Foggy, 6 Leigh 638.

XXXIV. HOUSE OF ILL-FAME.

The first count on an indictment, under sec. 10, ch. 149, Code 1891, charged that the defendant, on the 6th day of May 1895, in the city of Wheeling, did unlawfully, willfully and knowingly let a certain house there situated, describing it by street, number, etc., to a certain person, giving the name, with the intent that the said person keep the same as a common bawdy house and house of ill-fame, and that the said Georgia Frank afterwards used and kept the said house as a house of ill-fame, etc. Held, every material fact necessary to be proved to support a conviction seemed to be plainly alleged, with due specifications of time, place, persons, etc., so that the demurrer was properly overruled. State v. Emblem, 44 W. Va. 521, 29 S. E. Rep. 1031.

XXXV. INCEST.

Statutory Crime—Indictment Follows Statute.—The crime of incest being statutory, in drafting indictments therefor, it is both sufficient and necessary to follow the language of the statute. State v. Pennington, 41 W. Va. 599, 23 S. E. Rep. 918.

Averment of Intermarriage.—In the case of Hutchins v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 331, William Tankersly and Nancy Hutchins were jointly indicted, the indictment charging that the said "William unlawfully, willingly and incestuously did intermarry with, and take to wife a certain Nancy Hutchins, the niece of said William, and that the said William and Nancy then and there from, etc., to etc., did willingly, unlawfully and incestuously continue to cohabit and live together as man and wife, against," etc. Both were convicted, and upon a writ of error, it was objected that the indictment was bad, because it did not in terms allege that she had intermarried with said William; the court held the indictment good, "because it was impossible for him to intermarry with her unless she also intermarried with him, and that as the said indictment was in the very words of the statute, it was therefore sufficiently certain," and affirmed the judgment.

Averring Knowledge of Relationship.—In an indictment for incest under section 22, ch. 149 of W. Va. Code of 1891, it is not necessary to allege that the accused knew the relationship of the woman to him. State v. Pennington, 41 W. Va. 599, 23 S. E. Rep. 918.

Imperfect Statement of Date Cured by Statute of Jeofails.—Likewise, under § 10, ch. 158, W. Va. Code of 1891, which provides that no indictment shall be held invalid for omitting to state or stating imperfectly the time at which the offence was committed when time is not the essence of the offence, a statement in an indictment for incest that the offence was committed "on the 18th day of August, July, 1894," was held not to invalidate the indictment. State v. Pennington, 41 W. Va. 599, 23 S. E. Rep. 918.

Name of Particeps.—It was objected to an indictment for incest that while it alleged that the woman was the daughter of the defendant's brother, the name of that brother was not specified. But the court held the objection not to be a good one, because the indictment was sufficiently certain and definite in pointing out the particular person with whom the offence was committed, and that while she might be a person of that name, and daughter of one not a brother; if such be the case, the defendant could prove that as a defence. State v. Pennington, 41 W. Va. 599, 23 S. E. Rep. 918.

XXXVI. INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

A. IN GENERAL.

Caption.—Though the name of the county be left blank in the margin of an indictment for misdemeanor, it is enough if the county be stated in the body of the indictment. Tefft v. Com., 8 Leigh 721.

Liability under General Revenue Laws.—In the county where the "local option law" (Va. Code 1887, ch. 25), has been adopted, the sale of liquor without license is none the less liable to prosecution as a violation of the general revenue laws. Webster v. Com., 89 Va. 154, 15 S. E. Rep. 513.

Selling Liquor without a License—Averment.—An information under the 3d section of the act of March 3d, 1840, must contain an averment that the person selling had not a license and certificate to sell spirituous liquors. Likewise as to an indictment under the 17th section of the act. Com. v. Hampton, 3 Gratt. 590.

Misdescription of Defendant.—A presentment for selling ardent spirits by retail to be drank at the place where sold, without having first obtained a license to keep an ordinary, described the defendant as a free negro. For this offence, white persons, Indians, and free negroes were prosecuted and punished in the same manner. Held, a plea that defendant is an Indian and not a free negro, is an immaterial plea, and was properly excluded. Commonwealth v. Scott, 10 Gratt. 749.

And such a plea if good, would be too late after pleading to issue. Commonwealth v. Scott, 10 Gratt. 749.

Record Entry of Indictment.—The record entry of the finding of the indictment is as follows: "The grand jury returned into court having found the following indictment:

"The State (No. 1) v. Michael Gilmore. } Indictment for selling intoxicating liquors to a minor.

"A True Bill.

"P. S. MINSHALL, Foreman."

Held, that the record entry of the finding of the indictment was sufficient. State v. Gilmore, 9 W. Va. 641.

And when, in an indictment it is alleged that a person without having a state license therefor, sold, and offered and exposed for sale, at retail, spirituous liquors and other drinks, and it appears by the record that an indictment for unlawfully retailing was presented, the record of the finding is sufficient. State v. Fitzpatrick, 8 W. Va. 707. See also, State v. Chapman, 25 W. Va. 408; Crookham v. The State, 5 W. Va. 510; Tefft v. Com., 8 Leigh 721; Thompson's Case, 20 Gratt. 724; State v. Gilmore, 9 W. Va. 641.

Venue—Act Must Be Done Where Laid.—No conviction can be had upon an indictment for the sale of liquor without license where the evidence fails to show that the offence was committed in the county and magisterial district wherein the indictment laid the venue. Richardson's Case, 80 Va. 124; Savage v. Com., 84 Va. 584, 5 S. E. Rep. 563.

Charging Sale to Two Persons.—An indictment for selling ardent spirits without a license, may charge the sale to two persons. Peer's Case, 5 Gratt. 674. And the retailing to two distinct persons, at the same time and place, constitutes two separate and distinct offences, and not one offence only. Com. v. Dove, 2 Va. Cas. 26.

However, it is not necessary in an information for retailing spirituous liquors without a license, to name the persons to whom the liquors were sold. Com. v. Dove, 2 Va. Cas. 26.

Charge in Disjunctive or Conjunctive.—And it is not error to charge the offence of selling spirituous liquors, wines, etc., without a license, in the disjunctive instead of the conjunctive, by using the word "or" in lieu of "and," in describing the various kinds of liquors and drinks charged in the indictment to have been sold without a license. Cunningham v. State, 5 W. Va. 508; Morgan v. Com., 7 Gratt. 592; Thomas v. Com., 90 Va. 92, 17 S. E. Rep. 788.

Indictment for Selling Spirituous Liquors Vlam.—A man, dealing in spirituous liquors in Wood county, went over into Taylor county and solicited orders there. The whiskey to fill these orders was shipped in jugs by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, being delivered by the seller in Wood county, to an express agent for transportation to the purchasers in Taylor county. They received the whiskey in Taylor county and paid the express charges. Subsequently the seller while on a visit to said county of Taylor, collected of these parties the price, which had been agreed upon for his whiskey. It was held that the seller could not be indicted in Taylor county for selling spirituous liquors without license, as on this state of facts the sales were made in Wood county, when the jugs of whiskey were delivered to the express agent. Until then there was only an executory contract for the sale of the whiskey. State v. Hughes, 22 W. Va. 743.

Duplicity.—An indictment charging that defendant, on a certain date between 12 o'clock Saturday night and sunrise of the succeeding Monday morning, permitted his barroom to be open, and then and there sold intoxicating liquors, charges but a single offence under Va. Code 1887, § 3804, declaring that within such hours no barroom should be opened, and that no intoxicating liquors should be sold in any barroom, but it is enough to prove either an opening or the selling. Morganstern v. Com., 94 Va. 787, 26 S. E. Rep. 402.

However, where an indictment charged that the defendant on a certain day, and without having first secured the proper authority according to law, did "at his store house and dwelling house, in Pennsboro, in said county" sell and offer to sell by retail, spirituous liquors, etc., it was held, on motion to quash, that it was not intended to charge two distinct sales at different places, but rather to describe the store and dwelling house as constituting one building and one and the same place: and, therefore, there were not two distinct offences charged in the same count. Conley v. State, 5 W. Va. 522. But under Va. Code 1887, a single sale of liquor without a license is a violation, as the law is not limited to persons engaged in carrying on the traffic; and if an indictment under this section should contain ten counts each charging a sale to a different person, which constitutes separate and distinct offences, a demurrer to the same will be overruled and properly so. Lewis v. Com., 90 Va. 843, 20 S. E. Rep. 777.

Immaterial Statement.—In Com. v. Scott, 10 Gratt. 749, the presentment described the defendant as a free negro; the prosecution being for selling ardent spirits under the Va. Acts of 1852, ch. 66, § 23; as for this offence, white persons, Indians and free negroes are to be prosecuted and punished in the same manner, and a plea that the defendant is an Indian and not a free negro is an immaterial plea, and was properly excluded.

Uncertainty in Charge.—And an indictment for selling without license intoxicating liquors to be drank where sold, uses the language of the 1st section of chapter 99, of W. Va. Acts, 1872-73, creating the offence, charging that the defendant, at a given place in the county, on a given day, did sell to a certain person, naming him, intoxicating liquors to be drank in, upon or about the building or premises where sold, without first obtaining a state license therefor according to law. Upon demurrer this indictment was held to be fatally defective, for uncertainty, in charging that the liquor was to be drank either in the building or upon the premises. State v. Charlton, 11 W. Va. 332.

Variance—What Not Deemed a Variance.—Where an indictment describes a prescription as stating that the liquor is absolutely necessary as a medicine, whereas the prescription states that the physician believes it to be so necessary, there is no variance between the indictment and evidence because of the word "believe" in the prescription. State v. Berkeley, 41 W. Va. 455, 23 S. E. Rep. 608.

When Not Material.—And at the trial of an indictment for retailing ardent spirits without license, "to persons to the jurors unknown," the defendant offered proof that the persons to whom he sold the same were known to the grand jury at the time the indictment was found. The court held that this was not a material variance between the proof and the charge in the indictment; for it is not necessary in indictments for such offence to name the persons to whom the liquor was sold, and so the words "to persons to the jurors unknown" are surplusage. Hulstead v. Com., 5 Leigh 724.

When Judgment Will Not Be Reversed for Variance—Waiver.—If one be presented "for retailing spirituous liquors without license," and an information be thereafter filed against him for a breach of another law, viz.: for selling by retail divers articles of merchandise of foreign growth, and manufacture," to which information the defendant pleaded "not guilty": and a trial was had, and a verdict and judgment; he having failed to take advantage of the variance in due time, cannot have the judgment reversed by the appellate court. Wells v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 333.

Surplusage.—The words "knowing the said Michael Toole to be a minor," in an indictment for selling ardent spirits contrary to the statute, may and should be regarded as immaterial, and as surplusage, at the trial. State v. Cain, 9 W. Va. 559.

However, where a defendant is indicted under the statute of March 7th, 1834 (Acts of 1833-34, ch. 3), for retailing ardent spirits without license, the charge that the spirits were to be drank at the place where sold, shows that the indictment is upon the 17th, not the 3d section of that statute, and such charge cannot be rejected as surplusage, but must be proved. Com. v. Coe, 9 Leigh 620.

Joint Indictment.—And two persons may be jointly indicted or proceeded against, by information, for retailing ardent spirits without a license. But upon conviction there should be a separate fine against each of $30. Com. v. Harris, 7 Gratt. 600.

Joinder of Offences.—A count under the 17th section of the act of March 7th, 1834 (Acts 1833-34, p. 7), and a count under the 3d section of the same act may be joined in the same indictment. And the omission in the counts of the words "and certificate" does not make them defective. Peer's Case, 5 Gratt. 674.

Charge of Sale to Two Persons.—An indictment for selling ardent spirits without a license, may charge the sale to two persons. Peer's Case, 5 Gratt. 674.

When Indictment Defective for Not Following Statute.—An indictment under the 3d section of the act of 1839-40, ch. 2, p. 5, is good, though it does not negative the exceptions and provisos contained in the 4th section. But it is not necessary to allege, in an indictment, that the defendant is not within the benefit of the provisos of the statute, though the purview should expressly notice them. Com. v. Hill, 5 Gratt. 682.

However, in an indictment under section 18, ch. 38, of the Va. Code 1849, p. 209, the words, "without having a license therefor according to law," are not equivalent to the words, "without paying such tax and obtaining such certificate as is prescribed by the 14th section," which are the words used in the statute; and the indictment is defective. But in an indictment under § 18, ch. 38 of the Va. Code 1849, p. 209, for retailing ardent spirits, the words, "not to be drank where sold," not being in the statute, need not be in the indictment. Com. v. Young, 15 Gratt. 664.

Sufficiency of Charge.—An indictment, for that H, late of, etc., without having a license therefor according to law, did, on, etc., at, etc., in said county, sell by retail, wine, etc., not to be drank where sold, against the statute, etc., and against the peace and dignity of the commonwealth, is a good indictment. Com. v. Hatcher, 6 Gratt. 667.

So the offence of retailing ardent spirits without license is sufficiently charged in an indictment alleging that the defendant sold by retail, without license, whiskey, brandy, and other liquors to the jurors unknown, to be drank at the place where sold. Tefft v. Com., 8 Leigh 721.

And it is sufficient where the record of the finding of an indictment for retailing ardent spirits without license, states that the grand jury presented an indictment against W. T., for retailing liquors, a true bill. Tefft v. Com., 8 Leigh 721.

Moreover, in an indictment for selling ardent spirits to slaves, it is not necessary to state the names of the owners of the slaves to whom the liquor was sold. Com. v. Smith, 1 Gratt. 553.

So where an indictment founded upon the 3d section of chapter 99, of the acts of the legislature of 1872-3, charging that C on the first day of December, A. D. 1873, in Wood county, unlawfully did sell intoxicating liquors to one Michael Toole, a minor under the age of twenty-one years, he, the said C, knowing the said Michael Toole to be a minor, and not having the written order of his parents, guardians or family physician therefor, contrary to the form of the statute in such case, made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state, the indictment was held good after verdict, upon a motion in arrest of judgment. State v. Cain, 9 W. Va. 559.

Same—Opening Barroom.—An indictment for a violation of sec. 3804 of Va. Code 1887, contained a single count which charged (1) opening of a barroom and (2) selling intoxicating liquors therein. This indictment was demurred to on the ground that a charge in the same count contained two separate and distinct offences. The opinion of the court was as follows: "The objection made to the indictment is not tenable. The count follows the language of the statute, and charges that the opening of the barroom and the sale of the liquors were done at the same time and place. Opening a barroom or other place where intoxicating liquors are sold during the time it is prohibited by the statute is in itself a criminal offence, and so is the sale of intoxicating liquors. If they are separately done on different occasions, they constitute separate and distinct offences; but when they are charged, as in this indictment, in the language of the statute, and as being done at the same time and place, they constitute together only one offence, and there can be but one punishment." Morganstern v. Com., 94 Va. 787, 26 S. E. Rep. 402.

Where the legislature, for the purpose of suppressing a vice or preventing a wrong, has, by statute, made the vice or wrong a criminal offence, and, in defining the offence, has specified a series of acts, either of which separately or all together may constitute an offence, and has prescribed, as here, the same penalty for the commission of one or all of the acts, it is well settled that the commission of any two or more of them may be alleged in the same count of an indictment, if conjunctively charged. Although each act by itself may constitute an offence under the statute, yet, if they are all committed by the same person at the same place, they are to be considered as parts of the same transaction, and collectively constitute a single offence. The reports abound with decisions sustaining indictments of this character. Leath's Case, 32 Gratt. 873; Tiernan's Case, 4 Gratt. 545; Rasnick v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 356; Angel v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 231; Morganstern v. Com., 94 Va. 787, 26 S. E. Rep. 402.

B. ALLEGATIONS.

Discrimination between Offence under a General Prohibitory Act and One Making the Offence an Injury to a Certain Person.—But it is not necessary in an information for retailing spirituous liquors without license, to name persons to whom liquors were sold. Commonwealth v. Dove, 2 Va. Cas. 26; Hulstead v. Com., 5 Leigh 724.

In the latter case it was decided that on a trial of an indictment for retailing spirits without license, charging that the sale was made "to persons to the jury unknown," proof that the persons were actually known to the jury, when it found the indictment, does not constitute a variance between the proof and the allegations of indictment, so as to defeat the prosecution. The offence of selling ardent spirits without license, is not an offence against a third person, but an offence against the revenue laws, and may be against the social order and public morals. It matters not to whom and to what person it is sold, therefore, the name of the person is immaterial to be stated. Morganstern v. Com., 27 Gratt. 1024.

But quite a different case is presented when the offence of retailing spirits constitutes an injury to a third person. Thus, in a prosecution for a violation of the statute making it a penal offence, if any person shall sell or barter or cause to be sold or bartered, or being a merchant or tradesman, or keeper of an eating-house or ordinary, shall directly or indirectly, give or furnish or dispose of, or shall permit to be sold or bartered or given or disposed of, by his clerk or agent or salesman, to any minor knowing him to be a minor, without the consent of his parents or guardian, any wine or ardent spirits or mixture thereof, etc., the indictment is for an offence which is injurious to a third person. Therefore if the indictment is for selling to a minor whose name is "unknown to the grand jury," and it appears from the evidence that in fact the name of the minor to whom the liquor was sold, was known to the grand jury, this would be a fatal variance. In order that an indictment under a statute of this nature may be sustained it is necessary that the name of the party to whom the sale was made should be set forth in the indictment. Jackson v. Com., 27 Gratt. 1018; Morganstern v. Com., 27 Gratt. 1018. See also, Va. Code 1887, § 3828, Pollard's Supp. (1900), § 3828.

Unnecessary to Allege That the District Voted against License.—Under Acts 1885-86, p. 259, § 5, it is not necessary that an indictment shall allege that the magisterial district, wherein the sale of ardent spirits occurs, voted against license—as the court takes judicial notice of such vote; nor that the liquor sold was the subject of license before the vote was taken; nor the time when the sale was made—as the time of sale is not of the essence of the offence. See Acts 1887-88, p. 325, §§ 11, 12; Savage v. Com., 84 Va. 582, 5 S. E. Rep. 563.

Not Necessary to State Facts Concerning Compensation.—And an indictment which charges that the defendant, on a day and time specified, kept an ordinary without obtaining a license to do so, is sufficient, without setting out the facts of his furnishing for compensation, lodging or diet, etc. Burner v. Com., 13 Gratt. 778.

When Necessary to Allege Sale by "Retail."—But an indictment for selling ardent spirits, to be drank where sold, must allege that the selling was by "retail." Boyle's Case, 14 Gratt. 674.

What It Is Necessary to State in an Indictment for Selling Liquor to Slaves.—However, in an indictment for selling ardent spirits to slaves, it is not necessary to state the names of the owners of the slaves to whom the liquor was sold. Commonwealth v. Smith & Burwell, 1 Gratt. 554.

Indictment under Moffett Liquor Law Not Stating Defendant Was "Licensed" Is Fatally Defective.—Nevertheless § 5, ch. 59, Acts 1878-79, requires a licensed retail or barroom liquor dealer to perform certain duties therein mentioned: and in the 10th section of the said act it is enacted that "any licensed retail or barroom liquor dealer, as well as his agent, servant, or bar keeper, for every failure to perform any of the duties required of such dealer in the provisions of the 5th section of the said act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor." In a prosecution under sec. 5 and 10 of the said act the indictment alleged that the principal was a "barroom keeper," and a "barroom-liquor dealer" but did not allege that he was "licensed" as such. On motion in arrest of judgment the indictment was held fatally defective, the court saying as follows: "No doubt the offence intended to be charged against the accused in this case was a misdemeanor defined by the tenth section of the said Moffett Liquor Law (ch. 59, Acts 1878-79). But by the express terms of the act such offence could only be committed by a 'licensed retail or barroom-liquor dealer,' or 'his agent, servant or barkeeper.' To bring the case, therefore, within the said terms, it ought to have been averred in the indictment, that the accused, when he committed the act with which he is charged, was a 'licensed retail or barroom-liquor dealer.' He may have committed that act without being guilty of any legal offence. To authorize a valid conviction of an offence, it must be sufficiently charged in the indictment or information." Glass v. Com., 33 Gratt. 827.

Moreover, if in a prosecution under §§ 5 and 10 of the "Moffett Liquor Law," the indictment alleges that the principal was a "barroom-keeper," and a "barroom-liquor dealer," but does not allege that he was "licensed" as such, the indictment will be held fatally defective. Glass v. Com., 33 Gratt. 827.

And in an indictment under Va. Code 1887, § 587, for a violation of the local option law reciting that the defendant at a certain time and place, "did unlawfully sell wine, spirituous liquors, malt liquors and mixtures thereof," is not bad because it fails to allege that the sale was without a license; or because it is not stated whether the sale was by wholesale or retail; or because it fails to state that the magisterial district had voted against the sale of liquors therein. Hargrave v. Com. (Va. 1895), 22 S. E. Rep. 314.

So an indictment under Acts 1889-90, p. 242, § 1, for selling liquor without license must definitely state the place where sold, but the exact time of the sale need not be stated nor need it be stated that the sale was "by sample, representation, or otherwise." Arrington v. Com., 87 Va. 96, 12 S. E. Rep. 224.

Unnecessary to Allege to Whom a Druggist Sells.—So, in an indictment against a druggist under the W. Va. Code 1888, chapter 32, section 5, as amended by the act of 1887, chapter 29, it is unnecessary to insert the name of the person to whom the liquor was sold. State v. Ferrell, 30 W. Va. 683, 5 S. E. Rep. 155; State v. Pendergast, 20 W. Va. 672.

Allegation as to Time, Place, and Kind of Liquor Sold.—In Savage v. Com., 84 Va. 582, 5 S. E. Rep. 563, an indictment charged that the defendant "on the ——— day of March, 1887, in the magisterial district of Lee, in the said county, did unlawfully sell intoxicating liquors to one John Johnson, against the peace and dignity of the commonwealth." It was contended for the plaintiff in error that the indictment was defective—first, because it did not charge that the offence was committed in a magisterial district which had voted against license: secondly, because it did not charge that the liquor sold was as such the subject of license under the statute before the vote on the question of license was taken; and thirdly, because it did not state the time certain at which the liquor was sold. On appeal the court said: "We are of opinion that these grounds of objection are untenable. It was not necessary to allege in the indictment that the magisterial district therein mentioned had voted against license, for that was a fact of which the court would take judicial notice. Nor was it necessary to allege that the liquor charged to have been sold was anything than merely intoxicating. The language of the statute is, that 'any person who shall sell intoxicating liquors within the limits of any magisterial district voting against license,' shall be punished, etc. Acts 1885-86, p. 259, § 5. The indictment follows the language of the statute, and no further averment on that point was necessary. Commonwealth v. Bennett, 108 Mass. 27. And the third and last objection is met by the provisions of the statute, which enacts, that 'no indictment or other accusation shall be quashed or deemed invalid for omitting * * to state, or stating imperfectly, the time at which the offence was committed, when time is not the essence of the offence.'" Acts 1887-88, p. 335, §§ 11, 12. But in Morgan v. Com., 90 Va. 80, 21 S. E. Rep. 826, an indictment for the unlawful sale of ardent spirits, charged that the offence was committed in a certain district where, under the local option law, "no license" prevailed. The evidence was that the defendant sold ardent spirits to witness in the county, but did not designate the district. The jury found the defendant "guilty as charged in the indictment." The defendant moved to set aside the verdict on the ground that the evidence did not show that the sale took place in the district designated, but at a place within a certain county, whether in the designated district or not does not appear. The appellate court held that the motion should have been allowed.

Allegation as to Place.—An indictment under section 16, chapter 32 of the W. Va. Code 1887, against a person having a license to sell spirituous liquors, for a sale to a minor, need not specify the particular place where the sale was made, or allege that the place where the sale was made was the place designated in the license as the place at which the license was to be exercised. State v. Boggess, 36 W. Va. 713, 15 S. E. Rep. 423; State v. Cottrill, 31 W. Va. 162, 6 S. E. Rep. 428.

However, as held in Virginia, an indictment for selling by retail, without license, ardent spirits, to be drank where sold, must set out the place in the county where the sale is made. It is not sufficient to state the place in the county. Com. v. Head, 11 Gratt. 819.

And, furthermore, an indictment under Acts 1889-90, p. 242, § 1, for selling liquor without license must definitely state the place where sold. Arrington v. Com., 87 Va. 96, 12 S. E. Rep. 224.

Facts Constituting One a Qualified Voter.—Under W. Va. Code 1891, chapter 5, section 10, relating to giving away or distributing liquors on election day, it was held in State v. Pearis, 35 W. Va. 320, 13 S. E. Rep. 1006, that if an indictment is based on this section of the statute, it being charged that the person to whom intoxicating drinks were given, was a legally qualified voter, it is not necessary to state the facts constituting such person a qualified voter.

Name of Purchaser.—And an indictment for selling spirituous liquors in violation of section 1, chapter 32, W. Va. Code 1891, is good, though it does not name the purchaser. State v. Chisnell, 36 W. Va. 659, 15 S. E. Rep. 412.

Necessity of Alleging Former Statutory Provisions.—An indictment founded upon a provision of the 3d section of ch. 99, of the W. Va. Acts 1872-73, is good, though it contain no allegations touching any of the provisions of the first and second sections of the chapter. State v. Cain, 9 W. Va. 559.

Alleging Scienter.—Nor is it necessary to allege a special criminal intent, but the scienter, or general criminal intent, that is, that the accused knowingly and willfully did the unlawful act, is sufficient. State v. Pearis, 35 W. Va. 320, 13 S. E. Rep. 1006.

C. PROCEDURE.

Evidence Admissible—Sufficiency of Proof.—Upon an indictment for retailing ardent spirits, specifying the precise quantity and the kind, to be drank where sold, without license, proof of retailing any quantity of any kind of ardent spirits to be drank where sold, is sufficient. Brock v. Com., 6 Leigh 634. See generally, Com. v. Nutter, 8 Gratt. 699.

Moreover, under an indictment for selling spirituous liquors without a license, the commonwealth may prove any offence against a statute by the defendant, within the prescribed time; and is not confined to proof of the particular offence which was brought to the notice of the grand jury, and upon proof of which they found the indictment. Loftus v. Com., 3 Gratt. 631.

And by introducing evidence to show a sale under an indictment of one count, the state does not make such a final election to rely on that sale as will preclude it from proving another to sustain its indictment; and it is not error for the court, in its discretion, to allow evidence of another sale. State v. Chisnell, 36 W. Va. 659, 15 S. E. Rep. 412.

Demurrer Sustained—Violation of Bond.—It is not error to sustain a demurrer to an indictment for the violation of the conditions of a bond required in order to obtain a license to sell spirituous liquors, when the indictment does not allege that the violation occurred at the place the liquors were to be sold under the license. State v. Church, 4 W. Va. 745.

XXXVII. JAILOR.

When Indictable.—An indictment against a jailor, for permitting a prisoner in his custody to have an instrument in his room with which he might break the jail and escape; and for failing carefully to examine at short intervals the condition of the jail, and what the prisoner was engaged at in said jail, in consequence of which the prisoner escaped, does not state an indictable offence. Com. v. Connell, 3 Gratt. 587.

But an indictment lies against a jailor, for negligently permitting a prisoner committed to his custody to escape. Commonwealth v. Connell, 3 Gratt. 588.

XXXVIII. LARCENY.

A. IN GENERAL.

When Stolen Goods Carried into Another County Indictment May Be in Either.—"All the writers on common law lay it down, that, if goods be stolen in one county, and carried into another, the offender may be indicted in either, because the offence is complete in both. If the original taking be felonious by the common law, the felon can acquire no color of right thereby, and every act of possession constitutes a felony. No principle in respect to larceny seems to be more clearly settled than this; and it has been repeatedly sanctioned in this state." Per MAY, J., in Com. v. Cousins, 2 Leigh 769 [709]. See also, Strouther v. Com., 92 Va. 789, 22 S. E. Rep. 852.

Stolen Goods Carried into Another Country.—This rule of the common law, however, was never extended further than to counties. It seems to be a question somewhat mooted, whether a thief who has stolen goods in one country and brought them into another, can in the latter country be punished for the theft of the goods, in the absence of statute. The preponderance of authority, however, holds that the offence is not punishable in the country in which the criminal seeks refuge and is found. Thus, an accused was indicted in Virginia for larceny of a horse in the county of Berkley, West Virginia. The charge was that the plaintiff on a certain day in the county of Berkley, in the state of West Virginia, did then and there feloniously, etc., carry away from the county of Berkley, etc., in the state of West Virginia, etc., and bring into the city of Winchester, etc., one iron gray horse, against the peace and dignity of the commonwealth of Virginia. The court held that: "Where goods were stolen in one country and brought by the thief to another country, the latter country, by the English common law, had no jurisdiction to try the offence." Strouther's Case, 92 Va. 789, 22 S. E. Rep. 852. The court cited as authority for this proposition, Whart. Cr. Law (9th Ed.) § 291; Stanley v. State, 24 Ohio St. 166; Com. v. Uprichard, 2 Gray (Mass.) 434.

In this connection it will not be improper to observe § 3890, of the Va. Code 1887, which provides that: "Prosecution for offences committed wholly or in part without, and made punishable within, this state, may be in any county or corporation in which the offender is found, or to which he is sent by any judge, justice or court." At first glance this statute may seem to give jurisdiction to Virginia courts to try an offender against the laws of another state, if found in this state, provided the act done would have constituted an offence against the laws of Virginia had it been committed within her borders. This construction is probably not such as to give the statute its true meaning, consequently not a correct interpretation of the legislative intent. The true construction would seem to be, that the statute includes within its purview only such acts as constitute, when committed, a crime against the sovereignty of the state, either because the common law pronounces it such, or else, for the reason that it has so been declared by statute. Consequently, the mere fact that the laws of separate and independent jurisdictions, by chance, coincide in declaring that similar acts shall constitute a certain offence, with like results, if committed within the bounds of the state enacting or enforcing such law, would not, it is believed, bring such acts within the purview of a statute of like import as the one above quoted (Va. Code 1887, § 3890). So far as ascertained the Virginia court has not directly construed the above statute in reference to the particular point under discussion, although in the Strouther Case, 92 Va. 789, 22 S. E. Rep. 852, support is indirectly given to the construction contended for. The facts in this case, which have elsewhere been more fully given, furnish an excellent illustration for the application of this principle, and will be in part repeated. Strouther was charged with larceny of a horse in West Virginia, and upon being found with the property in the city of Winchester, Virginia, was arrested, indicted and tried for the offence in the corporation court of the city of Winchester. On appeal it was held that, Virginia had no jurisdiction to try the prisoner. Section 3890 was in force when the Strouther case was decided, but it was neither passed upon nor referred to in the opinion, nor, as it appears, was it relied upon by counsel, which was entirely proper if the construction contended for, is the true one. The offence was at common law punishable either in the county where the act was committed, or in the county where the prisoner was found, provided both counties were in the same state or sovereignty,—this for the reason that both counties were under a common jurisdiction.—the sovereign state of which they formed a part. But as between different sovereign states, the jurisdiction was clear cut and defined, and the crime of larceny committed in one, was not deemed an offence against the sovereign within whose bounds the thief sought refuge. Such is the status of most other common-law offences. This rule is changeable at the will of the legislature, which body may abrogate it wholly, or in part, as it has done in some instances, viz: § 3067, punishing one who strikes or poisons another in this state, by reason of which such stricken or poisoned person dies within another state; or §§ 3683-4, punishing those who by agreement leave this state and go into another state and engage in a duel. In the absence of these and other statutory or constitutional provisions, making acts done without the state, crimes against this sovereignty, which were not such at common law, acts done in another jurisdiction are not, it would seem, properly cognizable in Virginia under the Va. Code 1887, § 3890.

Articles Belonging to Different Owners.—Where several articles are stolen at one time and place, the stealing is regarded as one transaction and may be charged in a single count, though the articles belong to different persons. Alexander v. Commonwealth, 90 Va. 809, 20 S. E. Rep. 782.

Conviction of Larceny on Indictment for Housebreaking.—Housebreaking with intent to commit larceny, and grand larceny, are different offences and to each is affixed its own penalty, but they may be, and often are, one continued act, and may be charged in the same count of an indictment. Upon such count the accused may be found guilty of either or both offences, but there can be only one penalty imposed. If it is desired to punish for both offences, in a case of this kind, a separate count for larceny must be inserted in the indictment. If there is a conviction generally, or of the grand larceny only, and it is submitted to, in either case, this is a bar to further prosecution. Benton v. Com., 91 Va. 782, 21 S. E. Rep. 495.

Former Conviction or Second Offence.—An indictment for petit larceny, which proceeds to charge that the person indicted had been previously indicted, tried and sentenced for another petit larceny, is an indictment for a felony. Rider v. Com., 16 Gratt. 499; Pryor v. Com. (Va.), 26 S. E. Rep. 864.

Triable in County Court.—An indictment for petit larceny alleging that the prisoner has been twice before convicted of a like offence is triable in the county court. Pryor v. Com. (Va.), 26 S. E. Rep. 864; Rider v. Com., 16 Gratt. 499.

And this is true of an indictment containing two substantially similar counts, one of which, because of formal defects, charges only a misdemeanor. Pryor v. Com. (Va.), 26 S. E. Rep. 864.

B. THE INDICTMENT.

1. IN GENERAL.

Statutory and Common-Law Offences.—Where, under statute, larceny may be committed in several ways, some of which would not constitute the offence at common law, it is not necessary that the indictment should inform the accused in which of the ways he is charged, and an indictment in common-law form will be good for a statutory larceny not existing at common law. Anable v. Com., 24 Gratt. 563; Dowdy v. Com., 9 Gratt. 727; Leftwich v. Com., 20 Gratt. 716; Price v. Com., 21 Gratt. 846; State v. Halida, 28 W. Va. 503; Fay v. Com., 28 Gratt. 912. In the last-named case it was said that in a prosecution for obtaining money under false pretenses which is mere larceny by statute, where the indictment is for larceny, to sustain the prosecution the commonwealth must prove every fact which would be required to be alleged in an indictment for obtaining money under false pretenses. That in such an indictment it would be a material allegation that the money was obtained by the false pretenses alleged, and therefore it is necessary to be proved under the indictment for larceny in order for a conviction.

However, it is absolutely necessary in an indictment for larceny, to state in whom the property is, and the proof must correspond with the allegation. Mabry v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 396.

And in indictments where the thing stolen is alleged to be the property of a corporate body by name, it is not necessaryto aver the political existence of the corporation. Its existence is a matter of evidence, and, after verdict it is inferred from its corporate name. Thus, where an indictment alleged that the notes and dollars charged to have been stolen, were the property and effects of the "President, Directors and Company of the Farmers of Virginia." After verdict, the court is bound to presume, that on the trial, the capacity of this company to hold property, that is, their corporate existence, was proved to the jury, or admitted by the prisoner: for, it is quite clear,that he might have exacted this proof and if it was not given, he must have been acquitted on the count. Lithgow v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 297.

If a person be examined for stealing three bags of cotton, "of the goods and chattels of Nathaniel Land," he may be indicted in two counts for stealing three bags of cotton, first of the goods and chattels of N. L.; secondly, of the goods and chattels of a person unknown. And he may be convicted and sentenced on the second count, and acquitted of the first. Lithgow v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 297.

Charging the Offence—Common-Law Form Not Indispensable.—An indictment under § 49, ch. 192, of Va. Code 1860, contained three counts, in each of which the offence was set out specially, and not in general terms, as in the case of a larceny at common law. The prisoner was convicted and sentenced for three years in the penitentiary under the said indictment. He contended in the appellate court that the counts of the indictment ought to have been quashed, because they were not in form as for larceny at common law, and did not allege the stealing, taking and carrying away of a subject of larceny. It was decided by the court that it certainly would have been competent for the pleader to have counted as for a larceny of the subject in the form of an indictment for larceny at common law, and proof of the special facts set down in the act as constituting the offence, would have sustained the charge. Dowdy v. Com., 9 Gratt. 727, 734. But it is also competent for the pleader, instead of counting for a larceny of the subject in the form of an indictment for larceny at common law, to charge the specific fact which the act declares shall be deemed larceny. The legal conclusion deducible from these facts is drawn by the act itself, and need not, of necessity, be drawn in the indictment. Leftwich v. Com., 20 Gratt. 716.

Larceny Must Be Properly Laid.—In an indictment for larceny, the charge of larceny must be laid in proper form in order to convict of that offence, if the prisoner should be acquitted of the charge of burglary. State v. McClung, 35 W. Va. 283, 13 S. E. Rep. 654.

Proof Which May Sustain Indictment.—Larceny may be sustained by proof that the property was obtained by false pretenses. Thus, in Fay v. Com., 28 Gratt. 912, a person was indicted for the larceny of certain notes of United States currency. The proofs referred to the prisoner obtaining the money from the owner by false pretenses. To sustain the prosecution it was necessary for the commonwealth to prove 'every fact which would be required to be alleged in an indictment for obtaining money on false pretenses. Therefore it would be a material allegation that the money was obtained by the false pretense alleged; consequently, it is necessary to be proved under the indictment for larceny in order to a conviction. This case is cited in Pitsnogle's Case, 91 Va. 811, 22 S. E. Rep. 351, to support the proposition that on an indictment for larceny, proof of embezzlement is sufficient to sustain the charge. See also, Shinn's Case, 32 Gratt. 899, and note. In State v. Halida, 28 W. Va. 503, the court says: "Both counts in the indictment are good as counts for simple larceny. It is therefore not important whether or not the first count is also good as an indictment for obtaining the mule under false pretenses, because under the decisions above cited, all the evidence which could be introduced to sustain an indictment for obtaining the mule by false pretenses can also be introduced in support of an indictment for simple larceny, the legal offence as well as the punishment in both cases being precisely the same," citing Fay v. Com., 28 Gratt. 912, and Dull's Case, 25 Gratt. 965. See also, Anable's Case, 24 Gratt. 563; Leftwich's Case, 20 Gratt. 716; Dowdy's Case, 9 Gratt. 727; State v. Reece, 27 W. Va. 375.

Moreover, as held in State v. Halida, 28 W. Va. 499, upon an indictment for simple larceny, the state may convict by proving, either that the subject of the larceny was received with a knowledge that it was stolen, or that it was obtained by a false token or false pretense.

General and Special Ownership.—"There is no doubt that there may be a sufficient ownership of the goods stolen in a person who has only a special property in them; and that they may be laid as the goods and chattels of such person in the indictment. A lessee for years, a bailee, a pawnee, a carrier and the like have such special property; and the indictment will be good, if it lay the property of the goods either in the real owners, or in the person having only such special property in them." Russell on Crimes, vol. 2, p. 288, quoted with approval in State v. Heaton, 23 W. Va. 773. See Minor's Syn. Cr. Law 168.

And if a horse is owned by one who dies intestate leaving a widow and infant children, and no administrator has qualified on the estate of the decedent, and the horse remains on the farm of the decedent; and there has been no sale or distribution of the decedent's estate, but the horse as well as the children remain on the farm under the control of the widow, and while so under her control the horse is stolen, it may properly be described in an indictment for such stealing as the property of the widow. State v. Heaton, 23 W. Va. 773.

Owner a Married Woman.—But in an indictment for larceny, the name of the owner of the property charged to have been stolen, must be stated; and if it appears that the person so stated to be the owner was a married woman at the time of larceny, it is error and the prisoner should be acquitted. Hughes v. Com., 17 Gratt. 565.

Equivalent Words.—Va. Code, sec. 3712, makes it larceny to "fraudulently" dispose of or receive goods with intent to defeat a distress or levy made thereon. It is held, that an indictment framed on the language of the statute, which charges that the goods were "unlawfully and injuriously" disposed of, without alleging that it was "fraudulently" done, is sufficient. Duff v. Com., 92 Va. 769, 23 S. E. Rep. 643.

Conclusion—An Indictment for Horse Stealing Need Not Conclude Contra Formam Statuti.—Indictments for horse stealing need not conclude contra formam statuti: and even if it were proper that they should, the omission would be cured by the statute of jeofails. Chiles v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 260.

2. SPECIFIC ALLEGATIONS AND DESCRIPTIONS.

Ownership.—In an indictment for larceny, the name of the owner of the property charged to have been stolen, must be stated. Hughes v. Com., 17 Gratt. 565; Alexander v. Com., 90 Va. 811, 20 S. E. Rep. 782.

Want of Owner's Consent.—Nevertheless, an indictment under the statute, 1 Rev. Code ch. 111, sec. 30, for feloniously and fraudulently taking and removing a slave from one county to another, with intent to defraud the owner and deprive him of his property, is fatally defective, after verdict, for want of an averment, that the slave was so taken and removed without the consent of the owner. Com. v. Peas, 2 Gratt. 629.

However, three beehives to the value of five dollars, and three swarms of bees, to the value of three dollars, and forty pounds of honey, to the value of five dollars, with an allegation of ownership, was held to be good after verdict, it being taken by intendment that the bees were reclaimed and that the honey was the property of the alleged owner. Harvey v. Com., 23 Gratt. 941.

Possession.—But in larceny, at common law, the indictment need not charge that the goods were stolen from the possession of the owner, or of any other person. Thompson v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 135. As was said in Angel v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 228, in an indictment for the larceny of bank notes under the statute of 1819, it is not necessary that it should charge that the stealing was from the possession of any one.

The Intent—Felonious Intent.—In an indictment for stealing under Act of 1806, it should be charged that the goods were feloniously stolen, although by the act it is not denominated a felony; and this error is not cured by the statute of criminal jeofails. Barker v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 122.

And it was said in Wolverton v. Com., 75 Va. 911, that a felonious intent is an essential ingredient in the crime of larceny whether grand or petit and distinguishes it from a mere trespass.

Description of Property.—An indictment charged the stealing of "one lot of queen's ware" without further description. It was objected that the prisoner could not, if subsequently indicted for stealing the specific articles comprised in the said "lot of queen's ware" avail himself of the plea of former conviction in the case. The court held that the description of the goods stolen as "a lot of queen's ware" is sufficient after verdict. And that upon a subsequent indictment for stealing the specific articles embraced in the "lot of queen's ware," the prisoner would not lose the benefit of the plea of former conviction because he would have the right to establish the identity of the articles by proof. 3 Greenleaf Evidence, sec. 36; 2 Leading Criminal Cases 500-556; Vaughan v. Com., 17 Gratt. 578.

Value—Rule at Common Law.—At common law no rule of criminal pleadings was better established than that which required that in indictments for larceny the value of the property should be stated. The reason of the rule was to distinguish between grand and petit larceny. This rule applied to every species of property, to bank notes and other money as well as to other property. And before a party could be convicted of grand larceny, it was necessary to charge and prove the value of the thing stolen to be at least of that amount which the law makes grand larceny. But it is competent for the legislature to modify these rules and to declare what shall constitute grand larceny without respect to the value of the thing stolen; and what shall be deemed the value of certain specified property irrespective of its real value. Adams v. Com., 23 Gratt. 949.

Statutory Offence—Value Disregarded, but Not Ownership.—And in an indictment for stealing bank notes, it is sufficient to state that the notes were for a certain sum of money, without stating their value, under the act, Code of 1860, ch. 194, sec. 15-16. Adams v. Com., 23 Gratt. 949.

However, if the indictment for stealing bank notes does not charge that they are the bank notes of, or belong to, some person or persons by name, or of, or to, some person, to the jurors unknown, the defect is fatal, and is not cured by the statute of jeofails. Barker v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 122.

Price Equivalent to Value.—But an indictment under sec. 14, ch. 145, W. Va. Code 1887, which charges the accused with the larceny of "one gelding horse, of the price of $100," instead of one gelding horse of the value of $100, according to the words of the statute, is sufficient. The word "price," as used here, is equivalent to the word "value," used in the statute. State v. Sparks, 30 W. Va. 101, 3 S. E. Rep. 40.

Sufficiency of Description—Allegation or Charge, Description—Bees Described as "Goods and Chattels."—Three swarms of bees were described to be of the goods and chattels of one Vincent Shelton; this was held to be, in effect, an averment, that when stolen they were his property and in his possession. Harvey v. Com., 23 Gratt. 943.

Same—Bank Note.—So a description of a bank note which merely states that they were bank notes current within the United States, was held sufficient. Com. v. Moseley, 2 Va. Cas. 154.

Same—Description of Money.—In an indictment under § 49, ch. 192, Va. Code of 1860, for obtaining money upon a false pretense, it is not sufficient to describe it as "ninety dollars in United States currency"; because "United States currency" may be gold, or silver, or treasury notes, or bank notes. Proof that any of these subjects were obtained by the false pretense alleged would be perfectly consistent with the indictment, which, therefore, is too vague. It ought to show what kind of United States currency was obtained. Leftwich v. Com., 20 Gratt. 716.

Same—Writings and Papers.—In an indictment under the statute making writings and papers of value the subject of larceny, a description of the papers by the name and designation by which they are usually known, and which properly avers the value thereof is sufficient. Fredrick v. State, 3 W. Va. 695.

But an indictment charging the prisoner with stealing certain papers of the value of $110, yet not otherwise describing the papers charged to have been stolen, is fatally defective. Robinson v. Com., 32 Gratt. 866.

Same—Check.—In Whalen v. Com., 90 Va. 544, 19 S. E. Rep. 182, an indictment charged the larceny of divers United States treasury and national bank notes, and also "one paper purporting to be a check for the payment of one hundred and twenty-five dollars, of the value of one hundred and twenty-five dollars, the goods and chattels of one H. A. Ricketts, then and there being upon the person of the said Ricketts." It was contended that the description of the check was vague and indefinite, and especially because there was no allegation that any part of it remained due and unsatisfied at the time of the alleged larceny. The court held this objection to be untenable, giving as a reason for their position that the offence of stealing the check, or promissory note, or anything of that sort is altogether statutory, being made a crime by section 3708 of the Code of 1887; that it is laid down as a well established rule that where a statute, simple, and in terms not limited, makes indictable the larceny of "any promissory note," it is adequate to say "one promissory note for the payment of, etc., of the value of," etc.: that section 3709 of Code 1887 which provides that in a prosecution like the present the money due on or secured by the writing in question, "and remaining unsatisfied," shall be deemed to be the value of the article stolen, merely prescribes a rule for estimating the value of the paper, and is not a part of the necessary description, although the words "remaining unsatisfied" are usually in the indictment in such cases.

Allegation.

Specific Designation of Owner.—Where the larceny of several articles belonging to different owners was charged in one count of an indictment, and the ownership of each article specifically set forth, the indictment was held good. Alexander v. Com., 90 Va. 811, 20 S. E. Rep. 782.

Bank Notes—Averment as to Property.—So an indictment which charges a larceny of bank notes "of the money, goods and chattels of one G. F. and from the said G. F.," is a sufficient averment of property in the said notes in G. F., the person from whom they were stolen after verdict. Com. v. Moseley, 2 Va. Cas. 154.

Housebreaking—Theft.—And in an indictment charging the prisoner with breaking and entering in the nighttime the shop of Hugh F. Lyle, "then and there being found," and with stealing certain articles "then and there being found," it was objected that the articles alleged to be stolen were not described as the property of any person. It was held that the allegation that the prisoner broke and entered the shop with intent to steal the goods of Lyle "then and there being found" and that he "then and there stole the goods described," is a sufficient averment after verdict that the goods stolen were the property of Lyle. Vaughan v. Com., 17 Gratt. 578.

Slave—Larceny—From Whose Possession Stolen.—However, in an indictment for larceny of a slave, the goods and chattels of one A, and out of the possession of the said A, is bad, if the slave was hired for the year to B and was in B's actual possession at the time of the larceny. Com. v. Williams, 1 Va. Cas. 14.

Moreover, an indictment under sec. 3712, Va. Code of 1887, making it larceny to "fraudulently remove, destroy, receive or secrete goods and chattels that have been distrained or levied on, with intent to defeat such distress or levy," framed in the language of the statute, which charges that they were "unlawfully and injuriously" disposed of, without alleging that it was "fraudulently" done, is insufficient. Duff v. Com., 92 Va. 769, 23 S. E. Rep. 643.

3. THE CHARGE—WHEN NO OFFENCE IS SET FORTH.—An indictment at common law for taking a horse "unlawfully and injuriously,"—the usual form with force and arms being also used,—was held not to describe the act as one that constitutes a breach of the peace. Com. v. Israel, 4 Leigh 675.

Same—Possession Not Proved as Laid.—One count of an indictment charged larceny of a slave "from the possession of A." The other count charged larceny without alleging from the possession of any one, and not concluding contra formam statuti. Verdict found the stealing while the slave was a runaway. The appellate court held the first count insufficient, the slave not being stolen "from the possession of A;" the second count insufficient, the offence charged not being an offence at common law. Com. v. Hays, 1 Va. Cas. 121.

Same—In Language of the Statute.—An indictment for grand larceny was objected to because it did not sufficiently charge the offence in the language of the statute on which it was founded. But it was held that an offence is sufficiently charged in the language of the statute, when in an indictment for grand larceny the articles stolen, which are not technically bank notes, but are embraced under the terms, writings and papers of value found in the statute, are described by the name and designation by which they are usually understood and known in the country, and the value properly averred, so that the accused has full notice of the charges against which he is required to defend himself. Fredrick v. State, 3 W. Va. 695.

4. SURPLUSAGE.—Unnecessary and irrelevant matter in an indictment may generally be treated as surplusage if, when stricken out, enough remains to sufficiently charge the larceny. Pomeroy v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 342; State v. Reece, 27 W. Va. 377.

So when an indictment charges that the prisoner committed a larceny of certain bank notes, "purporting on their faces to be, and being bank notes of and issued by bank charter," etc., the latter part of the charge may be rejected as surplusage, because it constitutes an independent allegation of an immaterial fact, and the fact constituting the offence is fully charged without it. It is not, therefore, necessary in such case to give proof of the charters of those banks. Pomeroy v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 342.

And an indictment under the act approved February 28, 1874, entitled "An act to amend sec. 6, ch. 201, of the Code of 1873," charging a larceny of "divers notes of the national currency of the United States" is precisely the same in meaning and effect as a charge of larceny of the "United States currency" and is sufficient. The addition of the word "national" in the indictment can certainly make no difference. Dull v. Com., 25 Gratt. 973.

5. MISJOINDER.—Where an indictment contains three counts, the first, for a larceny jointly against three persons; the second, a count for larceny against the same parties committed jointly, in accordance with a previous agreement to that end; the third, a count for obtaining goods by false pretenses, fashioned after the manner of the second count, there is no misjoinder of counts, and the indictment of each count thereof is good.

So where an indictment charges joint defendants with conspiracy to commit a larceny, and then charges them with actually committing a larceny in pursuance of the conspiracy, there is no misjoinder. Anthony v. Com., 88 Va. 847, 14 S. E. Rep. 834.

Moreover, larceny and receiving stolen goods knowing them to be stolen may be joined in the same count of an indictment. State v. Halida, 28 W. Va. 499.

6. VARIANCE.—To support the allegation in an indictment, that the bank notes purport on their faces to be notes of certain banks, the notes produced in evidence must correspond therewith. Pomeroy v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 342.

Digitized by Google

As to what constitutes a variance, it is held that if an indictment allege the larceny of a watch belonging to "Edmond Bolden," while the evidence shows it to be the property of "Ed Bolen," the names are idem sonans. and no variance is caused thereby. Pitsnogle v. Com., 91 Va. 808, 22 S. E. Rep. 351.

So a variance is not material where the indictment charges the stolen goods to be the property of Robert Buster, if the proof is that the owner of the goods is a certain James Robinson Buster, who is sometimes called Rob, Robin and Bob Buster, and that he accepted and answered to these names. This for the reason that it does not appear that the owner of the goods is another and a different person, therefore the variance is clearly not fatal. State v. Reece, 27 W. Va. 380. Moreover, if the record of an examining court charges the stealing of a dark bay horse, or the stealing of two horses and a halter, chain and collar, of the value of $150, and the indictment charges the stealing of a dark bay gelding, or the stealing of two horses of the value of $75 each, these variances are not sufficient to quash the indictment. Halkem v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 4. As to the effect of a variance, the question arose in Robinson v. Com., 32 Gratt. 866. The prisoner was on trial for stealing certain bank notes, "the numbers and denomination of which were unknown to the jurors;" the evidence of the commonwealth showed that the number and the denomination of the notes were known to the jurors, and for this variance between the indictment and the evidence the court, on the motion of the prisoner excluded the evidence; and then against the objection of the prisoner, discharged the jury. On a second indictment for the same offence, the prisoner put in a special plea of "once in jeopardy." The court held that, if the jury had, on the first trial, rendered a verdict in favor of the prisoner, that verdict could not have been pleaded to the second indictment because the acquittal was effected in consequence of a variance between the allegations and the proof, which under Va. Code 1860, ch. 199, § 16, is no bar to a new indictment.

C. TRIAL AND PROCEDURE.

1. IN GENERAL.

Charge of Clerk.—If on an indictment for larceny, the clerk charges the jury in the usual form, and on the trial it appears that the money charged to have been stolen was obtained by false pretenses, another charge by the clerk is neither necessary nor proper. Dull v. Com., 25 Gratt. 966.

Contradicting Existence of Check—Estoppel.—Upon an indictment against the secretary of a building fund association, for the larceny of a check, whether the building fund association was organized strictly in conformity with the requirements of the statute, is not a proper subject of enquiry, the accused having as secretary of the association, received and wilfully appropriated its funds or property, cannot be heard, upon a criminal prosecution therefor to contradict its legal existence. Shinn v. Com., 32 Gratt. 899.

Election—When Defendant Cannot Compel.—And where an indictment contains two counts each of which is sufficient for simple larceny, the defendant cannot compel the state to elect and try him on one count only, unless it appears that the counts charge separate and distinct offences. State v. Halida, 28 W. Va. 499.

Same—Counts for Larceny and Receiving Stolen Goods.—So if an indictment contains several counts, one for larceny, others for receiving stolen goods knowing them to have been stolen, and others for aiding another person to conceal stolen goods knowing them to have been stolen, but the charges in all the counts, however, relate to the same goods, which in different counts are laid to be the goods of different persons, or of a person unknown, it is not a case in which the court should quash some of the counts, or compel the prosecution to elect on which count the prisoner shall be tried. Dowdy v. Com., 9 Gratt. 727.

What Conviction May Be Had.

Conviction of Larceny under Charge of Kindred Offence.—Where the indictment or information charges a kindred offence which embraces the essential elements of larceny, there may be a conviction of larceny thereunder. State v. McClung, 35 W. Va. 285, 13 S. E. Rep. 654; Vaughan's Case, 17 Gratt. 576; Butler v. Com., 81 Va. 159.

Moreover, it is well settled that an indictment for burglary is not bad for duplicity because it charges the completion of the larceny. State v. McClung, 35 W. Va. 285, 13 S. E. Rep. 654; Vaughan's Case, 17 Gratt. 576; Butler v. Com., 81 Va. 159.

And in State v. McClung, 35 W. Va. 285, 13 S. E. Rep. 654, it is further laid down, that under an indictment for burglary which also charges the consummation of the theft, a conviction can be had for larceny upon failure of the conviction for burglary. But in other cases the charge of larceny is construed literally as a mere substitute for the charge of an intent to steal, and conviction for larceny cannot be had under such an indictment. Butler v. Com., 81 Va. 159.

Furthermore, if in an indictment for burglary all the elements of burglary are not charged, but those of larceny are charged, the indictment will be good for the latter offence. State v. Hupp, 31 W. Va. 355, 6 S. E. Rep. 919.

Thus, on an indictment, which charged not only the breaking and entering, but also the stealing of a trunk and its contents of stated value, the prisoner though acquitted of the burglary, may be found guilty of the larceny. Clarke v. Com., 25 Gratt. 908.

And in State v. Reece, 27 W. Va. 377, it was held that if an indictment for burglary is defective as such, it may, if it contains sufficient averments, be a good indictment for grand larceny. The charges in regard to the breaking and entering the store house may be treated as surplusage.

Conviction of but One Offence.—But if two offences are charged in separate counts there can be no conviction of both. State v. McClung, 35 W. Va. 284, 13 S. E. Rep. 654; Speers v. Com., 17 Gratt. 570.

Joinder of Offences in Same Count—Conviction of Lesser Offence.—Still, under a charge of grand larceny a conviction can be had for petit larceny. State v. McClung, 35 W. Va. 285, 13 S. E. Rep. 654.

Charge of Larceny from Building.—And under an insufficient charge of larceny from a building, a conviction for simple larceny may be had, if the indictment is sufficient in other respects. Vaughan v. Com., 17 Gratt. 576.

Prosecution or Conviction for One of Several Articles Charged.—And it is held that, if any one of several articles charged in an indictment is not the subject of larceny a conviction may be had for the larceny of the others. Harvey v. Com., 28 Gratt. 941.

2. SUFFICIENCY OF PROOF.

Connecting Ownership with Name in Indictment.—But in a trial for larceny, to convict the prisoner, there must be satisfactory proof that the property stolen was the property of the person stated in the indictment. Jones v. Com., 17 Gratt. 563.

Digitized by Google

However, it is sufficient to prove that at the time the offence was committed, the actual or constructive possession of the property stolen was in the person alleged in the indictment to be the owner thereof. State v. Chambers, 22 W. Va. 779.

Indictment for Larceny Sustained by Proof of Embezzlement.—And upon an indictment simply charging larceny the commonwealth may show that the subject of larceny was embezzled. Pitsnogle v. Com., 91 Va. 808, 22 S. E. Rep. 351; Code Va. 1887, sec. 3716.

Indictment for Larceny Sustained by Proof That Goods Were Stolen by Another and Received by Accused.—And if a person be indicted for the simple larceny of a thing, and the proof be that it was stolen by some other person, and received by the accused knowing it to have been stolen, the proof will sustain the charge; the act making the receiving of a thing stolen, knowing it to have been stolen, larceny. Code (Ed. of 1860), p. 789, sec. 20; Price v. Com., 21 Gratt. 846.

Defeating a Distress.—Under Code, sec. 3712, making it larceny to "fraudulently" dispose of or receive goods with intent to defeat a distress or levy made thereon, proof of the facts constituting the offence is sufficient to sustain an indictment for larceny. Duff v. Com., 92 Va. 769, 23 S. E. Rep. 643.

Gold Watch Alleged—Represented as Such—Conviction.—Where an indictment alleged the larceny of a "gold" watch, evidence of the owner that he gave $30 for it, and that when he purchased it, it was represented to be gold, is sufficient to sustain conviction. Pitsnogle v. Com., 91 Va. 808, 22 S. E. Rep. 351.

Production of Stolen Articles.—In an indictment for larceny of bank notes, it is not indispensably necessary to produce the stolen notes upon the trial. Moore v. Com., 2 Leigh 701.

3. ARREST OF JUDGMENT.

What Omissions in Indictment for Second Offence No Ground for Arrest of Judgment.—If an indictment against an accused for the second offence of petit larceny alleges a former conviction and punishment of the accused for a like offence, but does not in terms allege that the court in which the first offence was tried had competent authority to try the same; nor that the former conviction remains in force; nor that such conviction appears by the record; nor that the accused formerly convicted is the same person who is charged with the subsequent offence, and there is a verdict of guilty, none of the omissions aforesaid in the indictment is a ground for arresting the judgment. Stroup v. Com., 1 Rob. 754.

4. WHAT COMMONWEALTH MAY SHOW UNDER INDICTMENT.

Indictment for Larceny Sustained by Proof of Obtaining Goods under False Pretense.—Upon an indictment simply charging larceny, the commonwealth may show either that the subject of larceny was received with a knowledge that it was stolen, or that it was obtained by a false token or false pretense. Anable v. Com., 24 Gratt. 563; Leftwich v. Com., 20 Gratt. 716; Dowdy's Case, 9 Gratt. 727; Price v. Com., 21 Gratt. 846; Fay's Case, 28 Gratt. 912; Dull's Case, 25 Gratt. 965; Shinn's Case, 32 Gratt. 899; Pitsnogle v. Com., 91 Va. 808, 22 S. E. Rep. 351. A similar rule prevails in West Virginia. See State v. Halida, 28 W. Va. 503.

XXXIX. LEWD AND LASCIVIOUS COHABITATION AND CONDUCT.

A. IN GENERAL.

The Indictment Must Show That the Offence is Not Barred by the Statute of Limitations.—An indictment for an offence, the prosecution for which is by statute limited to a certain time after the offence was committed, showing upon its face that at the time the indictment was found the prosecution of the offence was barred by such statute, is fatally defective, and the defendant may take advantage of such defect, by motion to quash the indictment, or by demurrer thereto, or by motion in arrest of judgment. Therefore, an indictment for adultery and fornication found on the 8th day of April 1864, which charged the defendant with having committed the offence on the 10th day of March 1863, was upon a general demurrer filed thereto held fatally defective. State v. Ball, 30 W. Va. 382, 4 S. E. Rep. 645.

Miscegenation—Existence of Negro Blood in Accused.—In order to sustain an indictment, under sec. 8, ch. 7, Acts 1877-78, making the intermarriage of a negro with a white person, a felony, it must first be established that the accused is a person with one-fourth or more of negro blood in his veins; and the burden of proving this lies on the commonwealth. Jones v. Com., 80 Va. 538.

Establishing Fact of Cohabitation.—To sustain an indictment under the Virginia statute, the evidence must establish that the parties, not being married, lewdly and lasciviously associated and cohabited—that is, lived together in the same house as man and wife. Jones v. Com., 80 Va. 18. The indictment may be either joint or several. Scott v. Com., 77 Va. 344.

When Act Comes within Operation of Statute.—If in an indictment for lewd and lascivious cohabitation, the offence is charged from a day prior to the day when the statute went into effect, but as continuing to a day after the commencement of the act, the indictment is good. Nichols' and Janes' Case, 7 Gratt. 589.

B. THE INDICTMENT.

Form.—An indictment for lewd and lascivious cohabitation under sec. 7, ch. 192, Va. Code 1873, charging the offences in the language of the statute, is sufficient. Scott v. Com., 77 Va. 344. See also, Com. v. Isaacs, 5 Rand. 634. So an indictment under sec. 8, of ch. 7 of Acts 1877-78, interdicting the intermarriage of white persons with negroes, in the very language of the statute is sufficient. Jones v. Com., 79 Va. 213. But as held in West Virginia, an indictment under section 7 of ch. 149, of W. Va. Code, in force in 1883, which provides that "If any persons not married to each other, lewdly and lasciviously associate and cohabit together * * * * * * they shall be fined," etc., charging that the defendant "did lewdly and lasciviously associate and cohabit with one S. F.," the said defendant and S. F., not being married to each other, it was held that, it is not essential to use the very words of the statute to describe a statutory offence, if every fact and intent entering into, and constituting the offence is set forth in the indictment. State v. Foster, 21 W. Va. 767.

Those Guilty of Miscegenation Liable to Indictment for Lewd and Lascivious Cohabitation.—Where a negro and white person domiciled in Virginia, go out of the state and are in some other jurisdiction legally married, and after remaining in such jurisdiction, for a while (ten days in one case), return to their home in Virginia, and continue to reside there as husband and wife, they are liable in Virginia to indictment for lewd and lascivious cohabitation. Kinney v. Com., 30 Gratt. 858, 32 Am. Rep. 690.

Joinder of Defendants.—And the participants in the crime of lewd and lascivious cohabitation may be either jointly or separately indicted. Scott v. Com., 77 Va. 344; State v. Foster, 21 W. Va. 767.

And where the man and the woman are joined as defendants in one indictment, an allegation that the offences were committed by their joint act is material. State v. Foster, 21 W. Va. 772.

Allegations—As to Time—Date of Statute.—Moreover, if in an indictment for lewd and lascivious cohabitation, the offence is charged from a day prior to the day when the statute went into effect, but as continuing to a day after the commencement of the act, the indictment is nevertheless good. Nichols' and Janes' Case, 7 Gratt. 589.

Same—"Together" or with Each Other.—And where an indictment under sec. 7 of ch. 149 of W. Va. Code, in force April 1883, for "lewd and lascivious association and cohabitation" against one of the parties, alleged that the defendant on a certain day, and from that day to a certain other day in the county, etc., did lewdly and lasciviously associate and cohabit with another person named in said indictment, said defendant and such other person not being married to each other during all that time, it was held that the indictment was fatally defective, because it failed to allege that the said persons so associated and cohabited "together" or "with each other," for in the absence of such words one might be entirely innocent of the "lewd and lascivious" commerce which was the distinctive feature of the statutory offence. One might be insane, or might in good faith believe that there had been a bona fide marriage. State v. Foster, 21 W. Va. 767; State v. Foster, 26 W. Va. 272.

Same—"Lewdly and Lasciviously" Cohabit Together.—Where the term "lewdly and lasciviously cohabit together" is employed in the statute defining the offence, an allegation of common purpose and intent, either by the use of these words or words of like import, is necessary. State v. Foster, 21 W. Va. 767.

XL. MAYHEM.

See post, "Shooting."

The Virginia Code 1887, § 4042, provides among other things, as follows: "And on any indictment for maliciously shooting, stabbing, cutting, or wounding a person, or by any means causing him bodily injury with intent to kill him, the jury may find the accused not guilty of the offence charged, but guilty of maliciously doing such an act with intent to maim, disfigure, and disable, or of unlawfully doing it with intent to maim, disfigure, disable, or kill such person."

But on an indictment for unlawfully stabbing under this statute, a verdict of "guilty of unlawful stabbing," will not authorize a judgment; however a new trial should be directed by the court. See Va. Code 1887, § 3671; Marshall's Case, 5 Gratt. 668.

And as held in Com. v. Lester, 2 Va. Cas. 198 (1820), if a prisoner be charged with feloniously breaking the jaw-bone of another, contra formam statuti, the indictment cannot be sustained as one for mayhem at common law, because the mayhem at common law, with one exception only, is not a felony. But it is otherwise by statute. See Va. Code 1887, § 3671, relative to shooting, stabbing, etc., with intent to maim, kill, etc. And if in an indictment for malicious and voluntary shooting, the term "wilfully" being used for "voluntarily," is cured by the statute of jeofails. So a conclusion against the acts of the general assembly, when there is but one act, is also cured. Trimble v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 143. However, though an indictment only uses the word "malicious," the jury can find the prisoner guilty of the "unlawful," cutting, etc., with intent, etc. Canada v. Com., 22 Gratt. 899. But an indictment charging that the prisoner, "at the county and within the jurisdiction of the court, feloniously and maliciously did stab one P. T., with intention to maim and kill him," will not be quashed, upon objection that it does not allege an assault, striking or wounding, nor that P. T. was within the county or jurisdiction, nor that the intent was felonious or malicious. Com. v. Woodson, 9 Leigh 669.

Yet in Hoback v. Com., 28 Gratt. 922, there was an indictment, under Va. Code 1873, ch. 202, sec. 29, of a certain accused, for that he maliciously and of his malice aforethought did shoot a certain described person, and the jury returned their verdict as follows: "We, the jury, find the defendant (described) not guilty of malicious shooting, as in the within indictment charged, but guilty of unlawful shooting with the intent to maim, disfigure and kill, and fix his time of confinement in the penitentiary at two years," and it was held that the person shot was sufficiently indicated, as the verdict was to be read in connection with the indictment. But an indictment for malicious shooting ought to charge that it was done feloniously, and this under the act of 1817, which does not in terms declare it a felony, but makes it punishable with confinement in the penitentiary. Trimble v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 143. And although the statute against unlawful shooting, etc., affixes a penalty when the act is done with intent to maim, disfigure, disable or kill (in the disjunctive), yet the indictment should charge the intents conjunctively, and although all of the intents be laid yet proof of either supports the indictment. Angel v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 231; Va. Code 1887, § 3671.

And it is held that an indictment for the malicious stabbing of a slave could be supported under the act of January 28th, 1803, which gave three-fourths of the fine to the use of the party aggrieved, although the slaves could not take the fine. Com. v. Chapple, 1 Va. Cas. 184.

XLI. MISCEGENATION.

See ante, "Lewd and Lascivious Cohabitation and Conduct."

An indictment in the language of the Acts of 1877-8, ch. 7, sec. 8, interdicting intermarriage between a negro and a white person, is sufficient. Moreover, the parties are liable to indictment for lewd and lascivious cohabitation. Jones v. Com., 79 Va. 213; Kinney v. Com., 30 Gratt. 858.

XLII. MURDER.

A. IN GENERAL.

Jurisdiction—Where Offender Indictable.—In Com. v. Linton, 2 Va. Cas. 205, it is declared that if a person be stabbed in Virginia and die of his wounds in another state, he cannot be tried for the murder in any county of this state, but he can be examined, indicted and tried for feloniously stabbing, in the county where the blow was inflicted. This rule of the common law has, however, been altered by statute, and at the present time the Virginia courts would in such case, have jurisdiction. Thus, Va. Code 1887, § 3667, provides that: "If any person be stricken or poisoned in, and die, by reason thereof, out of this state, the offender shall be as guilty, and be prosecuted and punished, as if the death had occurred in the county or corporation in which the stroke or poison was given or administered." Section 3890 provides that: "Prosecution for offences committed, wholly or in part without, and made punishable within, this state, may be in any county or corporation in which the offender is found, or to which he is sent by any judge, justice, or court." See § 3683-85. Also, see in this connection, Strouther's Case, 92 Va. 789, 22 S. E. Rep. 852.

Preliminary Examination.—An indictment in a superior court need not charge, and it need not appear from the record of such court, that the defendant has been examined by an examining court for the offence, for which he is indicted. Com. v. Miller, 1 Va. Cas. 309.

And upon an examining court having acquitted of murder and remanded the prisoner to the superior court to be tried for manslaughter, it is lawful for the superior court to indict for murder, and the prisoner, being so indicted, is not entitled to be bailed on the ground of no indictment being found against him for manslaughter. Bailey's Case, 1 Va. Cas. 258; Sorrell's Case, 1 Va. Cas. 253; Com. v. Myers, 1 Va. Cas. 188.

But if a man be examined by the examining court for feloniously stabbing another, and remanded for trial of that offence, and the party stabbed afterwards die, the accused cannot be indicted for the murder, without an examination, before the justices, of the murder. Com. v. Linton, 2 Va. Cas. 205 (1820). However, a preliminary examination is not now necessary. See Butler v. Com., 81 Va. 159; Jones v. Com., 86 Va. 661, 10 S. E. Rep. 1005.

And if an indictment includes offences for which the prisoner has not been tried, and he is sent on by the examining court for further trial, it is error; and the court should, upon the motion of the prisoner, quash the counts of the indictment which charge these offences. Clere v. Com., 3 Gratt. 615.

Finding by Special Grand Jury.—Under Acts 1889-90, p. 91, an indictment for murder may be found by either a regular or a special grand jury. Lyles v. Com., 88 Va. 396, 13 S. E. Rep. 802.

Indictment for Murder in First Degree.—In West Virginia there is no such thing as indictment for murder in the first or second degree; the indictment is for murder, and it depends upon the proof, whether it is in the first or second degree. State v. Schnelle, 24 W. Va. 767.

And in Virginia it is not proper, or necessary, that an indictment should charge murder in the first degree, or use that description, which, according to the statute, constitutes that degree of the offence. Wicks v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 387; Lithgow v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 297. Or as held in Kibler v. Com., 94 Va. 804, 26 S. E. Rep. 858, it is not necessary, in an indictment for murder, to charge specifically the facts which constitute murder in the first degree. The common-law form of indictment of murder is all that is necessary to support a finding of guilty of murder in the first degree under the statute. So in Commonwealth v. Miller, 1 Va. Cas. 309, it is held that an indictment for murder in the first degree, need not charge specifically such facts, as would show an offence to have been murder in the first degree.

Furthermore, it is sufficient if the indictment is in the common-law form for murder. Cluverius v. Com., 81 Va. 787.

Two Counts—Separate Offence Not Set Out.—And if in an indictment for murder there are two counts, in the second of which the offence is not set out as another offence, it is not error, coming within the purview of Va. Code 1849, p. 770, § 11, which dispenses with the necessity of inserting in an indictment any allegation which is unnecessary to be proved. So far from it being necessary to prove that offences as stated in different counts of an indictment are different offences, if they are in fact different and are felonies, the indictment may be quashed, or the prosecutor compelled to elect for which offence he will proceed; though the indictment will not on that ground be demurrable. Lazier v. Com., 10 Gratt. 708.

Surplusage.—An indictment for murder which describes the wound in one place as above the nipple of the left breast, and subsequently, as below the nipple of the left breast, is not void for repugnancy and inconsistency, as the latter recitation is surplusage, and covered by § 3999, Va. Code 1887, which provides that indictments shall not be void for the omission or insertion of "words of mere form and surplusage." Robertson v. Com. (Va. 1894), 20 S. E. Rep. 362.

And in Lazier v. Com., 10 Gratt. 708, an indictment for murder charged the wound to have been inflicted on the 9th of December, of which wound she on the said 14th day of December died. The word, "said" is surplusage, and its insertion is not a fatal defect.

Duplicity.—But if two distinct felonies are charged in one indictment, it may be quashed, or the prosecutor will be compelled to elect for which offence he will proceed. Lazier v. Com., 10 Gratt. 708.

Conclusion.—However, an indictment for murder need not conclude contra formam statuti, although a punishment varying from the common-law punishment is prescribed by statute for the second degree of the offence. Vance v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 162.

Indictment of Principal in Second Degree.—On an indictment of a person as principal in the second degree of murder in the first degree, it is proper for the trial court to define murder in the first degree as it is included in the indictment against the principal of the first degree, and is one of the degrees of homicide with which the defendant is charged as having aided and abetted. Horton v. Com. (Va. 1901), 99 Va. —, 7 Va. Law Reg. 492.

Indictment of Accessory.—An accessory before the fact for a felony cannot be convicted on an indictment against him as principal. Thornton v. Com., 24 Gratt. 657.

However, it is not necessary that the indictment against the accessory should aver the conviction of the principal, for they may be jointly indicted. Com. v. Williamson, 2 Va. Cas. 211. In this connection there was an indictment for murder against T and R containing two counts: the second charged T as principal and R as accessory before the fact; and on the motion of T the second count was struck out. At a subsequent term, on the trial of T, the clerk read both counts and charged the jury on both; and then the prisoner excepted. The court then directed the clerk to read the first count, which was done, and the clerk charged the jury upon it; and then the prisoner excepted to the second reading and charge. The second reading and charge were proper, and cured the error of the first. Thornton v. Com., 24 Gratt. 657. Moreover, the same count may contain a charge of murder against one, and a charge of being an accessory against others. Hawley v. Com., 75 Va. 847.

Omission to Insert Copulative.—A motion to quash a joint indictment against two persons on the ground of omission to insert the copulative conjunction

"and" between their names, is properly overruled, where a comma is placed after the first name. Hash v. Com., 88 Va. 172, 13 S. E. Rep. 398.

Form.—The form of an indictment for murder, in W. Va. Code 1891, ch. 144, sec. 1, is good for the conviction of murder in the first and second degree or in lower grade for homicide.. State v. Douglass, 41 W. Va. 537, 23 S. E. Rep. 724. And an indictment in the form prescribed in section 1, ch. 118 of the Acts of the Legislature of 1882, is sufficient and does fully and plainly inform the prisoner of the character and cause of the accusation against him. Schnelle v. State, 24 W. Va. 767; Smith v. State, 24 W. Va. 814; State v. Flanagan, 26 W. Va. 118.

In Kibler v. Com., 94 Va. 804, 26 S. E. Rep. 858, an indictment contained three counts. The first count charged that the murder was committed with a gun charged with gunpowder and shot, which it is alleged the plaintiff in error feloniously, willfully, and with malice aforethought did discharge and shoot off against and upon Willis D. Kibler, inflicting a mortal wound, of which he then and there died. The second count charged that the killing was done with an axe, feloniously, willfully, and with malice aforethought. And, the third count, that, it was done with a knife, by cutting the throat of Willis D. Kibler, feloniously, willfully, and with malice aforethought.

The indictment, and each count thereof, was in all respects not only substantially, but technically, correct, and the demurrer was properly overruled.

Variance.—An indictment for murder charging that the prisoner, of his malice aforethought did make the assault; but the striking and wounding, and the killing and murder, are respectively charged to have been done "of his malice aforesaid," is a good indictment for murder. Maile v. Com., 9 Leigh 661 (1839).

And in Allstock's Case, 3 Gratt. 650, an indictment for murder stated that the mortal wound was inflicted on the 7th of November 1845, that the deceased languished until November 8th, in the year aforesaid and then says, "on which said 8th of May, in the year aforesaid, the deceased died." The prisoner pleaded not guilty to the indictment. The insertion of May for November was deemed a mistake; appearing on the face of the indictment, and, is one of form, cured by the statute of jeofails, and will not exclude proof of the death, subsequent to the 7th of November, or be cause for arresting the judgment.

B. ALLEGATIONS AND DESCRIPTION.

1. ALLEGATIONS.

Malice Aforethought.—In Com. v. Gibson, 2 Va. Cas. 70, it is held that in an indictment for murder, it is indispensable that the killing and murder should be charged to be done with "malice aforethought." And if the assault and the stabbing be charged to have been done with "malice aforethought," and the conclusion substitutes for those words the word "maliciously," the indictment is not sufficient.

"Deliberately."—But in an indictment for murder, the omission of the word "deliberately," will not be fatal on general demurrer. Bull v. Com., 14 Gratt. 613; Livingston v. Com., 14 Gratt. 592. Nor the word "premeditate." Weatherman v. Com. (Va. 1894), 19 S. E. Rep. 778.

"Deliberate and Premeditated."—So an indictment for murder, which charges that J. W., the defendant "in and upon M, feloniously, willfully, and of his own motion aforethought, did make an assault, and that J. W., with a certain axe, in his hands then and there held, the said M. * * * then and there feloniously and of his malice aforethought did strike, * * * giving to the said M., * * * two mortal wounds, * * * whereby then and there she died * * *," is not defective because it does not contain the words "deliberate" and premeditated." Weatherman v. Com. (Va. 1894), 19 S. E. Rep. 778.

Dates Set Out in Figures.—So it is not error that dates in an indictment are set out in figures instead of words, the Va. Code of 1849, p. 770, § 11, having dispensed with the necessity of inserting in an indictment any allegation which is unnecessary to be proved. Lazier v. Com., 10 Gratt. 708.

Mode and Manner of Killing.—The Acts of West Virginia Legislature 1882, § 1, ch. 118, declare that, "in an indictment for murder it shall not be necessary to set forth the manner in which, or the means by which, the death of the deceased was caused, but it shall be sufficient in every such indictment to charge that the defendant did feloniously, willfully, maliciously, deliberately and unlawfully slay, kill and murder the deceased," and the form therein prescribed in accordance with the above declaration is constitutional. Moreover, such an indictment is not in violation of the fourteenth section of the bill of rights which declares, that in trials for crimes and misdemeanors "the accused shall be fully and plainly informed of the character and cause of the accusation," as such an indictment does fully and plainly inform the accused of the character and cause of the accusation. The character and cause of the accusation are essentially different from the mode by, or manner in which, the deceased was killed. The constitution does not require that the accused shall be informed of the "manner in which, or the means by which, the death of the deceased was caused." State v. Schnelle, 24 W. Va. 767. And the allegation that the murder was committed with one weapon at the time held in the hands of two or more defendants will not render the indictment demurrable. Hash v. Com., 88 Va. 172, 13 S. E. Rep. 398. So in an indictment for murder, the words "did strike," are not technical, but when the blow is made with a dirk, the words stab, strike, thrust, are equivalent thereto; but where there is a positive averment of the stab, etc., with a dirk, it sufficiently appears that the mortal wound was given thereby, under the words, "giving one mortal wound," etc. Gibson v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 110.

But an indictment charging defendant with attempting to poison, with intent to kill, one A by buying the poison and delivering it to one L, and soliciting her to administer it in coffee to A, but which failed to allege that L consented to do so, or that anything else was done, does not charge an offence under the Va. Code 1887, § 3669, declaring it a felony to attempt to administer poison in food, drink, etc., with intent to kill. Hicks v. Com., 86 Va. 223, 9 S. E. Rep. 1024.

Yet where homicide is alleged to have been accomplished by poison, the indictment need not state the quantity used, as the indictment may charge the offence with sufficient certainty in the absence of such statement, under the Va. Code 1873, ch. 201, sec. 12; Puryear v. Com., 83 Va. 51, 1 S. E. Rep. 512. Nor is it necessary to state that the accused knew the substance alleged to have been used in producing death was a deadly poison. Thornton v. Com., 24 Gratt. 657.

Averment of Principal's Conviction on an Indictment against Accessory.—And in an indictment against an accessory it is not necessary to aver that the principal was convicted as they may be jointly tried. Com. v. Williamson, 2 Va. Cas. 211.

2. DESCRIPTION.

Of Wound.—In an indictment for murder it is not necessary to set out the length, breadth or depth of the wound. See Va. Code 1849, p. 770, § 10; Lazier v. Com., 10 Gratt. 708.

"But at common law, while an indictment for murder must show with certainty in what part of the body the deceased was wounded, the same strictness is not required as to the evidence necessary to support it. If, for instance, say the authorities, the wound be stated to be on the left side, and proved to be on the right, or alleged to be on one side of the body and proved to be on the other, the variance is immaterial. 2 Hale P. C. 186. In such case the substance of the issue is proved, and that is sufficient. 1 Greenl. Ev., sec. 65. So in Lazier's Case, 10 Gratt. 708, it was held to be no more necessary to prove that the wound was in the same part of the body in which it is alleged to have been than it is to prove the length and depth of the wound as alleged in the indictment. See also, 2 Bish. Crim. Prac. (3d Ed.), sec. 525." Per LEWIS, P., in Curtis v. Com., 87 Va. 589, 13 S. E. Rep. 73.

Name—Initials.—An indictment concluding "against the peace and dignity of the commonwealth of Virginia," and designating the murdered person by the initials of his name, though not signed by the commonwealth's attorney, is sufficient. Brown's Case, 86 Va. 466, 10 S. E. Rep. 745.

C. PROCEDURE.

1. IN GENERAL.

What the State May Prove.—Upon an indictment in the form prescribed by sec. 1, ch. 144, W. Va. Code 1887, for murder, the state may prove any manner of killing, or different manners of killing. State v. Morgan, 35 W. Va. 260, 13 S. E. Rep. 985. But where it is alleged in an indictment that a particular weapon was used, it is not permissible to prove that a weapon entirely different in its character was the cause of the death. Acts of Legislature (Va.) 1882, ch. 118, sec. 1.

However, where the mode of the death or the means causing it are uncertain, the indictment should contain as many counts as may be necessary to set out inconsistent modes of death or the different means supposed to have been used. Lazier v. Com., 10 Gratt. 708. Thus, in Smith v. Com., 21 Gratt. 809, it is held to be, "a well-settled principle of criminal pleading and practice, that several modes of death, inconsistent with each other, may be set out in the same indictment. This grows out of the very necessity of the case. The indictment is but the charge or accusation made by the grand jury with as much certainty and precision as the evidence before them will warrant. In many cases the mode of death is uncertain, while the homicide is beyond question. Every cautious pleader, therefore, will insert as many counts as will be necessary to provide for every possible contingency in the evidence. If the mode of death is uncertain, he may and ought to state it in different counts, in every possible form, to correspond with the evidence at the trial as to the mode of death."

2. NEW TRIAL.

When it May Be Granted.—If a verdict be agreed on and written in the jury room (in the case of felony), and then in open court read as a verdict (after the jury has been commanded to look upon the prisoner, and asked whether they have agreed upon a verdict, to which they reply that they have), and the clerk then, in open court, before the discharge, amend the verdict in an immaterial point, but before the amended verdict be read, one of the jury being sick, retires to the jury room, departing from his fellows and the court, without the knowledge of them, or of the court, to which amended verdict the eleven agree, yet it is a nullity, for the twelve did not consent to it, and the verdict in such case having been set aside as insufficient, a venire facias de novo may be awarded, and a new trial had, either on the same indictment or another. Com. v. Gibson, 2 Va. Cas. 70.

3. CONVICTION.—Under a common-law indictment for murder, the prisoner may be found guilty of murder in the first or second degree, or manslaughter. Livingston v. Com., 14 Gratt. 592. Moreover, on an indictment for murder simply, one may be convicted of murder in the commission of, or in the attempt to commit robbery. Robertson v. Com. (Va. 1894), 20 S. E. Rep. 362.

So in West Virginia, it is held that, an indictment for murder in the form prescribed by section 1, ch. 144, of W. Va. Code of 1891, is good for conviction of murder in the first or second degree, or any lower grade of homicide. State v. Douglass, 41 W. Va. 537, 23 S. E. Rep. 724; State v. Baker, 33 W. Va. 319, 10 S. E. Rep. 639; Schnelle's Case, 24 W. Va. 767; Smith's Case, 24 W. Va. 815; Flanagan's Case, 26 W. Va. 116.

And sec. 20, ch. 159, W. Va. Code 1891, enacts that, "on an indictment for felonious homicide, the jury may find the accused not guilty of the felony, but guilty of involuntary manslaughter." Ex parte Garrison, 36 W. Va. 686, 15 S. E. Rep. 417.

4. VERDICT.—So an indictment in the common-law form for murder, charging both degrees of murder, and a verdict finding the accused guilty of murder in the first degree, as charged in the indictment, is sufficient. Cluverius v. Com., 81 Va. 787.

Furthermore, an indictment which does not charge specifically the ingredients of murder in the first degree as distinguished from murder in the second degree will support a verdict of murder in the first degree. For, as said in the case of Miller v. Com., 1 Va. Cas. 310, "the indictment is not defective in not charging specifically such facts as would show the offence to have been murder in the first degree." Kibler v. Com., 94 Va. 809, 26 S. E. Rep. 858. To the same effect, see Wicks v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 387, and Livingstone v. Com., 14 Gratt. 596.

And on an indictment charging one as principal in the second degree of murder in the first degree, a verdict which finds the prisoner "guilty as charged in the indictment," and fixes his punishment, is sufficient. Horton v. Com. (Va. 1901), 99 Va. —, 7 Va. Law Reg. 492.

XLIII. NUISANCES.

An indictment for a nuisance caused by a certain mill and mill dam, the property of the defendant, situated near a common highway, without particular specification or description of the mill, and without expressly alleging that it is in the county wherein the indictment is found, is good and sufficient after verdict. Stephen v. Com., 2 Leigh 759. Moreover, an unauthorized obstruction of the public enjoyment of streets and public places, is an indictable nuisance. Yates v. Town of Warrenton, 84 Va. 337, 4 S. E. Rep. 818. See post, "Obstructions."

XLIV. OBSTRUCTIONS.

A. IN GENERAL.

When Indictable.—An unauthorized obstruction of the public enjoyment of streets and public places, is an indictable nuisance. Yates v. Town of Warrenton. 84 Va. 337, 4 S. E. Rep. 818.

Digitized by Google

Thus, in Taylor v. Com., 29 Gratt. 784, the defendants in an indictment for a nuisance by obstructing a street were the joint owners of a house and lot of two acres fronting 264 feet on Porter street in Manchester. The house was ancient, and had been held by the defendants and those under whom they claimed for more than sixty years, according to its present enclosure. The city counsel holding the said enclosure to be within Porter street, directed that they should be removed, and the defendants obtained an injunction to prevent it; and this suit was pending in the same court. When the indictment was called for the trial the defendants moved that the case should be continued until the injunction suit was decided. The court held that the indictment was the appropriate remedy in such a case; and the continuance was properly refused.

So a boom company may be proceeded against by indictment for erecting and maintaining a dam or any other thing in any watercourse which is a public highway, which dam obstructs the navigation or the passage of fish, under sec. 24, ch. 44 of the Code of 1881. State v. Elk Island Boom Co., 41 W. Va. 796, 24 S. E. Rep. 590.

Moreover, an indictment lies against a person for making a fence across a public road. If the obstruction is permitted to continue for so many days as will raise the penalty to the sum of five dollars, the superior court of law has jurisdiction to try the indictment. Justice v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 171.

When Indictment Not in Proper Form.—In McClintic v. Com., 1 Rob. 727, an indictment was found, charging that a certain McClintic on the 22nd day of November 1839, "built a fence across a portion of the public road in the county aforesaid, leading from, etc., being then and there owner and tenant of the lands through which said public road runs, and did then and there continue the said fence so built as aforesaid across said public road, from the said 22nd day of November 1839, to the 25th day of November 1839, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made," etc. The appellate court held that the indictment was bad and ought to have been so adjudged, and the demurrer which was filed thereto was proper.

Necessary Allegations.—In Bailey v. Com., 78 Va. 19, a party was prosecuted for obstructing a road. It was held that in describing an offence under the statute, the indictment must follow the statute, and any material variance would be fatal. And in a prosecution for the obstruction of a road under chapter 26, section 1, Criminal Procedure, an essential of the offence therein described is the scienter. Therefore, a failure of an indictment to aver the scienter is fatal. Bailey v. Com., 78 Va. 19. But in an indictment against an overseer of a public road for failing to keep it in repair, it is not necessary to allege that the county court had not, by an order entered of record, authorized a less width than thirty feet. Commonwealth v. Howard, 1 Gratt. 555. So in an indictment for obstructing a public road it is not necessary to allege, that the wrongful act was "knowingly and wilfully done"; it will be sufficient to allege that the act was done unlawfully or without lawful authority. And if it alleged that the act was done "knowingly and wilfully," these words "knowingly and wilfully" will be treated as surplusage. State v. C. & O. R. Co., 24 W. Va. 809.

B. PROCEDURE.

Evidence Admissible.—In State v. C. & O. R. Co., 24 W. Va. 809, the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad Company was indicted for obstructing a public road: and the obstruction was shown to have been caused by raising the track of the railway, at the point where it was crossed by the public road. It was competent and material evidence on behalf of the defendant to show, that at the time the road was obstructed, the said railroad at that point was in possession of and was run by another railroad company.

Verdict.—And if the indictment charges that the obstruction continued a certain number of days, and the jury find the defendant guilty, without ascertaining the number of days, the verdict is sufficient, and the court may enter judgment for the fine, according to the number of days charged in the indictment. Justice v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 171.

XLV. OFFICIAL OR PUBLIC DUTIES.

Omission of Duties.—A presentment under Va. Code 1860, ch. 194, sec. 6, p. 799, punishing the omitting or delaying to perform any duty pertaining to an office, of one who is authorized to serve legal process, should follow the terms of the statute, or must use terms which show conclusively, or beyond any rational doubt to the contrary, that the accused is guilty of the offence described in the statute; and unless this is done, the addition that "so the accused did receive money for omitting and delaying to perform a duty pertaining to his office of constable," etc., will not cure the defect. Old v. Com., 18 Gratt. 915.

Corruptness in Office.—And in an indictment against the justices of a county court for misbehavior in office, it is necessary that the act imputed as misbehavior, be distinctly charged to have been done with corrupt, partial, malicious or improper motives, and above all with knowledge that it was wrong; though there are no technical words indispensably required, in which the charge of corruption, partiality, etc., shall be made. Jacobs v. Com., 2 Leigh 709.

An indictment in such case not charging the corruption, partiality, etc., distinctly and substantially, and not charging the scienter, is bad even after verdict of conviction, its defects not being charged by the statute. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 169, § 44: Jacobs v. Com., 2 Leigh 709.

Against Owner of Turnpike.—An indictment which charged that P was the owner of a certain turnpike road; that he controlled and supervised the same, and that he kept it in such bad repair and suffered it to remain obstructed to such an extent, that it was impossible for the people of Marshall county to enjoy the same, against the peace and dignity of the state of West Virginia, was held bad, because it did not charge that said turnpike road was a public road, nor that it was in the county of M., nor that P. was under any duty or liability to keep it in repair. Parkinson v. State, 2 W. Va. 589.

XLVI. ORDINARIES—KEEPING SAME WITHOUT LICENSE.

And an indictment which charges that the defendant, on a day and time specified, kept an ordinary without obtaining license to do so, is sufficient, without setting out the facts of his furnishing for compensation, lodging or diet, etc. Burner v. Com., 13 Gratt. 778. Such an indictment, with the addition that he continued to keep the ordinary from the day stated to another subsequent day, is not defective:

the continuando is mere surplusage. Burner v. Com., 13 Gratt. 778.

XLVII. ORDINANCES—VIOLATION OF MUNICIPAL ORDINANCE.

In a proceeding for a violation of a municipal ordinance, the warrant need not allege that the offence was committed in the county in which the municipality is situated. Beasley v. Beckley, 28 W. Va. 81.

XLVIII. OUTLAWRY.

In an indictment against a party who has been proceeded against to outlawry, a question cannot be adjourned to the general court, without his assent appearing on the record. Com. v. Pearce, 6 Gratt. 669.

XLIX. PHYSICIANS—PRACTISING WITHOUT LICENSE.

It is sufficient if words used in the indictment are equivalent to those employed in the statute describing the offence; and to charge a person with "practising medicine" is equivalent, under Acts 1883-4, p. 597. § 92, to charging that he "practised as a physician," without having a license. Whitlock v. Com., 89 Va. 337, 15 S. E. Rep. 893.

L. PERJURY.

A. IN GENERAL.

1. INDICTMENT—VA. STATUTE.—Va. Code 1887, § 3993, relative to indictment for perjury or subornation of perjury, provides as follows: "In an indictment or accusation for perjury or subornation of perjury, it shall be sufficient to state the substance of the offence charged against the accused, in what court or by whom the oath was administered, which is charged to have been falsely taken, and to aver that such court or person had competent authority to administer the same, together with proper averments to falsify the matter wherein the perjury is assigned, without setting forth any part of any record or proceeding at law or equity, or the commission or authority of the court or person before whom the perjury was committed; but nothing herein shall be construed to allow, without the consent of the accused, a part only of any record, proceeding, or writing to be given in evidence on the trial of such indictment or accusation." W. Va. Code 1899, ch. 158, § 4.

Form.—And indictments for perjury in Virginia, must be according to the common law. Com. v. Lodge, 2 Gratt. 579.

What is a Sufficient Indictment for Perjury.—And under sec. 3993, Va. Code of 1887, an indictment for perjury which states the substance of the offence, in what court the oath was administered, which is charged to have been falsely taken, and avers that it had authority to administer the same, contains only averments necessary for the jurisdiction of the court over the case upon the trial of which perjury is alleged to have been committed. In this case Pickering's Case, 8 Gratt. 628, was expressly disapproved. Fitch v. Com., 92 Va. 824, 24 S. E. Rep. 272.

And in West Virginia although it is sufficient in certain cases to charge the offence in the language of the act creating it, yet as the terms of the statute enacting the "attorneys' test oath" are generic and embrace every species of each particular class of offences described in the oath, it is indispensable that the facts and circumstances constituting the offence, such as time (when it is of the essence of the offence), place, manner and occasion of committing it, should be set forth in an indictment for perjury under the statute, with such certainty and particularity as to give the accused reasonable notice of what he is required to meet and defend himself against, and also to enable him in case he should be subsequently proceeded against for the same offence, to plead the former conviction or acquittal in bar of the proceeding. Stofer v. State, 3 W. Va. 689.

When Indictment Lies.—On a trial of a warrant for debt, before a justice, founded on an order given by the defendant, he made oath before the justice that he did not sign his name to the order. Upon an indictment for perjury in taking this oath, the court held that perjury could be committed in taking such oath, and that the court should not quash the indictment, but should put the defendant to his demurrer. Com. v. Litton, 6 Gratt. 691.

Election—Prosecutor Must Select the Oath He Holds to Be False.—It was at one time held that when the same person has by opposite oaths asserted and denied the same fact, he may be convicted on either, for whichsoever of them is given in evidence to disprove the other, the defendant cannot be heard to deny the truth of that evidence, inasmuch as it came to him. But this doctrine has long since been exploded, and it is now held where one is indicted for swearing contradictorily on two occasions, the prosecutor must elect which oath he holds to be perjured, and that oath he must affirmatively prove to be false. If defendant is shown to have sworn contradictory oaths without more, non constat which is false. Rhodes v. Com., 78 Va. 692.

Variance.—In a prosecution for perjury if the indictment set forth that "a warrant for debt due by account for rent," was sued out by the defendant, and the warrant given in evidence, shows that the claim was not for rent, but for other things, this is such a variance, that the warrant ought not to be given in evidence. Com. v. Hickman, 2 Va. Cas. 323.

What the Indictment Must Show to Be Valid.

Oath Taken before a Regimental Court.—In an indictment for perjury in taking a false oath before a regimental court of enquiry the indictment ought to set forth, the number of officers of which the said court of enquiry consisted, and what was their respective rank, so as to enable the court to discern whether the court of enquiry was constituted according to law. Moreover, the indictment ought to aver and set forth distinctly and directly, what was the inquiry then and there being made by the court, so as to enable the court of law to know whether the matter deposed by the defendant was material or pertinent to the enquiry. Conner v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 30.

When Circuit Court's Authority Sufficiently Charged.—Where it is charged in an indictment for perjury that the oath was administered in a circuit court of a certain county holden by a certain judge, and that the court had competent authority to administer the oath, it is sufficiently charged that the court had competent authority to administer it. Stofer v. State, 3 W. Va. 689.

False Oath before Grand Jury—When Averment Sufficient.—If an indictment for perjury in giving false testimony before a grand jury, charges that the defendant, being duly sworn, "did depose and give evidence to the grand jury in substance and to the effect following" (stating the testimony) "which said evidence was wilfully false and corrupt, for in truth," etc. (falsifying the facts deposed

"and so the defendant did, in manner and form aforesaid, commit wilful and corrupt perjury," there is no sufficient averment that the defendant wilfully or corruptly swore falsely, and the indictment is defective as well at common law as under the statute. Thomas v. Com., 2 Rob. 795.

Proceeding Ex Parte.—If a proceeding be ex parte, it is sufficiently charged as material if it be averred that "it then and there became material to him," the defendant, to take oath. Stofer v. State, 3 W. Va. 689.

Oath to Answer in Chancery.—An indictment for perjury in swearing to an answer in chancery, should set out the whole bill and answer. Com. v. Lodge, 2 Gratt. 579.

Evidence Must Be Shown to Be Material.—An indictment for perjury must show that the evidence which the defendant gave was material. And therefore if the evidence which the defendant gave before the grand jury is not shown clearly on the face of the indictment to relate to an offence committed within the county, the indictment is defective. Com. v. Pickering, 8 Gratt. 628; Fitch v. Com., 92 Va. 832, 24 S. E. Rep. 272.

The Day upon Which the Perjury is Committed Must Be Truly Laid.—An indictment for perjury set forth the offence as having been committed on the — day of February in the year 1879. It was insisted that it was essential that the day should be stated. But the court held that while the time of the commission of an offence laid in the indictment is not material, as a general rule, and does not confine the proofs with the limits of that period; yet when any time stated in the indictment is to be proved by matter of record, a variance will be fatal, and in the indictment for perjury the day in which the perjury was committed must be truly laid. And the court further decides that sec. 5, ch. 201, Code 1873, does not dispense with this formality in an indictment for perjury. Rhodes v. Com., 78 Va. 692.

Insolvent Debtor Swearing to Schedule.—And in an indictment against an insolvent debtor for perjury in swearing to a schedule which did not discover certain debts owing to him, if it does not aver that he "well knew and remembered" that the omitted debts were then justly due and owing to him, it would be bad on demurrer. Com. v. Cook, 1 Rob. 729.

Indictment for Perjury Must Charge That the Defendant Swore Falsely.—Moreover, in an indictment for perjury it is indispensably necessary to charge that the defendant swore falsely. Falsity is the main ingredient of the crime. Under sec. 3741 of Code of 1887, it is necessary to charge that the defendant feloniously and wilfully swore falsely, or that he feloniously, wilfully, and falsely swore, or to use in the place of the word "wilful" some word that is its equivalent. An indictment for perjury is not sufficient which simply charges that the defendant did "feloniously, wilfully, and corruptly depose, swear, and testify," although it concludes, whereby the defendant "did then and there, upon the said trial in the city aforesaid, feloniously, wilfully, and corruptly swear falsely and feloniously commit wilful perjury." The latter words are but the averment of a legal inference from what had been stated, and cannot supply the omission of the word "falsely" in the charging part of the indictment. Fitch v. Com., 92 Va. 824, 24 S. E. Rep. 272.

But it is not necessary to aver that the defendant swore positively and absolutely. It is sufficient, where one swears as he thinks, remembers or believes, to negative the fact, that he so thought believed or remembered. Fitch v. Com., 92 Va. 833, 24 S. E. Rep. 272.

2. INFORMATION—WHEN SUFFICIENT.—In Com. v. Stockley, 10 Leigh 678, an information was filed, and a special demurrer assigned among other objections the following: that the information did not aver that the oath alleged to have been taken willfully, corruptly, falsely and maliciously before the honorable Abel P. Upshur, was taken by his the said Charles B. Stockley's own voluntary act, consent or agreement, agreeably to the statute in such cases made and provided. The court held the information sufficient for perjury committed by a juror on his voir dire. The information read as follows: "Commonwealth of Virginia, third judicial circuit, county of Northampton, to wit: Be it remembered that Peter P. Mayo, attorney for the commonwealth of Virginia, prosecuting in the circuit superior court of law and chancery for the said county, cometh into the said court on the 25th day of the month of May in the year 1839, leave of the said court being first had and obtained, and giveth the said court, in his own proper person, to understand and be informed, in behalf of the said commonwealth, that at the circuit superior court of law and chancery begun and held for the said county of Northampton on the 21st of the said month of May in the year 1839, a certain issue was then and there pending between the commonwealth of Virginia and one William Garrison, in a certain plea of felony and larceny, which came on to be tried in due form of law; upon which trial a certain Charles B. Stockley, in the county aforesaid and within the jurisdiction of this court, was duly and legally called upon by George F. Wilkins a deputy sheriff of said county, he the said Charles B. Stockley being then and there a bystander, as a juror, to discharge the duties and function of a juror in the said issue then and there pending between the said commonwealth and the said William Garrison in the said plea of felony and larceny, and he the said Charles B. Stockley was then and there duly sworn on his voir dire in the said circuit superior court of law and chancery for the said county of Northampton, by the said court on the 21st day of the said month of May in the year aforesaid, and took his corporal oath upon the holy gospel of God, before the honorable Abel P. Upshur, judge of the said circuit superior court of law and chancery for the said county of Northampton, then and there holding said court, the said circuit superior court of law and chancery, then and there having competent authority to administer the said oath to the said Charles B. Stockley in that behalf; and he the said Charles B. Stockley, after having duly sworn as aforesaid, was interrogated and enquired of by the said circuit superior court of law and chancery for the said county of Northampton, on the said 21st day of May in the year aforesaid, whether he the said Charles B. Stockley had made up and expressed his opinion touching the guilt or innocence of the said William Garrison of the said larceny and felony. And the said Peter P. Mayo giveth the said court further to understand and be informed that the said Charles B. Stockley, being so sworn as aforesaid, not regarding the laws of this commonwealth, and contriving and intending to prevent the due course of law and justice, then and there, in answer to the said interrogatory then and there propounded to him by the said circuit superior court of law and chancery for the county of Northampton aforesaid, upon his corporal oath aforesaid, wilfully, corruptly, falsely and maliciously, before the said honorable Abel P. Upshur, then and there holding the said circuit superior court of law and chancery for the county of Northampton aforesaid, did swear that he the said Charles B. Stockley had not made up and expressed his opinion touching the guilt or innocence of the said William Garrison of the said larceny and felony, whereas in fact and in truth he the said Charles B. Stockley had, before the said 21st day of May in the year aforesaid, made up and expressed his opinion touching the guilt or innocence of the said William Garrison of the said larceny and felony; to the evil example of all others in like case offending, and against the statute in such cases made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the commonwealth."

B. PROCEDURE.

When Demurrer to Indictment Will Be Sustained.—An indictment for perjury charged that the prisoner in order to get a continuance for the cause pending before the court made an oath before said court that a certain Henry J. Fisher was his counsel engaged in said cause, that the paper needed in said cause was in the possession of the said Henry J. Fisher, when in fact and in truth the said Henry J. Fisher was not the counsel of the prisoner, neither was the paper aforesaid in the possession of the said Henry J. Fisher, but was in truth and in fact in possession of the prisoner at the time of taking the oath aforesaid. That the prisoner on the occasion aforesaid and within the jurisdiction of the circuit court of law and chancery for Jackson county, before Nehemiah Smith and John Kouns, who constituted a court, which court had then and there competent power and authority to administer an oath to the prisoner, by his own voluntarily act and consent did wilfully, corruptly and falsely commit wilful and corrupt perjury to the evil example of all others in like cases offending, contrary to the form of the statute in such cases made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the commonwealth. Upon demurrer the indictment was held bad. Com. v. Roach, 1 Gratt. 561.

LI. POISON.

See ante, "Murder."

How Acts Must Be Alleged.—An indictment for an attempt to administer poison under Va. Code 1887, § 3669, that does not allege such acts as, in a legal sense, constitute an attempt to commit the offence charged, but only such as show preparation, is demurrable. Hicks v. Com., 86 Va. 223, 9 S. E. Rep. 1024.

Poisoning a Well—Not Defective by Reason of Addition of "And Other Persons."—An indictment charged the prisoner with poisoning the well of one Thomas Stewart, by putting therein a certain poison known as "strychnine," in order that the water so poisoned might be drunk by the said Thomas Stewart and other persons, with intent to kill and injure the said Thomas Stewart and other persons. The prisoner demurred to the indictment on the ground that the use of the words "and other persons" was not a sufficient designation of said other persons, whose names were well known at the time of the finding of the indictment. The court held that under § 3997 of the Va. Code of 1887, providing that where an intention to injure, defraud, or cheat is required to constitute an offence, an indictment is sufficient which alleges the intent generally, and that it shall not be necessary to name the person intended to be injured; that therefore an indictment for poisoning a well, alleging an intent to injure Stewart "and other persons" is not defective by reason of the addition of the latter clause. Davis v. Com., 99 Va. —, 38 S. E. Rep. 191.

Naming the Person Injured—The Word "Injured" Used in § 3997 Opposite to Poisoning.—Section 3997 of the Virginia Code 1887, declaring that "where an intent to injure, defraud or cheat is required to constitute an offence" it shall not be necessary to name, in an indictment, the name of the person intended to be injured, defrauded or cheated, applies to an indictment for an attempt to poison. The word "injure" is more opposite to the offence of poisoning or attempting to poison, than to forgery, cheating and like offences. Davis v. Com. (Va. 1901), 99 Va. —, 7 Va. Law Reg. 495.

LII. RAPE AND ATTEMPT TO RAPE.

A. IN GENERAL.

Form.—An indictment for rape in the words of Va. Code 1887, § 3680, defining the offence, is sufficient. Smith v. Com., 85 Va. 924, 9 S. E. Rep. 148.

So where an indictment for rape follows the usual form, and is in substance sufficiently specific to put defendant fairly on trial for the offence charged, a demurrer thereto is properly overruled. Mitchell v. Com., 89 Va. 826, 17 S. E. Rep. 480.

And in an indictment under the third section of the act against rape passed 8th February, 1819, if the charge is for carnally knowing and abusing a female child under ten, instead of a woman child, it is good after verdict. Com. v. Bennet, 2 Va. Cas. 235.

Idem Sonans.—If an indictment charges that a rape was committed upon Helen Frances Davis, and the true name is Helen Francis Davids; but the proof is, she was as frequently called the first, in the community, as the last, the proof of the rape upon Helen Frances Davids is admissible under the indictment. Taylor v. Com., 20 Gratt. 825.

Surplusage.—The third section of the act against rape passed February 8th, 1819, applied only to rape on a female under ten years of age, and applied whether she consented or not. If the count of an indictment, under the third section charged more than was necessary (as that the prisoner "forcibly ravished," and that it was done "against the will, and without the consent" of the person on whom it was committed), that fact may be rejected as surplusage. Com. v. Bennet, 2 Va. Cas. 235.

And the record of the finding of the grand jury, saying, in commission of rape, which was on the indictment, is mere surplusage. Thompson v. Com., 20 Gratt. 724.

What Averments Are Essential Ingredients.

Alleging Person to Be Free and White.—In indictments under statutes, which enact a punishment against free persons, different from that of slaves, as in rape, it is not necessary to allege that the prisoner is a free person. Com. v. Bennet, 2 Va. Cas. 235.

"Unlawfully" Committed.—The omission to state in an indictment under the act of February, 1819, § 3, that the offence was committed unlawfully, is cured by the statute of jeofails. Com. v. Bennet, 2 Va. Cas. 235.

Effect of Omisson of the Word "Female."—An indictment for rape did not charge that it was committed on a female, but the name given was a woman's name, and the indictment used the pronouns "she" and "her," in speaking of the person upon whom the rape was committed: it was held that though it would have been better to use the word "female," as it is the word used in the statute, yet the language used sufficiently showed that the rape was committed on a female, and was therefore good. Taylor v. Com., 20 Gratt. 825.

"Ravish" Is a Technical, Therefore Necessary Word.—It seems to be well settled that the word "ravish" is a technical term and necessary to be employed in the description of the offence in an indictment for rape, and the omission thereof will not be supplied by an averment that the offender did "carnally know." Christian v. Com., 23 Gratt. 954. However, it seems that in an indictment for an attempt to commit rape under sec. 10, ch. 199, Va. Code 1860, as amended by ch. 45, Acts 1871-72, the word "ravish" as descriptive of the offence attempted, was not necessary, but the words attempting "feloniously carnally to know," were sufficient. Christian v. Com., 23 Gratt. 954.

B. ATTEMPT TO RAPE.

In General—What Description Requisite.—In an indictment for an attempt to commit rape it is necessary to describe the offence which the accused is charged with having attempted to commit, with the same legal precision and certainty, and in the terms, with which it is necessary to describe it in an indictment for the commission of the offence itself. As it is necessary to use the technical word "ravish" in an indictment for the offence itself, so is it necessary to use it in the description of the offence in an indictment for an attempt to commit rape and the omission of it will not be supplied by an averment that the offender did "carnally know." Christian v. Com., 23 Gratt. 954.

Thus, an indictment for an assault with intent to rape, which alleges that the defendant violently and feloniously made an assault on a female and feloniously did attempt to ravish her and carnally know her, against her will and by force, sufficiently charges an act done towards the commission of the offence. Cunningham v. Com., 86 Va. 37, 13 S. E. Rep. 309.

When an Indictment Lies.—The Virginia Assembly in the session of 1822-23, enacted a law, providing that if any free negro attempt by force or fraud to have carnal knowledge of a white female, he should be punished, at the discretion of the jury, either with death, or by confinement in the penitentiary, not less than five nor more than twenty years. Va. Code 1849, § 1. In Fields' Case, 4 Leigh 648 (1832), a free negro was indicted for violently and feloniously making an assault upon, and attempting to ravish, a white woman. The jury found the following special verdict: "We find, from the evidence, that the prisoner did not intend to have carnal knowledge of the within named S. L., as alleged in the indictment, 'by force,' but that he intended to have such carnal knowledge of her 'while she was asleep'; that he made the attempt to have such carnal knowledge of her when she was asleep, but used no force except such as was incident to getting in bed with her, and stripping up her night garment in which she was sleeping, and which caused her to awake. If the law be for the prisoner upon this finding, then we find him not guilty; but if against him, then we find him guilty, and, in that case, if the offence be not punishable by death, but by confinement in the public jail and penitentiary house, we ascertain the term of his imprisonment therein, to be six years." The court found for the prisoner.

It is impossible from the statement of the case to ascertain fully the facts upon which the verdict was rendered. The jury found as a fact that the prisoner did not "intend to have carnal knowledge by force,"—and as either "force" or "fraud" must be present in order to constitute the offence under the statute upon the authority of which the prisoner was indicted, and neither being found by the jury, as declared in their verdict, expressly so as to "force," and impliedly as to "fraud," as there was no mention of it, the court was doubtless correct in acquitting the prisoner. Nevertheless, the verdict of the jury is misleading. They found that the prisoner did not intend to have carnal knowledge, "by force," but that he did intend to have such carnal knowledge of the woman "while she was asleep." This latter clause is confusing, and unless other material facts known to the jury, but not stated in the case, were found, the assumption that there was "no force" intended is controverted by such latter finding. If the facts were that the prisoner intended to have intercourse with the woman without her consent, and in the prosecution of such purpose, crept into bed with her, and stripped up her night garments intending to gratify his passion while she was asleep, at which point he was thwarted, there seems no escape from the conclusion that the elements of an attempt to rape are present.

At common law force is an ingredient of the crime. By numerous common-law authorities it is held that, if a woman is violated during sleep, or whilst stupefied by inebriation, narcotics, or in a fit when consent cannot be presumed, the force necessarily incident to the act is enough to constitute rape. 1 Whart. Cr. L. (8th Ed.), § 3566 et seq.; Min. Syn. Cr. 73, and authorities cited. Force as a necessary element of crime, as in rape, must not be physical; it may be mental occasioned by threats or the like. 2 Whart. Cr. Law, 1808; Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (1st Ed.) vol. 8, p. 99. To ascertain the intent inferences must necessarily be drawn from the declarations, threats, acts and other circumstances in connection with the accused's conduct in relation to the deed. The facts as they appear in the verdict of the principal case, would seem, upon such bare statement, which leaves them free from modifying circumstances, to justify the inference that the prisoner intended to know the woman carnally without her consent; and this intent as inferred from the force incidental to preparation for the accomplishment of the act, is sufficient to constitute the "element of force" requisite for the crime. The several elements constituting an attempt to commit a crime consist of (1) The intent (and by the hypothesis, this is inferred from the conduct, declarations, threats, and circumstances); (2) a direct, ineffectual act towards its commission; and that act must reach far enough towards the accomplishment of the desired result to amount to the commencement of the consummation. See Hicks v. Com., 86 Va. 223, 9 S. E. Rep. 1024. Reverting to the facts again as reported and applying this test, an attempt seems present. The pivotal point upon which the whole question turns in its last analysis seems to be the "intent." In the above discussion this has been assumed as an inference justified by the statement of the facts in the verdict. Reading between the lines, however, and assuming the existence of other facts, known to the jury, but not set forth in the verdict, the preponderance of evidence may have justified the jury in inferring that no intent to use force, or have carnal knowledge without the female's consent, was present. Thus, if it had been shown in evidence that the woman was the accused's concubine, or that he had visited her on other occasions and had intercourse with her, there would be a prima facie presumption that her consent continued, which presumption might be strong enough to rebut the presumption that he intended to have carnal knowledge without the consent of the woman. Other sets of circumstances producing similar results might be assumed, some of which may have appeared in the evidence given at the hearing of the principal case. If such were true the absence of the mental element necessary to make out the crime could be inferred by the jury, and properly so. Some such extenuating circumstance was doubtless shown to the satisfaction of the jury, but the case as stated is silent as to such facts, thus creating a degree of confusion.

Necessary Allegations.—An indictment for an attempt to commit rape should show acts done, not merely to obtain the consent of the female, but showing a purpose to ravish her against her consent. They are necessary elements or constituents of the crime of an attempt. Christian v. Com., 23 Gratt. 954.

So in an indictment for an attempt to commit rape under sec. 3888, of Va. Code of 1887, some act towards the commission of the offence must be alleged, and at the trial proved; but it is sufficient to aver that the accused "violently and feloniously made an assault" in the attempt. Cunningham v. Com., 88 Va. 37, 13 S. E. Rep. 309.

And in an indictment against a black man, for feloniously attempting to ravish a white woman, it was held that the indictment was bad even after verdict unless it averred that she was a white woman.. 1 Rev. Code 1819, p. 585, sec. 4; Com. v. Mann, 2 Va. Cas. 210.

But it seems that in an indictment for an attempt to commit-rape under sec. 10, of ch. 199 of the Va. Code of 1860, as amended by ch. 45 of Acts of Assembly of 1871-72, the word "ravish," descriptive of the offence attempted was not necessary, but the words attempting "feloniously carnally to know," are sufficient. It seems otherwise when the indictment is for rape. Christian v. Com., 23 Gratt. 954.

C. PROCEDURE.

Finding under Indictment for Rape.—On an indictment for rape, the jury may find the accused not guilty of rape, but guilty of an attempt to commit rape. Givens v. Com., 29 Gratt. 830; Glover v. Com., 86 Va. 382, 10 S. E. Rep. 420.

LIII. RESCUE.

An indictment at common law charged the defendant with rescuing property that had been distrained by a sheriff for public dues, from a bailee to whose safe keeping the sheriff had committed it, without charging that the defendant knew in what right the bailee held it. The indictment was defective for not averring that the defendant had such knowledge. And such defect is not cured by verdict, by the statute of jeofails in criminal cases. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 169, § 44; Com. v. Israel, 4 Leigh 675.

LIV. RELIGIOUS MEETINGS.

An indictment for disturbing a religious congregation need not set out the means by which the disturbance and disquieting was effected. Thus, in Com. v. Daniels, 2 Va. Cas. 402 (1824), an indictment was found in the following words: "Virginia, Lewis county, to wit: Jurors for the commonwealth of Virginia, and for the county of Lewis, upon their oath, that William Daniels, late of the county of Lewis, yeoman, on the sixth day of October, in the year of our Lord 1822, with force and arms, at a place commonly called the Flat Woods, in the county of Lewis, within the jurisdiction of the superior court of law for said county of Lewis, during religious worship, did, on purpose, maliciously, and contemptuously disquiet and disturb, a certain congregation of Methodists, being then and there lawfully assembled for the purpose of religious worship, in contempt of public worship, to the evil example of all others in like cases offending, contrary to the form of the statute in that case made and provided, against the peace and dignity of the commonwealth." The defendant demurred to this indictment. It was held that an indictment for disturbing a religious congregation need not set out the means by which the disturbing was effected.

LV. ROBBERY.

Common-Law Form Sufficient.—An indictment clearly charging the felonious and forcible taking, by the accused, from the person of William Meyers, of the money and goods to the value specified, by violence, and putting him, the said Meyers in fear, and that the money and goods thus taken were the property of said Meyers, was demurred to on the ground that it did not charge the offence of "statutory robbery." The court held that there is in Virginia no such thing as "statutory robbery"; that § 3674, of the Code of 1887, does not create or define, but simply modifies the punishment of the common-law crime of robbery, by authorizing the jury, at their discretion, to substitute for the prescribed punishment of death, imprisonment in the penitentiary for the term of not less than eight nor more than eighteen years; that the offence, with all its essential elements as defined at common law, is set forth with substantial accuracy, and as robbery under our statute differs in no respect from robbery at the common law an indictment, good as a common-law indictment, is good also under our statute. Houston v. Com., 87 Va. 257, 12 S. E. Rep. 385.

When Charge Sufficient.—An indictment alleging the felonious and forcible, taking by the accused from the person of another, of goods and money of a named value, by violence and putting him in fear, and that such goods and money were the property of such other person, is a sufficient charge of robbery at common law. Houston v. Com., 87 Va. 527, 12 S. E. Rep. 385.

Description of Property Stolen.—In an indictment for robbery, "silver coin of the value of $2.00" is a sufficient description of the property taken. And upon the trial of such an indictment it is proper to permit the party, from whom the coin was taken, to give evidence as to the number and value of the pieces taken. State v. Jackson, 26 W. Va. 250.

Finding of Assault under Indictment for Robbery.—An indictment may be fatally defective as an indictment for robbery, yet good for an assault. Moreover, if such indictment attempts to charge the offence of robbery and is bad for that offence and charges an assault, it is good for the lesser offence, and a motion to quash such indictment is properly overruled. State v. Howes, 26 W. Va. 110.

Thus, an indictment for robbery, which charged that the prisoners "did make an assault upon G, and one gold watch did take, etc., from the person and against the will of G, etc., feloniously and violently did steal," the jury acquitted the prisoners of the felony charged, but found them guilty of assault and battery. The defendant moved in arrest of judgment, because the verdict found them guilty of assault and battery, which was no part of the charge set forth in the indictment. The court held the finding valid under Va. Code 1860, ch. 208, § 27. Hardy v. Com., 17 Gratt. 592.

And in State v. Howes, 26 W. Va. 111, the defendant was indicted for robbery; but the indictment failed to charge, that the property was taken from the person forcibly and against the will of the party from whom taken. The indictment was admitted by the state to be bad as an indictment for robbery; and it was insisted that as the indictment was bad as an indictment for robbery, it was also bad for an assault, and should be quashed. The jury found the defendant not guilty of the felony charged; but found him guilty of an assault. The court decided that while the indictment falls short of charging the crime of robbery, it clearly charges an assault, for which the defendant was convicted, and the defendant certainly has no right to complain, because he was not legally charged with the crime of robbery as well as for the assault, which would necessarily precede that crime. If the indictment properly charges an assault, the surplusage contained in the indictment by reason of an unsuccessful attempt to charge the higher crime will not vitiate it for the lesser one, which is well charged.

LVI. SABBATH BREAKING.

When Indictment Lies against a Corporation—Statute.—Under the W. Va. Code in force in 1879, §§ 16, 17, ch. 149, it was held in State v. B. & O. R. Co., 15 W. Va. 362 (1879), that a corporation could be indicted for "Sabbath breaking." The indictment was against the railroad company for laboring at its trade by running over its track on Sunday certain cars loaded with coal. But it seems that under the present W. Va. Code a railroad company cannot now be indicted for running trains on Sunday. There is no law to sustain such indictment, as there has been a material change in the statutes relating to the violation of the Sabbath, since the decision of State v. B. & O. R. Co., 15 W. Va. 362. Thus, in State v. N. & W. R. Co., 33 W. Va. 440, 10 S. E. Rep. 813, the N. & W. Railroad Company was indicted on a similar charge to that made against the B. & O. R. Company in 15 W. Va. 362, viz.: for laboring at its usual calling, that of a common carrier, running over its road loaded cars on Sunday, the same not being used in household or other work of necessity or charity, for the transportation of the mail, or of passengers or their baggage. The court said: "We hold that this proposition cannot be sustained. Since the decisions of this court in the case of State v. Railroad Company, 15 W. Va. 362, 24 W. Va. 783, sustaining a prosecution against a railroad company for running trains on Sunday, the statute relating to the subject has been greatly changed by chapter 123, Acts 1882. Sections 16, 17, chapter 149, as found in the Codes of 1868, 1887, respectively, which reads as follows," etc. The court here cited in its opinion the statutes referred to, and compared them, showing a variance between them, and concluded that the change made by subsequent acts, prevented any indictment being sustained against a corporation for carrying on its usual business on the Sabbath day. For provisions of Virginia laws relating to Sunday, see Va. Code 1887, §§ 3799, 3801, 3805, 3806; also, W. Va. Code 1899, ch. 149, §§ 16, 17.

Same—What Must Be Alleged Therein.—In an indictment against a railroad company for being found laboring at its trade and calling on a certain Sabbath day it is proper and necessary to allege, that such labor was not in household work or other work of necessity or charity; but it is not necessary to allege that the defendant did not conscientiously believe that the seventh day of the week ought to be observed as a Sabbath, or that it did not refrain from all secular labor on that day, or that the labor was not done in the transportation of the mail, or of passengers or their baggage. The indictment is not defective in failing to state that the defendant did not conscientiously believe the seventh day of the week ought to be observed as a Sabbath, etc. The rule is, "that where exceptions are in the enacting part of a law, it must in the indictment be charged that the defendant is not in any of them: but what comes in by way of proviso in a statute must be insisted on for the purpose of defense by the party accused." See Hill's Case, 5 Gratt. 682. The provision contained in the 17th section of ch. 149 of W Va. Code, in force in 1879, is in the nature of a proviso. It is not an exception in the enacting part of the law; and it was therefore unnecessary to notice it in the indictment, even if the indictment had been against a natural person. As a corporation cannot have a conscientious belief in reference to religious questions, the proviso has no application to this case: and had it even been inserted in the enacting clause in the 16th section, it would not have been proper to have noticed it in this indictment. It is clear that the court did not err in refusing to continue the case upon the facts stated in the first exception. State v. B. & O. R. Co., 15 W. Va. 362.

Same—Proof Necessary to Sustain Indictment.—But it is not necessary to sustain an indictment against a corporation for Sabbath breaking, under the 16th and 17th sections of ch. 149 of the W. Va. Code, in force in 1879, to prove that the act charged was done on the particular day named in the indictment: it is sufficient to prove that the defendant labored in its trade or calling as alleged in the indictment on a Sabbath day within one year before the finding of the indictment against it, and that such labor was not in household or other work of necessity or charity, unless it appears that the defendant is within one of the exceptions of the 17th section of ch. 149 of the Code of this state. State v. B. & O. R. R. Co., 15 W. Va. 362.

However, it is not sufficiently sustained by proving that a part of a load of coal was transported over the railroad on the day named in the indictment: but the assent of the corporation to the Sabbath breaking, must be shown by proving that such Sabbath breaking was habitual or by other satisfactory evidence, and such assent cannot be inferred from a single breach of the Sabbath by the authorized agents of the company while acting within the scope of their employment.

Nevertheless, if on the trial a defendant corporation proves that by a general order it directed its agent and employees not to ship anything except live stock and perishable freight on the Sabbath day, the jury may nevertheless find the defendant guilty, if by proof of the habitual running of freight trains about the time the offence was committed, or from other satisfactory evidence, the jury are satisfied that the running of such trains in violation of such general order met the assent of the corporation. State v. B. & O. R. R. Co., 15 W. Va. 362.

LVII. SALES.

Without License.—An indictment which charges that the defendant "unlawfully did sell music not manufactured by the seller, within the state, without having a license therefor according to law," is good, it sufficiently appearing that music is a species of goods, wares and merchandise. Com. v. Nax, 13 Gratt. 789.

And an information under the 1st sec. of the Act of February 13, 1866, Sess. Acts 1865-66, p. 82, ch. 2, in relation to the assessment of taxes on licenses, must allege that the sale was "for profit or on commission or for other compensation," or it will be fatally defective on demurrer or on motion in arrest of judgment. Cousins v. Com., 19 Gratt. 807.

Moreover, an information for retailing merchandise without a license, concludes by claiming a penalty imposed by the statute; and upon the trial, the jury find the defendant guilty, they should assess the fine. If the jury merely find the defendant guilty, no judgment can be entered on the verdict; but it should be set aside by the court, and a new trial awarded. Com. v. Scott, 5 Gratt. 696.

LVIII. SLAVES.

An indictment under the statute, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 111, sec. 13, p. 424, for allowing more than five slaves, other than his own, to be and remain at one time on the defendant's premises, need not charge that it was without consent of the owners of the slaves. Com. v. Foster, 5 Gratt. 695.

And in an indictment for advising slaves to escape from their masters, it is improper to admit evidence to prove that the prisoner was guilty of advising the slaves of another person, not named in the indictment, to abscond. Cole v. Com., 5 Gratt. 696.

LIX. STABBING.

See ante, "Assault and Battery."

On an indictment for unlawful stabbing under the statute of Virginia, a verdict of "guilty of unlawful stabbing," will not authorize a judgment; but the court should direct a new trial. Marshall v. Com., 5 Gratt. 663.

LX. SEDUCTION.

In General.—Before the Statute of Circumspecte-agatis, 13 Edw. 1, the Court of King's Bench punished offences of incontinency, but since that statute, the cognizance of such offences, has been transferred to the ecclesiastical courts.

As held in Anderson v. Com., 5 Rand. 627 (1826), the offences of adultery, fornication and the like, could not be punished by our courts of law, as common-law offences, unless they be accompanied with other circumstances, which of themselves constitute a misdemeanor; such as the public commission of the act, or a conspiracy. The statutory offence must be punished according to the statute. The seduction and abduction of a female over sixteen years of age, being not within the statute cannot be punished by indictment. It would be otherwise if a conspiracy had been charged. Since this decision, which was in 1824, by the general court, the law has been materially changed. The Va. Acts of 1877-8, p. 283, § 16, Va. Code 1887, § 3877, provide that, any person who shall seduce and have illicit connection with an unmarried female of previous chaste character, shall be guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by confinement in the penitentiary not less than two nor more than ten years. And as Va. Code 1887, § 3990, provides that no person shall be put upon trial for any felony unless an indictment shall have first been found by a grand jury in a court of competent jurisdiction, it follows that a prosecution now for seduction, must be on an indictment. See Hausenfluck v. Com., 85 Va. 702, 8 S. E. Rep. 683.

Variance.—Though one count in an indictment charges the seduction to have been committed on a certain day and another count charges the same offence to have been committed on a different day, the same offence is charged in each count, and the only difference is as to the time of its commission, such an indictment is good upon demurrer. And it is not error to refuse to compel an election between the dates. Hausenfluck v. Com., 85 Va. 702, 8 S. E. Rep. 683.

Misjoinder.—The first count in an indictment for seduction charged the crime to have been committed on the 24th day of May, 1886, and the second charged "afterwards, to wit, on the 20th day of June in the year 1886," etc., the crime was committed. The indictment was demurred to on the ground of misjoinder of counts. The court overruled the demurrer, saying as follows: "In this case each count sets forth the same crime as committed on different days, and there was no misjoinder of counts, and the court properly exercised its discretion in not quashing the indictment or either count, and in not confining the evidence to any particular day." Hausenfluck v. Com., 85 Va. 702, 8 S. E. Rep. 683.

Election between Counts.—An indictment for seduction charged the crime to have been committed at different times in different counts. A motion was made to compel the state to elect on which count it would prosecute the prisoner. The court held as follows: "The indictment in this case charged the same offence in each count, and the only difference is as to the time of its commission. This could not be two offences. The offence could only be committed once between the same parties, and, while the second count might have been, and probably was unnecessary, it could in no wise confound the accused nor distract the jury," and the motion was overruled. Hausenfluck v. Com., 85 Va. 702, 8 S. E. Rep. 683.

LXI. SHOOTING.

See ante, "Mayhem"; also, "Assault and Battery."

Averments—"Feloniously Done."—An indictment for malicious shooting, ought to charge that it was done feloniously, and this under the Act of 1817, which does not in terms declare it a felony, but makes it punishable with penitentiary confinement. Trimble v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 143.

Intent.—Although the statute against unlawful shooting, etc., affixes a penalty when the act is done with the intent to maim, disfigure, disable or kill (in the disjunctive), yet the indictment should charge the intents conjunctively. Although all of the intents be laid, yet proof of either supports the indictment. Angel v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 231.

And if a person indicted for shooting another with intent to maim, disfigure, disable and kill him, and under the W. Va. Acts of 1881, ch. 29, § 1, takes the stand as a witness in his own behalf, it is competent to ask him, with what intent he shot at the person he tried to shoot. State v. Meadows, 18 W. Va. 659.

Variance.—If A is indicted for shooting C with intent to maim, disfigure, disable or kill him, and the proof is, that he shot at B and missed and accidently hit C, he can be convicted on such indictment for shooting C with intent to maim, disfigure, disable, and kill him. But if A is indicted for an attempt to shoot C with intent to maim, disfigure, disable, and kill him, and C is not in fact shot, and the proof is that the attempt was to shoot B, and not C, he cannot be convicted under the indictment. State v. Meadows, 18 W. Va. 659.

Surplusage.—In State v. Newsom, 13 W. Va. 859, there was an indictment under the act concerning malicious and unlawful shooting, etc., contained in the W. Va. Code 1869, ch. 144, § 9, which charged, that the prisoner, "with a certain pistol or revolver, etc., feloniously and with his malice aforethought did shoot one Lewis Dempsey, Jr., with intent," etc. The jury found the prisoner "guilty of unlawful shooting, with intent," etc., without saying whom he shot, and fixed the term of his imprisonment in the penitentiary at one year. The supreme court held that the lower court did not err in overruling the motion to quash, and in overruling the demurrer to the indictment, because, although it alleged the weapon in the alternative as a "pistol or revolver," the expression "or revolver" was mere surplusage, and could be rejected, and therefore need not be proved.

So where upon the indictment under the act concerning malicious and unlawful shooting, etc. (W. Va. Code 1869, ch. 144, § 9), which charges, that the prisoner, "with a certain pistol or revolver, etc., feloniously and with his malice aforethought did shoot one Lewis Dempsey, Jr., with intent," etc., the jury found the prisoner "guilty of unlawful shooting, with intent," etc., without saying whom he shot, and fixed the term of his imprisonment in the penitentiary at one year, it is not error for the court to overrule a motion to quash; and to overrule a demurrer to the indictment, because, although it alleges the weapon in the alternative, as a "pistol or a revolver," the expression "or revolver," is mere surplusage, and should be rejected, and therefore does not have to be proved. State v. Newsom, 13 W. Va. 859.

Malicious Wounding, etc., May Be Proved.—Under sec. 4040 of Va. Code of 1887, a prisoner indicted for malicious cutting and wounding with intent to maim, disfigure, disable, and kill, may be convicted of unlawful cutting and wounding with such intent, or merely of assault and battery, if the evidence introduced prove such offences. Montgomery v. Com., 98 Va. 840, 36 S. E. Rep. 371; Canada v. Com., 22 Gratt. 899.

LXII. TRESPASSES.

See ante, "Assault and Battery"; also, "Shooting."

A person indicted for a trespass, with force and arms, may be prosecuted to outlawry. Com. v. Hale, 2 Va. Cas. 241.

What Must Be Alleged in an Indictment for Unlawful Trespass.—And an indictment under § 1, ch. 34, of the statute of 1822-23, for punishing willful trespassers, must allege that the property taken away by the defendant belonged to another person. Com. v. Israel, 4 Leigh 675.

Indictment for Malicious Trespass—Not Error to Omit Words "But Not Feloniously."—However, in an indictment for malicious trespass, it is not error to omit the words "but not feloniously," these words not constituting any part of the description or definition of the offence, but inserted out of abundant caution to exclude the possible conclusion or inference that the legislature intended thereby to confound malicious trespasses with felonies. Dye v. Com., 7 Gratt. 662.

677 *Sherman v. The Commonwealth.

April Term, 1858, Richmond.

Escaped Prisoner—Writ of Error Already Obtained—Action of Appellate Court.*—A prisoner convicted of a felony obtains a writ of error, which is directed to operate as a supersedeas: and he then escapes from jail. The appellate court will discharge so much of the order awarding the writ of error as directed it to operate as a supersedeas to the judgment. And will further direct that the writ of error be dismissed by a certain day, unless it shall be made to appear to the court by that day, that the plaintiff in error is in custody of the proper officer of the law.

John W. Sherman was indicted, tried and convicted in the Circuit court of Culpeper county, for a felony in advising a slave to abscond from his master; and he was sentenced to six years' imprisonment in the penitentiary. From this judgment he obtained a writ of error from this court, which was directed to operate as a supersedeas to the judgment. Whilst the case was pending in this court the prisoner broke jail, and absconded. And then the attorney general moved the court for a rule upon the prisoner to show cause why the court should not set aside the supersedeas, or postpone the hearing of the cause until the prisoner should return to the proper custody; and the same was made.

The motion was argued by The Attorney General, for the commonwealth, and by Wellford, for the prisoner.

ALLEN, P., delivered the judgment of the court:

The argument as well of the attorney general in support of said rule, as of the counsel who appeared for the plaintiff in error in opposition thereto, having been maturely considered, and it appearing that said *plaintiff in error has 678 since the judgment of conviction escaped from custody and is still at large, it is considered by the court that so much of the order awarding the writ of error in this case as directed it to operate as a supersedeas to the judgment of conviction in the petition set forth, be discharged; and it is further ordered, that said writ of error be dismissed on the first day of May next, unless it shall be made to appear to this court, on or before the day last aforesaid, that said plaintiff in error is in custody of the proper officer of the law.

Ordered, that a copy of this order be certified to the Circuit court of Culpeper county.

out-house within the enclosure of a tavern lot, which had at one time been used in connection with the tavern, and the room over which is still so used, having been rented by a third party and held, used and controlled by him, independent of the proprietor of the tavern, though the occupier boarded at the tavern, and the servants belonging to it attended to the room, is not a part of the ordinary, nor is it a public place, in the sense of the act, Code, ch. 198, § 4, p. 748.†

This was a presentment in the Circuit court of Henry county, at the April term 1857, against Andrew J., Purcell and seven others, for that they "did play at an unlawful game with card at the ordinary of Pernella A. Mead in Martinsville in said county of Henry." Purcell's case was tried separately, and there was a verdict and judgment for the commonwealth.

After the verdict Purcell moved the court to set it aside and grant him a new trial, on the ground that the evidence did not warrant the verdict. But the court overruled the motion, and he excepted.

The only question was whether the place where the playing was done was a part of the ordinary in the sense of the statute. The playing was in a room held and occupied at the time by Hill C. Redd as a law office. This office was on the premises on which is situated the tavern-house of Mrs. Mead, a licensed tavern-keeper, about 680 thirty yards distant from the *same, and within the enclosure around the tavern-house. The playing was in the night time, and after the business hours of the occupant of the office were over; and when it took place, the doors and windows were closed, and no noise or loud talking occurred during the time. Redd had rented the said office, which is on the front floor, from the proprietor of the tavern, for and during the year in which the playing took place, at thirty dollars a year, and he had the exclusive control of the office during that time, and furnished his own bed and lights for said time; but himself and said room were attended by the servants of the ordinary. He was at the time of the playing a boarder, contracted for at the time of renting the room, at said ordinary, under a contract separate from, but made at the same time with the renting of the room; and by the terms of said renting he was to have the right to hold and occupy said office, whether or not he continued to board at said ordinary, until the end of the year. Before said renting the room was held and used for the accommodation of guests at the ordinary; and the room above said office was during the same time, so used.

Upon the application of Purcell, this court granted him a writ of error to the judgment.

Grattan, for the appellant.

The Attorney General, for the commonwealth.

DANIEL, J. The prosecution in this case was had under the 4th section of chapter 198 of the Code, by which a fine of thirty dollars is imposed on any free person who, at an ordinary, race-field or other public place, shall play at any game except bowls, chess, backgammon, draughts, or a licensed game. And the specific charge was for playing at an unlawful game, with cards, at the ordinary of Mrs. Mead in Mar-681 tinsville *in the county of Henry. The playing at a game with cards was proved; but it was not proved that there was any betting on the game, and the issue was narrowed to the enquiry, whether the room in which the playing took place, was in the contemplation of the statute a part of the ordinary.

The establishment of an ordinary may be composed of several houses, or it may be kept in a single house, or in a part of a house; the other portions being held in a different right, and appropriated to an independent business or use.

If we suppose a sale or lease, for the purposes of an ordinary, of a portion only of an establishment, the whole of which, previous thereto, was held and occupied as a private dwelling, the remaining portion thereof being still retained and occupied by the vendor or lessor as before, for his own exclusive use, it could hardly be maintained in such a case that the vendor or lessor, his family or guests, for a mere playing at cards, in a house or room belonging to the part so retained, could be convicted of gaming at an ordinary.

Without a statute so declaring, would the rule be changed by merely reversing the order, in the holding of the establishment, and supposing that the house or room, though at one time constituting a part of an ordinary, is, at the time of the playing, in the exclusive occupancy of a party, who, under a sale or lease, has in good faith converted such house or room into a private dwelling? I should think not.

In the absence of such a statute, no good reason is perceived why, when the business of the ordinary is conducted in several houses, one or more of them, or, when the ordinary is kept in one house only, one or more of its apartments might not by a sale or lease and an exclusive dedication to other purposes, be to all legal intents severed and disconnected from the ordinary. And (in such a state of the law) the true en-682 quiry *in a case of the kind before us would seem to be, not whether at some time previous thereto, the house or room in question constituted a part of the ordinary, or was held as an appendage thereto, or used in connection with it, in the conduct of its business, but whether at the time of the playing such was in truth the case.

If at the time of the playing such house or room be in the occupancy of a party who, having no concern or interest in the business of the ordinary, has honestly bought or leased it and appropriated it to his own private and exclusive use, a conviction for such playing would seem to me to be unwarranted either by the letter or spirit of a law which prohibits such playing only when it takes place at "an ordinary, race-field or other public place."

In comparing the 198th chapter of the Code of 1849 with the 147th chapter of the Code of 1819, it will be seen that the two statutes vary from each other materially in their mode of treating the subject under consideration. The act of 1819, after prohibiting the playing at any game except bowls, &c., in an ordinary, &c., in the 5th section, proceeds, afterwards in the 16th section, to declare that every house, out-house, booth, arbor, garden and place within the curtilage of the principal house, tavern, messuage or tenement, or in any wise appurtenant thereto, or at any time held therewith, shall be considered as a part of the tavern, unless the same shall have been bona fide leased to some other person, by deed indented and recorded, &c. But in the act of 1849 there is no declaration as to what shall be deemed and taken to be parts of the ordinary. It is true, that in the 6th and 7th sections of the last mentioned act, a fine is imposed on a keeper of an ordinary or house of entertainment, for permitting unlawful gaming at his house or at any out-house, booth or arbor, or other place appurtenant thereto or held there-
683 with; *and it is declared that in a prosecution therefor, if the gaming be proved, it shall be presumed that it was permitted by the keeper of the house, unless it appear that he did not know of or suspect such gaming, or that he endeavored to prevent it, and gave information against the players. And in the 8th section, it is further provided that if the keeper of such a house let or hire to another person any out-house or other place which has been at any time appurtenant to or held with the house kept by him, with intent that unlawful gaming be permitted thereat, he shall suffer the same punishment and incur the same forfeiture as if such unlawful gaming were permitted at his own principal house; and in a prosecution therefor, if the gaming be proved, it shall be presumed that such out-house or other place was let or hired with intent aforesaid, unless the presumption be repelled in the manner mentioned in the 7th section; which (as we have seen) is by its being made to appear that he did not know of or suspect such gaming, or that he endeavored to prevent it, and gave information against the players. But these sections are obviously pointed at the keeper of the house alone. They make him responsible for the offence of unlawful gaming, when committed by other persons at the houses and places mentioned, even though such houses or places be at the time rented out, unless he exculpate himself in the manner indicated; but they do not declare in what the offence of unlawful gaming consists. That offence, whether its illegality arises from the character of the game, or the character of the place at which the game is played, is defined in the preceding section of the chapter. The offence of playing at an unlawful game and the offence of permitting such game to be played by others, are distinct and substantive offences; and they are made the subject of distinct and separate sections. Having given the definition of unlawful gam-
684 ing, and disposed *apparently of that offence in distinct and appropriate sections of the chapter, we can hardly suppose, in the absence of plain indications of such an intent, that it was the purpose of the legislature to assign to subsequent sections, devoted in terms to another offence, the task of enlarging by implication the definition of the first mentioned offence. Such a mode of legislating upon the subject would be irregular and illogical, and obviously inconsistent with the general scheme and structure of the statute.

As a means of suppressing the vice of unlawful gaming, and of removing it as far as possible from places of public resort, it was altogether competent and proper for the legislature to enjoin it upon every keeper of an ordinary, as a duty, to give information of all commissions of the offence occurring not only at all places connected with his ordinary and within his control, but also at all places which may have been at any time held with the ordinary, though at the time of the commission of the offence, they may be in the exclusive use and occupancy of persons who under bona fide leases have severed them from all connection with the business of the ordinary; but there arises no necessary implication that in doing this the legislature meant to indicate that a mere playing with cards at any of the places last mentioned, should be deemed and taken as a playing at an ordinary, and so be treated as unlawful gaming.

If it had been the purpose of the legislature to make any distinction between a mere playing with cards at a private house, never held with or in any manner connected with an ordinary, and a like playing at a private house, which, though at some time so held or connected, is at the time of the playing in the occupancy of a tenant in good faith renting and holding it for his own lawful and exclusive use, it is but reasonable to suppose they would have declared such 685 *purpose in plain and unambiguous terms. They have made no such declaration; and after allowing to the statute the benefit of the most liberal construction that can be justly claimed for it, in virtue of its character as a remedial law, I have been unable to perceive that the inference of such a purpose is fairly deducible from any of its provisions.

Applying the views thus taken of the law to the facts certified, I am led to the conclusion that the judgment of the Circuit court cannot be sustained. For though the room in which the playing took place (and which was within the same enclosure with the main building, about thirty yards distant from the latter), had at one time been held with and used as an appendage to the tavern, such was not the case at the time of the playing. It was in the exclusive holding and occupancy of the witness Redd, who had rented it for the year as a law office. The fact that he was a boarder at the tavern, makes no difference; by the terms of the renting he was to have the right to hold and occupy the office until the end of the year, whether he continued to board at the tavern or not. His use of the room was not in any wise incidental to, or dependent upon his being a guest or boarder at the tavern, but was enjoyed by force of his rights as tenant. Nor is the case affected by the use of the room above his for the accommodation of the guests of the tavern. It does not appear that the access to that room was through the room in question, and the inference that such was the case is repelled by the consideration that the latter was used by Redd as a law office, and that he had, as is stated in the certificate, the exclusive control over it.

The severance of the room in question, therefore, from the tavern, in tenure, 686 occupancy, use and control, *seems to have been complete. And the charge in the presentment is thus, I think, not sustained.

I think the judgment should be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

The other judges concurred in the opinion of Daniel, J.

Judgment reversed.

687 *Scott v. The Commonwealth.

July Term, 1858, Lewisburg.

1. Forgery and Counterfeiting—Examination—Indictment.—A prisoner is examined for forging and counterfeiting twenty-four pieces of silver coin, and is sent on to the Circuit court for further trial. He cannot be indicted for feloniously having in his possession ten or more pieces of coin, with intent to alter and employ the same as true.

2. Possession of Forged Coin—Indictment—Allegations.—An indictment under the statute, Code, ch. 193, § 6, p. 738, for feloniously having in his possession more than ten pieces of forged or base coin, must allege that the prisoner had them in his possession at the same time; and the charge that on a certain day he had them in his possession, is not sufficient.†

3. Same—Appellate Practice—Refusal of Lower Court to Quash Defective Count—Case at Bar.—There are counts in an indictment for forging and counterfeiting coin, and also a count for feloniously having in his possession twenty pieces of forged coin, not saying, "at the same time." The prisoner having moved the court to quash the last count, which is overruled, there is verdict and judgment against him, and he obtains a writ of error. This court holding that the count is bad as an indictment for a felony, will not permit it to stand as a count for a misdemeanor, but will reverse the judgment, and quash the count.

4. Indictment*—Joinder of Counts‡—Felony and Misdemeanor.—QUÆRE: If in an indictment counts for a felony and for a misdemeanor may be joined. It seems not.§

688 *Isaac B. Scott was examined before the County court of Giles county for a felony, in that he did, on the day of September 1857, in said county, feloniously and falsely forge and counterfeit divers, viz: twenty-four pieces of silver coin current in this commonwealth by the laws and usages thereof called half dollars, with intent to deceive and defraud: And the court ordered that he should be further tried before the Circuit court of said county for the felony with which he stands charged.

At the April term 1858 of the Circuit court of Giles county, the grand jury found an indictment against Scott, which contained seven counts. The first three counts were for forging and counterfeiting coin. The fourth count charged that on a certain day in the county aforesaid, he feloniously did have in his possession twenty pieces of base coin current in this commonwealth by the laws and usages thereof, known and called half dollars, with intent to utter and employ the same as true, he then and there well knowing, &c. The fifth, sixth and seventh counts were for uttering counterfeit coin, and making or having in his possession instruments for counterfeiting.

When the prisoner was arraigned he moved the court to quash the fourth, fifth, sixth and seventh counts in the indictment, upon the ground that he had never been examined before the County court of Giles for the offence charged against him in these counts; and he also moved the court to quash the fourth count, on the ground that the charge therein set out was not in the language of the statute; which makes the possession of ten pieces or more of base coin at the same time a felony. But the court overruled the motion as to the fourth count, and sustained it as to the fifth, sixth and seventh. And thereupon the prisoner excepted.

Upon the trial several exceptions were taken, but one of which it is necessary 689 to notice. After the evidence *had been introduced, the attorney for the commonwealth moved the court to instruct the jury, that if they believed from the evidence in the cause, that the prisoner before the finding of the indictment, had in his possession in Giles county, ten pieces or more of the base, forged and counterfeit coin, referred to in the indictment, knowing the same to be base and forged, with a felonious intent, then he should be found guilty under the fourth count of the indictment. This instruction the court gave; and the prisoner excepted.

The jury found the prisoner guilty, and fixed the term of his imprisonment at three years: And the court rendered a judgment accordingly. Whereupon the prisoner applied to this court for a writ of error; which was allowed.

Staples, for the prisoner.

The Attorney General, for the commonwealth.

DANIEL, J. It seems to me that the prisoner's objections to the fourth count of the indictment, were both well taken.

The forging of coin, and the felonious having in possession such forged coin, are distinct and substantive offences. Code, ch. 193, § 3 and 6.

In Page v. Commonwealth, 9 Leigh 683, it was decided by the General court, that an examination of the prisoner for "feloniously using and employing as true, for his own benefit, a certain counterfeit note, well knowing the same to be counterfeit," did not warrant counts in the indictment for forging the note, and that the Circuit court erred in refusing to quash said counts, on the motion of the prisoner. And in Commonwealth v. Mowbray, 11 Leigh 643, where the prisoner was examined and remanded to the Circuit court for forging an order, the same court decided that such proceeding was not sufficient ground on which to 690 found an indictment *for uttering and publishing the order; and that the Circuit court erred in refusing to entertain the prisoner's motion to quash counts in the indictment charging him with the latter offence.

To my mind, the features which mark the felonious possession of forged coin, as an offence different from that of the forgery of the same, are as distinct as those which have been thus declared to distinguish forgery from uttering and publishing. And I do not think that the attorney general has succeeded in his effort to place this case outside of the reason and influence of the cases of Page and Mowbray. I cannot accede to the correctness of his position, that the charge of feloniously having base coin in possession is necessarily involved in the charge of forging it. For if it be conceded that the act of forging necessarily implies the possession, by the counterfeiter, of the coin, during the process of its fabrication, and at and (for an instant at least) after the completion of the process, it is yet obvious that the necessity of such an implication does not extend to the possession of any given number of pieces of the coin at one and the same point of time. The offence of "forging ten or more pieces of coin," would be complete, though it should appear that each piece in succession was commenced and finished, and had passed out of the hands, and beyond the control of the forger, before another came into his possession; whilst in order to make out the felony of having such coin in possession, the statute, in terms, requires it to be shown that the party accused had in his possession ten or more pieces at the same time. The judgment of the County court, therefore, remanding the prisoner to be tried for forging and counterfeiting twenty-four pieces of coin, does not serve to show that he has been examined for the offence of having said pieces or any ten of them in his possession at the same time.

691 *In cases of felonious homicide, and some other crimes not necessary to be instanced, a single act constitutes the basis and main element of each of a series of offences which are severally graduated and especially characterized by the greater or less degree of malice or wickedness of motive with which the felonious act may have been perpetrated. In such cases the order of the examining court remanding the accused to the Circuit court, to be tried for the felonious act aforesaid, is a sufficient warrant and authority for indicting and trying him for all or any one of the offences in the series. But the reason of such a rule does not extend to the several offences of forging, uttering, and feloniously having in possession base coin. It is true that these offences have certain properties and qualities common to them all. They each consist in frauds practiced or intended in respect to the current coin; and in order to convict a party of any one of the offences, it is necessary to show that there has been a forgery of the coin. These offences are thus of a kindred character, and belong to the same class. But they do not constitute such a series of offences as to justify its being predicated of any one of them that it is the major, and includes within itself, necessarily, all the elements of the other two, or of either one of them. In enquiring into an act of forgery, you do not necessarily institute an examination into the act of uttering the thing forged. And in enquiring into the act of felonious uttering (though it be necessary to enquire whether the coin is forged), it is not necessary to enquire whether the accused was the forger. And so an examination into either of these two offences would be perfect, without any enquiry as to whether the party accused had at the same time ten or more pieces of the base coin in his possession; and vice versa.

It is the right of persons charged with crime, to insist that an examination into the facts, the specific unlawful 692 *acts constituting the offence of which they are accused, shall precede any indictment against them. When, therefore, a party indicted for feloniously having in his possession base coin, objects to the charge, on the ground that he has not been previously examined for the offence, such objection is not met by showing that he has been examined for either of the two other offences of a kindred character.

It seems to me, that the objection of the prisoner to the fourth count, for defects apparent on its face, was also clearly well taken. The charge that the prisoner "had in his possession twenty pieces of base coin" on a particular day, "the day and year last aforesaid," mentioned in the preceding counts, did not, expressly or by necessary implication, allege that he had ten or more of such pieces in his possession at the same time. The truth of such a charge is not at all inconsistent with the idea that the twenty pieces may have come into and again passed out of his possession on the same day, one after another, or otherwise in such succession and order that no ten of them were in his possession at the same time.

For some purposes the law refuses to recognize any fractions of a day, and, by a fiction, treats it as if it were a point of time incapable of further division. This rule, or rather departure from rule, however, furnishes no authority for holding that a statute, which makes a conjecture or combination of circumstances at the same time essential to the constitution of a crime, can be satisfied by alleging and showing that such circumstances all transpired on the same day. There is nothing in the words of the statute on which the fourth count is based, from which to infer that the language in respect to time is used in any other than its ordinary and literal sense. The defect is not helped by charging that the prisoner "feloniously" had the twenty pieces in his possession. To make the count 693 *good, it does not suffice to style the prisoner's offence a felony. It is absolutely essential to the validity of the count, that it should also distinctly set out and charge the acts which constitute the offence. The having ten or more pieces in possession at the same time, is of the essence of the offence, and necessary to mark it as a felony.

It is argued, however, by the attorney general, that conceding the objections taken by the prisoner to the fourth count to be both good, it would not follow as a necessary consequence, that there was any error in the course of the Circuit court in respect to the prisoner's motion, inasmuch as said count is substantially a good and sufficient count for the misdemeanor of having in possession, with intent to utter, &c. pieces of base coin less in number than ten at the same time, punishable by the 6th section of ch. 193 of the Code, already cited. And to meet any difficulty which in this aspect of the case might arise from the joinder of counts for felony with a count for a misdemeanor, he refers to the 28th section of ch. 208 of the Code, p. 777.

This section declares, that if a person convicted of felony be by the jury acquitted of part and convicted of part of the offence charged, he shall be sentenced for such part as he is so convicted of, if the same be substantially charged in the indictment, whether it be felony or misdemeanor.

It is clear that whatever may be the influence of this section (if any) on a joinder of counts in felony with counts in misdemeanor, it does not sanction the course of proceeding to try the prisoner, in the face of his objection, duly and timely taken, for a felony upon a count, illegal as a count for felony, for want of a previous examination of the offence therein charged, and defective on its face. If upon the prisoner's motion to quash the count in question, on the score of such illegality and defect, 694 the court, whilst recognizing *the existence of such illegality or defect, was still of the opinion that the count was good as a count for a misdemeanor, and that it was proper to proceed to try the prisoner thereon for a misdemeanor, it should have shaped the course of the prosecution accordingly. By simply overruling the prisoner's motion, the court in effect decided that the count was a legal and sufficient count in felony. And the prisoner was accordingly put upon his trial, and tried, not for a felony and a misdemeanor, but for a felony, upon an indictment, one count of which was illegal and defective, and was convicted upon a general finding on the whole indictment.

We have no statute which cures the error of such a course of proceeding. And the only bearing (if any) obviously, which the section under consideration can have on the case, is on the question whether, after reversing, in proceeding to render such judgment as ought to have been rendered by the Circuit court, on the prisoner's motion to quash, we should render a judgment quashing the fourth count, or a judgment allowing it to stand as a count for a misdemeanor. And in this aspect of the case, it would appear, upon the reasoning of the attorney general, to be a matter of entire indifference to the commonwealth whether the count is quashed or retained. For if the constituent elements of the misdemeanor therein charged are necessarily embraced in the other counts charging the forgery, a verdict of the jury upon those counts, finding facts not sufficient to make out the forgery, but still sufficient to establish the misdemeanor, would, in the terms of the section in question, justify a conviction of the prisoner for the misdemeanor.

The general rule of the common law practice is to allow several felonies or several misdemeanors to be charged in several counts in one indictment, but not to allow of the joinder of a felony with a misdemeanor. 1 Chitty's Cr. Law 209; 695 Wharton's Precedents 13. *It appears (it is true) from cases to which our attention was called by the attorney general, and also from others referred to by the author last cited, that in several of our sister states the common law doctrine has been so far extended as to admit of the joinder of felonies and misdemeanors, where the misdemeanor is a constituent of the felony. The practice in Virginia, however, hitherto has been in conformity with the common law practice. The attorney general has cited no precedent, and I have not been able to find one, in which our courts have sanctioned a departure from that practice. The section in question does not in terms deprive a person charged with felony of any right which he might otherwise have, to demur to an indictment, or to move to quash it for an improper joinder of counts in felony with counts in misdemeanor. The provision is one which in its terms concerns the verdict in criminal trials, and declares simply what shall be the legal consequences of a verdict of a particular character in a given case. It does not profess to regulate the pleadings and proceedings in the previous stages of a prosecution. If designed to influence the previous pleadings at all, it does not, I think, admit of a construction which could give it the effect of changing the rules of such pleadings further than to save from the consequences of a demurrer for misjoinder, an indictment joining a count for a felony with one for misdemeanor, where the latter is a constituent of the former. And whether it is in practice to be allowed to change the course of the pleading at all, is a question which I do not think it is necessary we should now decide. The motion and effort of the prisoner in the Circuit court was not to quash the indictment for a misjoinder, but to quash a defective count. That count though wanting (as we hold) in some of the essentials of a good indictment for a felony, is in its general structure and phraseology, an 696 indictment for *a felony, and not an indictment for a misdemeanor. And leave is asked now for the first time, in the appellate court, for the commonwealth to proceed on this count for a misdemeanor, in connection with the remaining counts for a felony. The question as to the design of the section under consideration, is, therefore, presented in an aspect much less favorable to the pretensions of the commonwealth than it might be if the commonwealth were merely seeking to avoid the consequences of a misjoinder. I can conceive of no just advantage to the commonwealth, likely to result from granting the leave. For if, as already intimated, the charges of the fourth count are necessarily embraced in the counts for the forgery, the jury will be at liberty to find the prisoner guilty of the misdemeanor under those counts. If on the other hand said count contains any allegations not covered by the counts for the forgery, it would be obviously going beyond the design of the law to allow of such a joinder of counts. At best, it is not essential to any fair result that the fourth count should be allowed to remain in the indictment. As a count for a felony, it is defective and illegal; and though as a count for a misdemeanor it would in my opinion be substantially good (if standing alone), notwithstanding the offence is charged to have been done feloniously, and is otherwise irregularly stated, it might, if left to stand in the indictment, tend to the confusion of the jury, and consequently to the possible injury of the prisoner. Without undertaking, therefore, to express any definitive opinion as to the design (if any) of the law in question, in respect to the pleadings in criminal trials, I have come to the conclusion that the proper course is to quash the fourth count; and this the more readily, as I understand all the other members of the court to be of the opinion that in no case ought a count for felony to be joined with one for a misdemeanor.

697 *For reasons already stated, it is apparent that the instructions asked for by the attorney for the commonwealth were erroneously given; as they in effect authorized the jury to find the prisoner guilty of a felony under the fourth count, though they might believe that he did not have in his possession any ten of the pieces of base coin, at the same time.

Upon the whole, therefore, I am of the opinion that the judgment of the Circuit court ought to be reversed; and a judgment rendered by this court quashing the fourth count, and remanding the cause for a new trial to be had on the first, second and third counts of the indictment.

The other judges concurred.

penitentiary, having been tried, convicted and sentenced for another felony. Afterwards, and before a judgment on the scire facias against his bail, his time under his sentence expires, and he is sent back to the jail of the county in which he was to appear for trial before the Circuit court; and he is tried and acquitted.—The prisoner's confinement in the penitentiary having rendered it impossible for him to appear at the court at the time prescribed by the recognizance, it constitutes a good defence for the bail to the scire facias.

3. Same—Same—How Such Defence May Be Made.—In such case the defence may be made by plea; but it may also be made by petition or motion; and the facts being agreed by counsel for the bail and the attorney for the commonwealth, the question of law may be decided by the court.

At an examining court held for Ohio county on the 8th day of February 1853, Robert J. Drew, charged with felony, and Alfred Caldwell his security, entered into a recognizance in the usual form, in the sum of five hundred dollars each, conditioned that the said Drew would appear at the Circuit court of said county on the first day of the next term thereof, then and there to stand his trial for the said felony, and not depart thence without leave of the said court.

On the first day of the next term of said court, to wit, the 14th day of May 1853, the said Drew having been called and not appearing, his default was recorded, and a scire facias was ordered to be issued 699 *against him and his said surety, on the said recognizance.

A scire facias was accordingly issued, which was returned executed upon said Caldwell, but "no inhabitant," as to said Drew.

On the 23d day of June 1854 the defendant Caldwell demurred to the scire facias, and the attorney for the commonwealth joined in the demurrer.

On the next day, to wit, the 24th day of June 1854, Caldwell filed a petition, representing to the court that upon the day of the forfeiture of said recognizance the said Drew was imprisoned as a convict in the penitentiary of Virginia, for an offence committed by him, between the day of the execution of said recognizance and its forfeiture. But that the said Drew having within the last two months been discharged from said penitentiary, was then in the jail of Ohio county, there confined to await and abide his trial for the offence mentioned in the recognizance. And praying that, for as much as no end of justice would be defeated thereby, the court would remit the penalty of the said recognizance, or so much thereof as might seem under the circumstances reasonable and just.

Annexed to the petition was a memorandum, signed by the attorney for the commonwealth, containing an admission of facts, corresponding, substantially, with those stated in the petition.

The court ordered the petition to be filed, and the matter thereof continued until the said Drew (who had been indicted for the offence mentioned in the recognizance, and against whom the prosecution had been hitherto continued) should have had his trial on the said indictment.

About a year thereafter, to wit, on the 19th day of June 1855, Drew was tried on the said indictment, and acquitted.

700 *Afterwards, during the same term, to wit, on the 23d day of June 1855, the matters of law arising on the demurrer to the scire facias, were argued and decided against the defendant; and judgment was thereupon rendered against him for five hundred dollars, with interest and costs. Before the judgment was rendered, it appears Caldwell insisted that the court ought to discharge or exonerate him from the penalty of the said recognizance. But the court refused to allow such exoneration and discharge, either in whole or in part, and entered judgment against him for the full penalty of said recognizance. To which refusal and judgment Caldwell excepted.

At the same term, to wit, on the 5th day of July 1855, Caldwell moved the court to set aside the judgment, and grant him a rule against the commonwealth, returnable on the first day of the next term, to show cause why he should not be exonerated and discharged from the penalty of said recognizance, by reason of the matters and things set forth in the petition aforesaid, and the admission of the attorney for the commonwealth thereto annexed, and an addition then made to the petition, stating that said Drew had been tried on the indictment, found not guilty and discharged. On the next day the court overruled the said motion; "for these among other reasons: the act of God, or of the law, or of the obligee, the default is excused.

In that case, the principal was prevented from appearing before the United States district court because, at the time appointed for appearance, he was in actual confinement in the penitentiary of Missouri. But the court held that this was no defence to the sureties on the recognizance given to the United States. The court (citing among others the principal case) said, that if it had been shown that the United States had, by a subsequent arrest and conviction in another district, for another defence against it, prevented the performance of the condition, the question would have been more complicated and difficult of solution; and one respecting which the cases in the state courts seem to differ.

The court then continues by saying: "The United States and the state of Missouri are wholly distinct parties, and the action of the state authorities cannot be imputed to the government of the United States as an obstruction or interruption by it to the performance of the condition of the recognizance. It is therefore plain that there is no act of the obligee which excuses the default of the principal obligor. Hence, the defence pleaded must rest upon the proposition that the performance was excused by the act of the law. This makes it necessary to consider what is an act of the law, in the sense of the rule."

As shown above, the court, in this case, did not consider the existing facts to constitute such an act of law as would relieve the sureties from their liability on the recognizance.

That the motion is addressed to the discretion of the court, an the court can dispose of the application without the formal presence of the commonwealth; because the court had at a former day of the term disposed of the matter by giving judgment on the scire facias in the name of the commonwealth against the defendant Caldwell; because the court, of its knowledge of the facts attending the trial of the cause, is satisfied that if the said Drew had not forfeited his recognizance, but had appeared and had his trial, at the time to which he was recognized by the recognizance
701. referred to, *the said Drew would have been convicted. The term of the court to which said Drew was recognized was the trial term of his co-indictees, James Morgan, William Parker and John S. Smith, and who were severally tried and convicted. On the trial of said Drew one of the witnesses who testified at that term, from misrecollection, as the court believes, stated a fact important to the issue in the trial of Drew, differently from what he stated it on the former trial; and the court being satisfied of the want of reasonable conditions for remitting the said recognizance, or any part thereof."

The said Caldwell applied to this court for a supersedeas; which was awarded.

Fry and H. M. Matthews, for the appellant.

The Attorney General, for the commonwealth.

MONCURE, J. The Circuit court did not err in overruling the demurrer to the scire facias. It was decided by this court in Gedney v. The Commonwealth, ante, p. 318, that one scire facias may be issued against several cognizors in one recognizance; and that case governs this. Of course the scire facias must treat the recognizance as several, and not joint; and the judgment must be several. That is the case here. The scire facias correctly recites the recognizance; and though it calls on the cognizors to show why the commonwealth should not have execution against them, "of the said five hundred dollars," yet the words, "according to the force, form and effect of the recognizance aforesaid," immediately follow, and plainly show that the scire facias was intended to be, and actually is, in strict conformity with the recognizance.

The second assignment of error, that "the court should have awarded a writ of 702 enquiry," was not relied *on by the counsel for the plaintiff in error, in their argument before this court, and is clearly without any just foundation.

The remaining assignments of error are, I think, well founded. The plaintiff in error had a good defence to the scire facias. The performance of the condition of the recognizance was legally impossible. On the day on which the principal cognizor was to make his personal appearance before the Circuit court of Ohio county, according to the terms of the said condition, he was imprisoned as a convict in the penitentiary of the state, as he had been for some time before, and continued to be for some time thereafter. There were no means whereby the surety could withdraw the principal from the penitentiary, and bring him, or have him brought to the Circuit court of Ohio, to be surrendered in discharge of the recognizance. The principal is considered to be in the custody of the bail; and the law undoubtedly gives to the bail great power in arresting the principal and surrendering him in discharge of the recognizance. But that power is not invincible. It may be overcome by the act of God, as for instance the death of the principal; or by the act of the law, as in this case. And when so overcome, the law excuses the non-performance of the condition, because it compels no man to do impossibilities. So also such non-performance may be excused by the act of the cognizee.

That it may be excused by the act of God, is well settled by authority. In Coke Lit. 206, a, it is said, "If a man be bound by recognizance or bond, with a condition that he shall appear the next term in such a court; and before the day the cognizor or obligor dieth, the recognizance or obligation is saved." In The People v. Manning, 8 Cow. R. 297, the principal cognizor was so sick on the day for his appearance that he could not be removed, and continued
703 sick until *he died on a subsequent day. This was held to be a good defence to an action of debt on the recognizance. The court, by Savage, Ch. J., said, "In all cases where the condition of a bond or recognizance is possible at the time of making the condition, and before the same can be performed it becomes impossible by the act of God, or of the law, or of the obligee, there the obligation is saved.

That such non-performance may be excused by the act of the law, is also well settled. In The People v. Bartlett, 3 Hill's N. Y. R. 570, which was an action of debt on a recognizance, conditioned that R. should personally appear at the next Court of general sessions of the county of L, to answer to an indictment; it was held to be a good defence to the action, that between the date of the recognizance and the term of the court therein mentioned, R was arrested and committed to jail in another county, where he was kept in confinement till after the day of appearance. The court, by Nelson, Ch. J., lays down the same general principle before stated, "that where the performance of a condition of a bond or recognizance has been rendered impossible by the act of God, or of the law, or of the obligee, the default is excused:" and several authorities are cited to sustain the principle. In that case the party was confined in jail before conviction. In this case he had been convicted and was confined in the penitentiary. So that this case, if possible, is stronger than that, in favor of the defence.

Even in civil cases, in which the undertaking of the bail is different from what it is in criminal, and is to some extent a se-
